THE BRITISH FLEET IN THE SEA OF MARMORA

Topics of the Week

England and the Congress.——A considerable party of Englishmen are very angry with the Government for the concessions it has been making to Russia. These severe critics seem to be of opinion that we should have insisted on the Czar giving up every advantage he gained in the late war. This would undoubtedly have been a "spirited" policy; but whether it is a policy of which the country would have approved is another question. The war made vast changes absolutely inevitable, and, so far as the business of the Congress has proceeded, it seems to us that England has on the whole good reason to be satisfied. It is now generally admitted that the Balkan frontier may be so fortified as to make a further Russian advance virtually impossible; and how great a gain this is for England may be readily understood if we remember what anxiety there was a short time ago with respect to the future of Constantinople and the Straits. The cession of Bosnia and Herzegovina to Austria, notwithstanding the resistance of the Turks, will ultimately be recognised as a genuine relief to the Porte. These provinces have been a continual annoyance to it; and they would have been a source of greater danger than ever had they been left open to the intrigues of Russia. Austria will take good care to deliver them from foreign influence, and by her extension to the South-East she will acquire a moral authority over the neighbouring Principalities that will be by no means favourable to a Pan-Slavonic propaganda. It is improbable that Greece will profit directly to any great extent by the decisions of the Congress. The Greek race, however, will be largely benefited, since it will be saved from Slavonic predominance, and all branches of it will obtain a system of just government. The foundations may thus be laid for a really important Hellenic State in the remote future. There is much difference of opinion as to the resolutions which will be formed with respect to Asia Minor. Whether or not the whole country is to be virtually placed under British rule, all classes of Englishmen hope that Batoum will not be yielded to Russia. The inhabitants deserve independence, for they have known how to defend themselves; and every legitimate aspiration of Russia would be gratified by the town being made a free port under the protection of Turkey. England would also be pleased if the Congress so organised Armenia that it would owe only a nominal allegiance to the Sultan, and stand in no danger of falling into the benevolent hands of the Czar.

The Revenue Returns.——For many years past we have been accustomed to such constant progression in population, production, income—in short, in all the items which combine to constitute national prosperity, as that phrase is usually understood, that the least appearance of a backward tendency fills us with apprehension. The Revenue Returns of the first quarter of the present year are undeniably less favourable than they might be, but when we remember that during that period trade abroad has been very dull, that the Lancashire cotton industry was for weeks almost at a standstill, and that the prospect of a great war hung threateningly over our heads, we may feel confident that a revenue which suffers so little diminution from three such potent causes must rest on a pretty secure basis. There is, however, one consideration about our revenue which may justly cause us a certain amount of uneasiness, and that is that, vast as is its annual amount, it is drawn from very few sources. In the old days of indirect taxation, the public exchequer was fed by innumerable rills; now it is replenished by streams of greater magnitude, but numerically far fewer in number. One result of this is that any dulness of trade is instantly felt by the revenue. Working people drink less spirits and beer, and so the Excise returns go down. Morally, this may be a good thing, but it is a bad thing for a Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has been hoping that his fellow countrymen would drink themselves out of a possible deficit. As for retrenchment, the word is in these days rarely uttered, because there is a general conviction that we must have a thoroughly efficient army and navy. Soldiers and sailors, ships and guns, cost far more than they used to do, and there is no other item in the national expenditure in which any saving can be effected worth speaking of. What is to be done then, now that we have abolished (rashly, as it would appear) nearly all the ancient imposts, supposing our revenue continues to go down? Well, we must either have a loan—an objectionable expedient—or, what is most probable, the poor patient middle class will have to bear the brunt of the difficulty by another twopenny or threepenny twist of the Income Tax thumb-screw.

The Pan-Anglican Synod.——The Bishops of the Anglican Church must have found their meeting eleven years ago a very pleasant one, otherwise they would hardly have repeated it after so short an interval. And even to the laymind it is obvious that they must derive considerable benefit from such an assembly. The spectacle of so many prelates from all parts of the world must enable them to realise very clearly the vitality and adaptability of the Anglican form of Church government; and we may suppose that Bishops of narrow tendencies will have their ideas somewhat expanded by coming into contact with men who labour under wholly different conditions. At the same time it will be a pity if the Pan-Anglican Synod dreams of setting itself up as a sort of tribunal, whose business is to lay down the law for the rest of the world. It may, of course, offer suggestions to those who recognise episcopal authority; but even here it cannot effect very much, since it must necessarily tone down its language to suit many diverse sympathies; which means that it must talk commonplaces that will neither harm nor benefit any one. As regards the outer world, we fear the day is long past when the word of a Bishop carried with it more weight than that of any other educated man. It is quite true, as the Archbishop of Canterbury said in opening the proceedings, that scepticism has rarely prevailed to so large an extent as it does now. But a formal utterance is not the weapon with which it must be assailed, whether the utterance comes from an Anglican Synod or from a Roman Council. Sceptics must be met on their own ground; they must be dealt with by experts who have investigated the evidence for religion and know how to present it in a skilful form. A mere ex cathedrâ proclamation is apt rather to excite their mirth than to allay their doubts. On the whole, therefore, it is to be hoped that the hundred Bishops now assembled at Lambeth will not take the Synod too seriously, but regard it as a friendly gathering with which they themselves are alone concerned.

Irish Immigration into Great Britain. ——We do not purpose here to refer to the question of the Removal of Irish Paupers, which was fully discussed in the House of Commons on Tuesday evening, except to say that it would do good to many a prejudiced Irishman if he were to read the debate as it is fully reported in our London daily papers. He would perceive that his imagined Saxon oppressors, whether English or Scotch, Tory or Radical, were all equally solicitous that no Irish man, woman, or child who is compelled to seek parish aid should be subjected to any unnecessary inconvenience on that account, although they might not be all agreed as to the best mode of amending the law. We prefer here to say a few words concerning the Irish influx generally. There was an Irish colony in London in the days of Elizabeth, and probably still earlier, but, till recently, except in London and two or three other large towns, most of the Irish were transient visitors, who came for harvest purposes, and then departed. Now, in all the mining and manufacturing districts we have large colonies of Irishmen, and in some places they form such a preponderating element in the population as to be able to turn the scale at elections. In one respect (for which the Irish are in no degree to blame) this immigration has had a bad effect on the English. It has enabled them in many instances (though not to the same extent as in North America) to evade the ordinance which commands that man shall earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. They have left the hard, heavy, dirty work to the Irish. "Where would England be without Irish labour?" said Mr. Davies in the House the other night. He meant, of course, that she would be nowhere, but the observation, though true, is hardly complimentary to the English. Some, however, may say that one nationality is best qualified for one sort of labour and another for another. According to the well-known maxim in the building trade, "Scotch masons, Welsh blacksmiths, English bricklayers, Irish labourers." But we cannot think that this modern aversion to hard work is a good sign. No wonder, when so many workmen's sons try to be clerks and shopmen, and so many of their daughters milliners and shopwomen, that we invoke the assistance of the Irish. Perhaps in a generation or two Paddy will fail us. He will have become too refined for hard "grafting." Then we shall have to call in the "Heathen Chinee," and probably he will in time, by sheer force of numbers, swamp the whole Indo-Germanic race.

An English Deputation Abroad.——Everybody knows how the average Briton used to comport himself in foreign countries. He went abroad with a vague impression that England had somehow conquered the world, and that it was necessary to show the frivolous French and the heavy Teutons how very inferior they were to their English masters. So many shots have been fired at this ridiculous tendency that some have taken effect; and there are now many annual visitors to the Continent who display no other trace of their former pretensions than a certain cold reserve. The real nature, however, still seems to show itself in deputations. A number of gentlemen went this week to Paris to have an interview with the Minister of Finance on the subject of the sugar bounties. With the courtesy that was to be expected of him, M. Léon Say at once engaged to meet the deputation on Tuesday at mid-day. The sugar refiners, who would never have dreamt of keeping Sir Stafford Northcote waiting, saw no reason why a French Chancellor of the Exchequer should not wait, and accordingly strolled about the Exhibition till three. It is not easy, however, to exhaust the courtesy of a Frenchman, and M. Léon Say received his strange visitors as politely as if they had appeared at the proper moment. Frenchmen are not usually supposed to be well versed in foreign tongues; but even if it were a general rule for them to speak English, the deputation were bound to see that one of their number knew French, or to provide themselves with an interpreter. Our countrymen, however, were far above any consideration of this kind, and poor M. Léon Say had to do his best to understand them and to talk to them in their own speech. After boring him for a long time, they finished by expressing a wish that their visit should be taken as "a mark of sympathy with the French Republic." We venture to hope that any future body of Englishmen who go to lay a grievance before a French Minister will remember that he has at least a right to expect from them the ordinary courtesies of civilised life.

Foreign Office Pariahs.——Our remarks regarding the tendency of the English to depute their hard work to the Irish is paralleled by the recent Foreign Office scandal. In that and in other Government departments it has been the custom for many years past, on occasions when there was an extraordinary pressure of work, to employ extra clerks who were not attached to the establishment, and who were in some instances supplied by law stationers in the neighbourhood. Some of these gentlemen, however (their services being found very acceptable), though only engaged by the week, remained for years. They were still, however, regarded as "extras," they had no chance of getting on to the permanent staff, and their pay was of very modest dimensions, namely, tenpence an hour, and even less. Many of these men were possessed of considerable accomplishments, and human nature being wont to shift laborious and disagreeable work on to other people's shoulders, it can be easily understood how, by degrees, while their high-caste comrades were spending the sacred hours from ten till four in improving conversation, or in the perusal of newspapers, they were set to do the bulk of the routine copying. We may be wrong in our surmise, but we cannot on any other hypothesis explain how such a document as the Anglo-Russian Agreement, which ought to have been regarded as too sacred for any eyes except those in the head of a Cabinet Minister, came to be entrusted to the hands of a poor tenpenny "writer."

Habitual Drunkards. ——The critics of the measure introduced by Dr. Cameron into the House of Commons on Wednesday did not exaggerate the dangers connected with one part of it. The term dipsomania, or habitual drunkenness, is so vague that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to secure absolute fairness in the administration of the proposed law. Of course, in the vast majority of cases an application by relatives for the confinement of a drunkard would mean that he was really incapable of attending to his affairs; but instances of a very different kind might occur, and we cannot be certain that justices would always be penetrating enough to find out the truth. This difficulty does not apply to those unfortunate men who may actually wish to have their liberty taken from them for a definite time. That there are such men there can be no doubt. Drunkenness may become so imperious a habit that the victim absolutely loses control over his will. In that case his only hope of safety is that the chance of obtaining drink should be taken from him; and there are probably at this moment in England hundreds of persons who would willingly seize the opportunity of so far limiting their freedom if they could. Why should they not be allowed to do so? At present they are a burden to themselves and a curse to all connected with them; it is at any rate possible that after a period of restraint they might recover self-control. The House of Commons felt the force of this argument, and read Dr. Cameron's Bill a second time on condition that its compulsory clauses should be left out in Committee. When the measure becomes law it will be open to any drunkard to sign away his liberty for a year. The system may not give relief in every instance; but if it delivers from a degrading vice even half of those who take advantage of it, its establishment will have been thoroughly justified.

Dust and Water.——An innocent plebeian might imagine that if London scavengering were anywhere done in first-rate style, it would be in such a neighbourhood as Belgrave Square. An indignant inhabitant, however, has shown that this is by no means the case, but that, on the contrary, the scavengering is conducted on thoroughly unphilosophical principles. First come the water-carts at nine A.M. and turn the dust into mud. This, in itself, would be a sensible proceeding if it were done earlier, and if the said mud were at once carted away. Next, however, after considerable delay, come the sweepers, who gather into little heaps this mud, which, as it dries, blows into every open window, and is dispersed abroad by every passing wheel and horse-hoof; while, finally, between three and four P.M., come the tardy carters to carry off the nuisance. Of course, the system should be reversed. The dust should be removed (having first been watered) before people are up, and then the watering should be repeated slowly and thoroughly, and several times a day. It may comfort the Belgravian householder to know that watering is performed with equal inefficiency elsewhere. The chief object of the drivers, as far as we can see, appears to be to get rid of their load of water as quickly as possible. Hence the roadway is always dusty or muddy. For years past we have uttered this annual growl in vain; and we beg once more to ask why we can't have, as in Paris, the hose-and-jet system.

Our Illustrations

THE CRISIS IN THE EAST

OUR FLEET IN THE SEA OF MARMORA

THESE four sketches were taken by our special artist at Constantinople during a visit to the British fleet in the Sea of Marmora, and will serve to show that, although in port and at anchor, the officers and crews of our ironclads are in no way idle. Indeed, when we read of the daily routine of the life of both officers and men, it would seem as though there was little time left for the numerous cricket matches and hunting and shooting excursions which are so frequently chronicled in letters from officers of the fleet. The actual drill itself takes up a considerable portion of the time—not only foot and rifle exercise, ashore and afloat, in the heavy marching order depicted in two of our illustrations, but cutlass drill, and practice in repelling boarders or annihilating imaginary torpedo-boats, heavy gun drill, and last, but by no means least, sail drill, in order to give the men confidence when aloft, and to prevent the officers from relying too much upon modern machinery instead upon the old seamanship which won us so many battles in days of yore. Then there is the ship to be kept as burnished and bright as a jeweller's window—no easy task of itself with so much metal-work and an atmosphere of damp salt, the machinery to be kept painted and in repair, not to speak of a thousand and one other tasks which justify a recent writer in speaking of one of these vessels as a floating hive of industry. Even as we see in our sketch, the doctors are not wholly without occupation, for, in addition to fevers and the various diseases to which British residents in a southern clime are subject, it not unfrequently happens that at target or torpedo practice a man is accidentally wounded, whereupon he is immediately conveyed to the cockpit, and his injuries at once attended to with all surgical promptitude. In addition to the active work we have above mentioned, there is, at least for the officers, a good deal of brain work to be gone through. "Tam Minervâ quam Marte," as our artist remarks, and, upon a "cessation of hostilities," the younger portion of the community set busily to work "chasing the wily algebraical x"—a task which to many young heads is far more irksome than a spirited stern chase of a Russian cruiser or even of an Arab slaver.

THE BERLIN CONGRESS—WATCHING FOR THE DELEGATES

THE outside of the Radziwill Palace shortly before the hour appointed for the meeting of Congress always presents an animated and somewhat amusing aspect. On the days when the members meet, a formidable band of pickelhaubed policemen assemble before the main entrance, and, after a brief preliminary drill, are despatched to their respective posts, some being stationed at the north angle of the Wilhelmsplatz, and others filing out along the pavement of the Wilhelmstrasse, foot-passengers being then prohibited from passing along the road from the portal of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the statue of Marshal Schwerin. A numerous crowd of people assemble to see the delegates arrive, and to catch a passing glimse of what The Times calls the "henceforth historical, if in all cases not very august, physiognomies" of the members of the Congress. Although manifestly interested, the crowd are by no means demonstrative, appearing thoughtful and silent as befitting the serious business on hand.

THE FUNERAL OF MR. McGAHAN

WE have already in a previous number (No. 404, August 25, 1877) published a portrait of Mr. McGahan, the well-known and highly talented correspondent of the Daily News, whose graphic description of the Bulgarian atrocities roused such horror throughout Europe in 1876, and in whose letters much of the authentic history of the late war has been told. Mr. Macgahan, after going safely through all the vicissitudes and dangers of the campaign, being continually under fire by the side of General Skobeleff the younger, with whom he was on intimate terms, suddenly succumbed at Constantinople, in the early part of last month, to typhus fever, that dread disease which has carried off so many of our countrymen who have been engaged in journalistic or medical duties during the war. Mr. Macgahan was a universal favourite, both with his colleagues and with the Russian authorities, and his death has been deeply regretted by all, and particularly by General Skobeleff, who attended the funeral as one of the chief mourners. The burial took place on June 24th, in the Catholic Cemetery. The pall was held by the correspondents of the Daily News, Times, Telegraph, Standard, and Graphic. In addition to General Skobeleff, Colonel Chambers Maynard, of the American Legation; the officers of the United States despatch boats, the British Assistant Judge, and a number of well-known persons of position, attended to show their respect for the deceased.

REVIEW OF INDIAN TROOPS AT MALTA

IT was on Monday, the 17th inst., the day after his arrival at Malta, that the Duke of Cambridge reviewed the whole of the troops upon the island. His Royal Highness wore his Field Marshal's uniform, with plumed helmet, and rode a powerful bay charger, and was accompanied by Sir A. Barton, K.C.B., the new Governor, and a brilliant staff of military officers. The review was held on the Floriana Parade, the flat-roofed houses in the vicinity being converted into grand stands for the occasion, and every inch of vantage ground being occupied by spectators. The Indian troops had the post of honour to the right of the line, and were narrowly inspected by the Duke as he slowly rode past them. After the inspection there was a march past, the Indian regiments of course attracting the greatest share of attention, and being much admired for their smart appearance and steady marching. The Duke appeared greatly pleased, and after all was over he called the colonels of the various regiments around him and complimented them upon the manner in which the evolutions had been performed.—Our engraving represents the 9th Bengal Lancers, the celebrated "Hodson's Horse," passing the Duke at the saluting point.

THE OSTEND FESTIVITIES

THE fêtes at Ostend in celebration of the opening of the new Kursaal extended over several days, but the great event was the visit of the King of the Belgians on the 22nd ult. The town was richly decorated, and the proceedings of the day commenced with a review of the Civic Guards and the garrison. His Majesty and suite next went to the new Kursaal, a fine building, fronting the sea, and overlooking landwards the new park. It contains an immense Concert Hall, with a domed roof, besides a number of ball-rooms, banquetting rooms, and other apartments. Here the King listened to an address from the Burgomaster, and delivered a suitable reply, saying that he was happy to show his sympathy with the town of Ostend, and that he would do his utmost to maintain for it the rank which was its due. He next made the tour of the new buildings, inspecting every detail, and after having presented to him a number of distinguished persons, among whom was the Marquis of Londonderry, who was present in his official capacity as Vice-Commodore of the Cinque Ports Yacht Squadron, he ascended into a pavilion above the portico of the Kursaal, when he gave the signal for the commencement of the Regatta, for which he had given the first and second prize cups, and soon afterwards left for Brussels. The Regatta consisted of two races, in which a large number of English yachts took part; the Formosa, the Ada, and the Miranda taking the first, second, and third prizes respectively. The day's festivities concluded with a grand concert in the Kursaal, and on the following day there was a banquet, a ball, and a torchlight procession with bands of music in the streets.—Our sketches need no special description.

"AMONGST ALIENS"

A NOVELETTE by Mrs. T. A. Trollope, is commenced on page 9.

THE ESCAPE OF THE EARL OF FLANDERS

IN the year 1381 Philip van Artevelde (son of Jacob Artevelde, the brewer of Ghent, who was celebrated as a popular leader in the fourteenth century) was leader of the people of Ghent in their civil war against Bruges, and gained a victory over Count Louis. A year after he was defeated and slain in the Battle of Rosbeke. His history has been admirably narrated in Sir Henry Taylor's closet-play, Philip van Artevelde. One of the incidents of the struggle is represented in our engraving, and is thus described by M. Henri Martin, the French Academician, in his "History of France:"—"Louis (the Earl of Flanders), fleeing from his pursuers, took refuge in the house of a poor widow. She hid him under her children's bed. The soldiers rushed in, and, seeing the children quietly sleeping, concluded that no one had entered the room, and left to continue their search elsewhere." Froissart tells the story very graphically. "'My lord,' said the woman, mount this ladder, and get under the bed in which my children sleep.' While she employed herself by the fireside, with another child in a cradle, the Earl mounted the ladder as quickly as he could, and, getting between the straw and the coverlid, hid himself, and contracted his body into as little space as possible. Presently some of the mob of Ghent came in, and declared that they had seen a man enter the house. The woman vowed that they were mistaken, whereupon one of them took a candle, mounted the ladder, and, thrusting his head into the place, saw nothing but the wretched bed in which the children were asleep. He looked all about him, above and below, and then said to his companions, 'Come, come, let us go; we only lose our time here. The poor woman speaks truth; there is not a soul but herself and the children.' On hearing this, they left the house and went into another quarter." It will be observed that Froissart speaks of the Earl as getting, not under the bedstead, as the artist represents, but between the coverlid and the straw—a far more effectual place of concealment.

"LIKE GRANDMAMMA"

A CERTAIN degree of popularity has always attached to pictures in which the infirmities of age are playfully simulated by youth. Some years ago we remember an engraving, representing a little girl seated in a big arm-chair, with her grandmother's spectacles on her nose, and her grandmother's big Bible in her lap; and at the present time there is a very pretty engraving in some of the shop windows of a sweet little girl arrayed in her mother's hat, and carrying her mother's parasol, the legend beneath being "Now I'm Mamma." In the engraving before us, which is reproduced by permission of the Berlin Photographic Company, Rathbone Place, the artist has taken a leaf, if we may so say, out of the same book. Mr. Schlesinger is well known in Germany for the skill with which he depicts fascinating female faces and figures, and here he places before us a comely peasant girl who, with a roguish twinkle in her eye, is leaning on her grandmother's crutch, and making believe to be very decrepit, to the apparent astonishment of the cat, who is sitting bolt upright, as if to afford his young mistress an example of the advantage of an upright figure.

OUR INDIAN CONTINGENT AT MALTA—THE REVIEW BEFORE THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: CHARGE OF THE NINTH BENGAL LANCERS

THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT AND PRINCESS MARGARET OF PRUSSIA AT DOVER

ON Tuesday in last week the Duke of Connaught and Princess Louise Margaret, with her father, Prince Frederick Charles, arrived at Dover from Ostend by special steamer, and were received on landing by General Lord A. Russell and staff, and a guard of honour, under Royal salute; Captain Bruce, R.N., the Admiralty Superintendent; Colonel M'Neill, V.C., Equerry to Her Majesty, and Baron von der Brinchen, the German Chargé d'Affaires. The Royal party lunched at the Lord Warden Hotel, and the Princess, who wore a hat and jacket of black silk and a grey costume, was presented by Miss Swainson, the daughter of the proprietor, with a magnificent bouquet of "Marechal Neil" and "Duchess of Edinburgh" roses. This is the incident which forms the subject of our engraving. Their Royal Highnesses left Dover by special train for Windsor, where they were to remain for some time as guests of Her Majesty the Queen.

THE FAMINE IN CHINA

THE Chinese, officially and otherwise, have resorted to many expedients for raising subscriptions in aid of the sufferers by the desolating famine in the Northern Provinces. Among other methods for touching the hearts of their countrymen a book has been widely circulated, consisting of twelve illustrations, accompanied by descriptive letter-press. This book is now in our hands, and we have reproduced eight of the cuts. They may be briefly described as follows:—

1. Boys and girls being sold by their parents. 2. People committing suicide through the pangs of cold and hunger. 3. Cannibalism. 4. A mother and newly-born baby dead from cold and hunger. 5. Living skeletons walking over the bones of the dead. 6. The filial child and the faithful wife bearing patiently the pangs of hunger. 7. This cut is of an allegorical character. It states that the auspicious snow of the southern region is much preferable to remaining at home—the meaning being that it is better to be in the midst of southern snow than to be indoors enduring all the horrors of want. 8. The magistrate seated with his attendants while the starving crowds are coming forward, with baskets in their hands, clamouring for relief. Three of the four engravings which we have omitted respectively represent the famine-stricken people unroofing their houses (in order to sell the materials); barking trees and cutting grass for food; and wandering about the country in search of sustenance; while the fourth, which is again allegorical, shows that the benevolently disposed ought to open their purses, and that all the gods will unite in restoring happiness.

What with the miseries caused by the Russian invasion of Turkey, by the famine in India, and by local distress in various parts of our own island, the resources of the charitably-disposed among us have of late years been severely tried, and unfortunately the magnitude of the famine in China has deterred many people from offering their gifts, from a mistaken idea that their little drops of aid could be of no avail in such an ocean of misery. On this account, and with these quaint Chinese pictures staring us in the face, we venture this day to appeal to our readers on behalf of the "Chinese Famine Relief Fund," of which Sir Rutherford Alcock, K.C.B., is chairman. Subscriptions will be thankfully received at the Agra Bank, 35, Nicholas Lane, E.C., by the Rev. Arnold Foster, hon. secretary to the fund. We add the following bare facts. The famine, which was caused by long-continued drought, prevails over a region thrice as big as the United Kingdom, containing a population of 120,000,000, of whom 15,000,000 are in a state of starvation, while 5,000,000 have died. There is plenty of food to be got from the south of China, provided money is forthcoming to pay for it; but the resources of the Government and the people are utterly inadequate to attain this end. The China Famine Relief Fund was organised last February. Up to the end of May 18,000*l.* had been received by the London Committee, and a further sum of 7,200*l.*, was sent through various Missionary Societies in this country. The distribution of the money thus raised is entrusted to European and American missionaries, and is carried on under their immediate supervision. Forthcoming harvest prospects are at present encouraging; but, as the seed which has been sown will not ripen until September, the distress must, under the most favourable circumstances, continue for some time to come.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION

TROPHIES are inevitable features in an International Exhibition, and though occasionally they are composed of highly uninteresting black bottles presumably containing wine, or bright tin cans with preserved peas from Southern France, corned beef from Australia, or oysters from North America, they are, as a rule, both picturesque and instructive, being a means of displaying, in a highly attractive form, the manufactures and products of the country they represent. Of the various trophies in the Paris Exhibition, by far the most handsome and comprehensive is certainly that erected by the Dominion of Canada, which has been accorded a prominent position in the centre of one of the two domed extremities of the Palace of the Champ de Mars facing the Trocadéro, and is surrounded by the trophies of the other British colonies—that of Victoria being shown in the background of our sketch—its chief feature being an obelisk, exhibiting the amount of gold produced by the colony. The Canadian trophy is erected in stages and of wood, and stands some hundred feet high; but as for the articles exhibited, we must refer the reader to a list of Canadian products for their number and kind, merely mentioning, as a sample, that agricultural implements and lumber-men's tools take a prominent place in the exhibit, while white and black bears, holding mysterious waste-paper baskets, moose and elk heads, Indian canoes, groupings of fishing nets, spears, paddles, buffalo robes, and Indian work are amongst the most interesting of the innumerable articles displayed round the staging.

The trophy of the Dutch Colonies is another handsome and interesting collection of miscellaneous products which have been gathered together from the various colonial possessions of Holland, such as Java, Malacca, Borneo, some small stations on the Guinea Coast, Dutch Guiana, &c. The native weapons and shields, the skins of the various wild animals and the overflowing sheaves of corn are particularly noticeable.

HOME.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——The progress reported to have been made by the Berlin Conference seems to have given very general satisfaction, and if no hitch occurs the complete settlement (at least for a time) of the Eastern Question may shortly be expected. Mr. H. Richard, M.P., and Professor Leone Levi, have gone to Berlin, as a deputation from the Peace Society to urge the Congress to consider the question of mutual disarmament and international arbitration; and Messrs. E. Sturge and J. Lang, as representatives of the Anti-Slavery Society, are endeavouring to induce the Congress to enforce the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade throughout the Ottoman dominions. The Society of Friends is also represented by a deputation, whose object is to urge the claims of Religious equality.—Lord Carnarvon, speaking last week at a dinner given at the Crystal Palace by a City Company, referred to his retirement from the Ministry, saying he had never had a doubt that he was pursuing the right course. Subsequent events had confirmed his view, and he never had, and never would, regret the step he had taken.—Addressing a Conservative meeting at Bournemouth, on Saturday, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, M.P., said that he believed no persons had ever had so difficult a task as Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury at Berlin. They had been met by an opposition of a most unworthy and plotting character, but were now on the verge of securing a peace which would increase our prosperity and prestige.—The Primitive Methodists, however, entertain a very different opinion, for at the final meeting of their Conference at Manchester on Saturday, they passed a resolution declaring that the preservation of this country from the calamity of unnecessary war is chiefly due to the enlightened and patriotic efforts of Mr. Gladstone, Lord Carnarvon, and Lord Derby.—At the annual meeting of the Women's Suffrage Society, Mr. Leonard Courtney, M.P., who presided, expressed his conviction that the Society would one day realise its object; Mrs. P. A. Taylor said that England's honour would not have suffered had an intelligent woman been sent to the Congress at Berlin instead of Lord Beaconsfield; and another speaker congratulated the members on the fact that during the last Parliamentary debate on the subject, though there were no new arguments nor even a new joke against the Bill, there were several new speakers in its favour, who made good speeches, which, however, were very badly reported in every paper she had seen.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The tropical weather of last week was followed in London on Sunday by a thunderstorm which, though not so violent as that of the previous Sunday, was sufficiently heavy to prevent any one from sneaking out of church before the sermons were over, and thus avoiding the collections on behalf of Metropolitan Hospital Fund. In many parts of the country the rain and lightning did great damage to buildings, railways, cattle, and crops.—Another unsuccessful attempt has been made to raise the Eurydice, the operations having to be suddenly abandoned on Tuesday owing to the snapping of a cable, an accident which resulted from the heavy weather, and which rendered the preliminary labour of some weeks absolutely useless. The wreck has now sunk nine or ten feet in the clayey bottom, and it is more than ever doubtful whether it can ever be raised.—On Wednesday, the Prince and Princess of Wales attended the opening of the Midland Counties Art Museum, which has been established in Nottingham Castle. Their Royal Highnesses, who were the guests of the Duke of St. Albans's at Bestwood, drove thence to the city, where they were received by the Corporation and the Lord Lieutenant of the county, and were conducted in procession through the streets which were gaily decorated, and lined with volunteers, yeomanry, and regular soldiers. About 17,000 Sunday School children, who were assembled at one point on the route, sang "God Bless the Prince of Wales" as the cortège went by.—The annual dinner of the General Theatrical Fund was held at the Freemasons' Tavern on Tuesday. Mr. Toole, the popular comedian, was in the chair, and the donations to the Fund amounted to over 900*l.*, including 100*l.* from Her Majesty the Queen.—Mr. Lucraft objects to the annual drill inspections of the School Board children, because of the expense and because "they lead to jingoism," and at his suggestion they are to be discontinued.—The Arethusa and Chichester training ships were on Wednesday inspected by the Earl of Shaftesbury and a large company of ladies and gentlemen; and prizes were presented to the successful boys. Mr. Hubbard, the chairman of the committee, said that they had now some difficulty in getting boys shipped for sea, as shipowners were returning to the old practice of demanding a premium.—The funeral of the late Mr. Charles Mathews, on Saturday last, at Kensal Green Cemetery, attracted a large crowd of sympathising spectators, amongst whom were a great many members of the theatrical profession.—Mrs. Clara L. Balfour, the well-known authoress and temperance lecturer, died on Wednesday at Croydon in her seventieth year.

BLACK AND WHITE EXHIBITION,
DUDLEY GALLERY

THE sixth Exhibition in Black and White is in some of its branches—etching, in particular—rather above its predecessors; in others, very much on the same level. There is less than usual of the work done for illustrated journalism; and we should not be disposed to regret this, provided better material were forthcoming to fill its place. As it is, illustrated art is chiefly represented by many clever original drawings, made for Punch by Tenniel, C. Keene, Du Maurier, Sambourne, and a new contributor, Chantrey Corbould. These drawings have an interest of their own for close observers, as showing how many delicate touches are lost in even the most skilful wood-cutting, when it has to be done against time, and by many hands working on parts of the same block.

By the side of these drawings we should have been glad to see, as we have seen in former years, more of the clever work done for our own columns by such artists as Herkomer, Mrs. Allingham, Gregory, Small, Fildes, Nash, and others, whose real school has been the illustrated journal.

It is remarkable that the highest honours of English painting at the Paris Exhibition have been won by a pupil of this school, who has thus, by the award of a jury of leading painters of all nations, been raised over the heads of Academicians and Associates, of whose honours he has not, at home, been yet deemed worthy. I refer to Mr. Herkomer, whose "Last Muster" has attracted more attention and admiration at Paris, from foreign painters and public alike, than any other picture of the English collection, and has been one of the two honoured with "grandes medailles" awarded to English painters, the other going to Mr. Millais. There is but one pair of drawings by Mr. Herkomer in the Black and White Exhibition, companions, with the title, "Storm and Calm," two rather slight figures in sepia with a curious absence of any such contrast of character as is suggested by the names. Besides these, Mr. Herkomer sends a whole series of slight but spirited figures of Bavarian peasantry, executed by Maclure and Macdonald's autographic process, having very much the effect of etchings; and two remarkable examples of bold and effective work in dry point, are (219) on an unusually large scale, of a Country Lass, which I should rank among the most noticeable things in the Exhibition for force of handling, without sacrifice of delicacy or beauty. English artists, for the most part, do so little in the way of finished studies in black and white that the examples in this kind here from Mr. Poynter's preliminary work for his "Atalanta" have an exceptional interest as giving students some insight into the actual preparatory labour of a living artist. One can only regret there is so little of this class of work shown here, or, I fear, done elsewhere.

I do not know if Mr. Powell's charming charcoal drawing of "Loch Fyne Herring-boats" (111), on smooth water, under a soft, grey, misty effect, be a study for a drawing in colour, or a substitute for one. It has for me very much of the delightfulness of one of the painter's best drawings, and, indeed, seems hardly to ask for colour. But if one wants to see how far Black and White, dexterously and judiciously employed, can fill the place of colour in a certain class of subjects, we have only to go to the charcoal drawings of Léon L'Hermitte, far and away the most skilful, strong, truthful, and effective work in this Exhibition. Three of his drawings in particular, "La Visite au Cimetière" (98), Breton peasant women saying their prayers at the graves of their dead on their great festival, the Jour des Morts; "La Chapelle de Pont-Christ," the interior of a chapel in Brittany, with the rude decoration in carved figures and altar furniture, which imparts such a picturesque effect to the country chapels of that country, a pries officiating, and a few absorbed worshippers; and "A Street at Landerneau" (72), seem to me to reach the ne plus ultra of excellence in their material. I seem to feel no want of colour in them, dealing as they do chiefly with subjects depending for due effect on black and white and their gradations. When the artist comes to deal with a spring orchard and trees in blossom, I see the limitation of his means, and I understand how important is the choice of subject as an element in the success of a charcoal drawing. A large drawing by Aumonier of a Norfolk broad, with a flight of gulls, is little inferior in effect to L'Hermitte's work. Achille Dien's charcoal landscapes also are among the noticeably good work here. It is evident, indeed, that the French are for the present greater masters of fusain than our own artists. For skill in handling his material, and that delightfulness of result which consummate dexterity gives, there is no drawing here so remarkable as a low-tide shore by Allongé (305). But here again, comparison of this most exquisite drawing with (307), "A Fountain in the Vosges," from the same hand, hung close beside it, shows how much success depends on subject. The second drawing hardly tells at all.

There is little work with even the slightest pretension to Academic quality. A large composition of many small figures grouped as in a Roman feast, with the title "The Banquet of Life," by E. J. Ellis, is the most ambitious design in this way, showing clever draughtsmanship, great pains, and carefully studied arrangement. But the smallness of scale and lack of colour together deprive the design, as we see it here, of its decorative effect; while it is practically impossible to decipher the meaning of such a mass of small figures. Thus the conscientious labour evidently put into the work is, it is to be feared, most of it wasted, except as far as the artist himself may have benefited by it.

Other work of Academic aim or pretension are the drawing by W. C. Thomas, "Watching Angels" (523); the studies bearing the name of W. Britten, a full-length of a Pompeian lady dressing in a bath (78); and figures for a picture called "The Stranded Raft." But neither in these, nor in Mr. G. M'Culloch's not at first sight intelligible "Sound of the Sea" (312), and his larger composition "The Sirens" (545); nor in Mr. W. Crane's allegorical group, "Peace or War: Britannia's Dream, 1878" can I find anything of a quality to divide my interest with the more naturalistic work of L'Hermitte and those who, like him, are content with the life about them for materials. How readily in a rightly-tuned imagination this may be turned to poetic use, we have here an illustration in Mrs. Allingham's "Harvest Moon" (460).

Joseph Knight's work has a solemnity and breadth that fits it well for rendering in Black and White. Here is a good example, "O'er the Moor" (57).

Another very tenderly felt and impressive charcoal study is A. Severn's "Moonlight on Coniston Water."

There are some few noteworthy heads, among them a refined chalk portrait of Octavia Hill, by Clifford, and a thoughtful head in charcoal of her brother, Dr. Hill (late of Bruce Castle), by Ellen G. Hill; and some severe portrait studies in red chalk, by A. Ward; some interesting drawings for pictures, highly finished, one by H. S. Marks, of his group of Marabout cranes, christened "Convocation," in this year's Academy; a delicate pencil study, by Mrs. Staples, for her pretty and pathetic group—so full of motherly and womanly expression—"Baby's Better;" several sheets of slight but suggestive studies in Indian ink for cattle and hunting subjects, by Frederick Tayler. But in no department of Black and White work is the Exhibition this year so rich as in etchings. Besides excellent examples of most of our English etchers—with the large exception of Seymour Häden—foreign etching is well represented by the able hands of Rajon, Détaille, Buhot, Tissot, Appian, Ballin, Bastien Le Page, Worms, Victor L'Huillier, A. Garnier, Desboutins, Luminais, Casanova, and others; while the credit of our own daily increasing etching school is well sustained by Bradley, Evershed, Slocombe, Rupert, C. S. Watson, Macbeth, Burgess, E. George, and others, and, above all, by a series of the later works of that most honest and enthusiastic of workers with the etching-needle, Edwin Edwards, a rare monument of study, skill, and well-directed labour, comprising some thirty-six examples, being, in fact, the same series as the French Department of Fine Arts has already acquired for the National Collection.

Besides the etchings, a very notable feature of the Exhibition are the very spirited drawings of animals, especially Heywood Hardy's "Lioness and Cubs" (140), Goddard's "Tigers" (346), J. Charlton's "Fighting Dogs—Caught" (92), and "The Stirrup Cup" (452), Van Marcke's studies of cattle, and Rischgitz's compositions of grouse, partridges, and wild fowl, in act of flight, with appropriate landscape accompaniments, most delicately and skilfully worked out in charcoal. PARLIAMENT

A GREAT deal has been written to the detriment of Irish members, but after a fortnight's experience of the House of Commons with the Irish element almost absolutely eliminated it must be frankly admitted that without Irish members, and in the absence of Mr. Disraeli, the House of Commons becomes almost unendurable. For a fortnight we have heard nothing more exciting than the Cattle Plague Bill, varied by occasional introductions of the Scotch Roads and Bridges Bill, and tempered by exhilarating moments passed in discussion on the Highways Bill. Lord Beaconsfield, when he was yet Mr. Disraeli, once twitted Mr. Gladstone with the necessity of remembering that the Imperial Legislature was something more than a Local Vestry. If

Mr. Gladstone were given to retorts of that kind he might now turn the tables with great success upon his ancient adversary. No one can remember when there was a time during which for so prolonged a period the House of Commons presented the appearance, if not of a Vestry at least of a Highway Board. By common consent the Eastern Question is shelved in both Houses of Parliament. Temporary relief for over-charged feelings is occasionally sought in reference to explosions in Crete and clerkly indiscretions of the Foreign Office. But these are poor dishes for an assembly that has had its appetite satiated with great battles at the foot of the Balkans, and with rumours of dissensions in the Cabinet.

There remains then nothing to do but to sit down steadily before the homely dishes provided by the Home Secretary and the President of the Local Government Board, and to leave the fireworks till Lord Beaconsfield comes home. The abstention of the Irish members at such a juncture is timed with a precision that gives currency to the melancholy joke that they deliberately refrain from catching the Speaker's eye in order that the House of Commons may behold the depths of dulness it will reach when Ireland has its own again, and the Home Rule Parliament is established on College Green. Of course, the real reason of this unwonted and by no means brilliant flash of silence on the part of the Home Rulers is that they have been mollified by the introduction of the Intermediate Education Bill. The effect of this measure has been astounding, and no one is more astonished than Her Majesty's Government. Without dissent the Irish members have approved the Bill, and Mr. Butt is quite enthusiastic in his commendation. The letter of the hon. and learned gentleman published in the Irish papers has naturally created some reaction, and signs of contumacy were shown by Mr. Parnell and his immediate associates, who strongly resent the formal admission that after all some good may come out of Westminster. But this counter demonstration was nipped in the bud by the arrival of Apostolic Letters from Ireland, in which the heads of the Church there warmly commended the Bill, and impressed upon the Irish representatives the necessity of doing nothing to endanger its becoming law. This settled the matter. An Anglo-Hibernian Agreement has been drawn up between Sir Stafford Northcote and the Schouvaloff of the Obstructionists, the practical issue of which will be that the Government will press forward without delay the Intermediate Education Bill, and in the mean time the Obstructionists will retire to seek the rest they have so abundantly earned. But they trust nothing to a Saxon Government, and there is a special stipulation in the Agreement that the votes in Supply relating to Queen's Colleges shall not be brought forward till after the Intermediate Education Bill has passed through the Commons. Thus if things go wrong there will be an opportunity of making things cheerful for the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the last weeks of the Session.

This is something to look forward to. In the meantime there is the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act Amendment Bill, the Scotch Roads and Bridges Bill, and the Highways Bill. The former was read a second time after a Debate which lasted into the small hours of Tuesday morning. About eleven o'clock on Monday night Sir William Harcourt had risen, his interposition being welcomed as appearing to promise a variation of the unspeakable dulness of the evening. But the prevalent spirit was too strong even for the vivacity of Sir William Harcourt. His speech was as dull as other people's, save for one touch, which should be ever gratefully remembered as causing the unwonted sound of laughter to be heard in the House. Like everybody else, Her Majesty's Ministers had fled during the discussion, and Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson, who rather enjoys this sort of debate, had been left in sole charge of the Treasury Bench almost throughout the whole of the sitting. Sir William Harcourt himself had come in only just in time to make his speech, and reproaches for absence during the sitting came with a peculiarly ill grace from him. But he is not a gentleman to be deterred by circumstances from having his joke, and so, commenting on the solitary position of the Secretary to the Treasury, he observed it would seem that the Treasury Bench had been declared an infected place, and that Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson had been isolated within the meaning of the Act.

The temporary elation of spirits occasioned by this joke was damped when Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson rose to reply. It was after midnight when he rose. Everybody was wearied to death of the whole business, and was waiting for the division, so that they might get out to the fresh air. But the occasion was a great one for the Secretary to the Treasury. He was in charge of a most important Bill, and he felt, or thought he felt, the necessity for answering the arguments that had been advanced through the debate that had lasted for three mortal sittings. But the House showed such manifest tokens of weariness, that he was compelled to condense into half an hour the remainder of his observations, which, fully delivered, would have pleasantly wiled the time away till Wednesday morning. On a division, the second reading was agreed to by 319 votes against 162.

On Tuesday, the Roads and Bridges Bill at the morning sitting; on Tuesday night, the question of Poor Law Removal, elucidated by the eloquence of Mr. M'Carthy Downing; and on Wednesday, the Habitual Drunkards Bill, preceded by the Church Rates (Scotland) Bill; the remainder of the week filled up with more Cattle Plague Bill and succeeding Bills—these go to make up the programme of the week's work in Parliament.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——A fair share of patronage was given to the Border meeting at Carlisle, but this is just the time when the aristocratic patrons of the Turf do not care to travel so far from London. The Cumberland Plate, like the Northumberland last week, seems to be going down hill, only six horses coming to the post. There was a rattling finish between Mrs. Pond and Constantine, the former winning by a head, and the latter reversing last week's form, as Jagellon could only get third. Strathcarron, a shapely filly, daughter of Strathconan and Vimeira, made amends for some previous defeats by winning the Carlisle Stakes for two year olds.—Some pleasant sport was brought off at Odiham, the chief handicap falling to The Reeve. In this and in the Manor Plate, Captain Machell's new purchase, Pardon, showed that after the many well-fought contests he has engaged in this year he wants rest. The Ashdown Two Year Old Plate, at the pleasant little gathering at Lambourne, was won by Tares, of the Wild Oats stock, the Lambourne Plate by the highly bred Centenary, and the Cup by Kaleidoscope, who continues to do good service for the Master of Russley.—The Bibury Club provided a fair afternoon's sport at Stockbridge on Wednesday. Shoestring, a not unhappily named daughter of the Knight of the Garter and Bowstring, secured the Maiden Plate for Lord Calthorpe; Elf King upset the odds laid on the Saratoga Colt in the Champagne Stakes; Confessor scored the Handicap Sweepstakes for the veteran John Day; and in the Twentieth Biennial another "odds on" favourite, the Duke of Hamilton's Mellon, could only get third to Mr. Gosden's Scapegrace.—The St. Leger market indicates the very general opinion that the race as yet is remarkably open. Insulaire still heads the list, and Beauclere stands second; but between now and September we shall probably see most of the favourites perform in public.

CRICKET.——Hertfordshire and Essex, which counties seem to be struggling to come to the fore, have played a match at Bishop's Stortford, victory resting with Herts.—Notts has had to put up with a one-innings defeat at the hands of Yorkshire, the 419 score of the Northern county being the highest, we believe, made for many years past in an inter-county match. Of this Ulyett, who is in specially good form this year, made 94, and W. Bates 102.—Yorkshire has also another victory to be recorded, having beaten the Australian team at Bramall Lane, Sheffield, by no less than nine wickets.—Kent still fights on unsuccessfully, Sussex having beaten the home county by 56 runs in a well-contested match at Brighton.—After a series of annual defeats, which have extended through the greater part of the present decade, Winchester has beaten Eton. Of the forty-nine matches played between the two schools, Eton has won thirty-two and Winchester fifteen, one match was a tie, and one left unfinished.—In a drawn match between Edinburgh and Glasgow, Dr. J. M. Cotterill, the famous Sussex bat, made 271 for the former, and the whole eleven 692—the highest total, we believe, ever made in an innings.—Of course the great match of the week has been that between the Universities at Lord's on Monday and Tuesday. The universal opinion was in favour of Cambridge; but in the first innings Oxford made a better fight than was expected, scoring 127 against the 168 of Cambridge. Cambridge then put on 229, Mr. Lucas contributing 74 and the Hon. A. Lyttelton 64; and, even with the large number required to win, there were some partisans of the Dark Blues who hoped against hope. But a more utter collapse of an eleven of picked cricketers has hardly ever been witnessed, the whole going down for the miserable pittance of 32 runs. Mr. A. G. Steel's bowling for Cambridge was superb. In the second innings he bowled fourteen maiden overs out of twenty, and he took five wickets, only 14 runs being made. Mr. C. W. M. Kemp did some smart fielding for Oxford, catching out three of the Cambridge men. The crowd at Lord's showed an increase even over that of last year, about 15,000 spectators being present.

AQUATICS.—News has come that Hanlan, of Toronto, has won the International Sculling Race at Brockville, Ontario, Plaisted, of New York, being second.—The proprietors of the Sportsman have offered a Challenge Cup and 200*l.* in money for competition among the professional scullers of England.

LAWN TENNIS.——Votaries of this game will be glad to hear that Messrs. Jaques and Son, of Hatton Garden, have patented a really serviceable lawn tennis marker. A small tank filled with whitening and water is propelled on a couple of wheels driven by a handle, and the "dodge" of the invention is that the stuff only oozes out, making a strong white line, when the machine is in motion, so that there is no splashing or mess. This is managed by the wheel being supplied with whitening from a feeder dipping into the tank.

LONDON MORTALITY increased considerably last week owing to the exceedingly high temperature, and 1,570 deaths were registered against 1,391 during the previous week, an increase of 179, being 208 above the average, and at the rate of 22·9 per 1,000. Deaths from small-pox numbered 38 (an increase of 19), from diarrhœa 72 (an increase of 49, including 54 infants under one year of age), 24 from measles (an increase of 7), 23 from scarlet fever (an increase of 6), 7 from diphtheria (a decline of 5), 97 from whooping-cough (a decrease of 11), 19 from different forms of fever, and 3 from sunstroke. There were 2,266 births registered against 2,625 during the previous week, being 72 below the average. The mean temperature was 70·7 deg., or 9·6 deg. above the average in the corresponding week of the sixty years, 1814-73. The week was the hottest in London since that ending August 19th, 1876. The duration of sunshine during the week was 73·9 hours, the sun being 115·8 hours above the horizon.

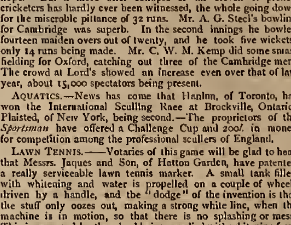
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

JUNE 27TH TO JULY 3RD (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.——The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——The diagram for the week ending Wednesday, 3rd inst., exhibits some very striking changes of weather. The period opened with light southerly winds and very high temperatures; but towards the latter part of Thursday, 27th ult., the wind shifted to south-east, and although the sky remained clear, the weather soon became perceptibly cooler. On Sunday, 30th ult., a thunderstorm with heavy rain again visited the metropolis, and in the evening of that day the thermometer began to fall still more quickly, while the wind shifted round to north-east. Since that time the winds have remained in a northerly or north-easterly quarter, and the weather having at the same time been generally cloudy, very low temperatures have been registered. The maximum reached on Tuesday, 2nd inst., was 30° lower than that observed on Thursday, 27th ult., and five degrees lower than the minimum recorded on the morning of the same day. Some rain has fallen during the past three days, but the amounts measured have not been large. The barometer was highest (30·16 in.) on Thursday, 27th ult.; lowest (29·80 in.) on Saturday, 29th ult.; range, 0·36 in. The temperature was highest (89°) on Thursday, 27th ult.: lowest (51°) on Wednesday 3rd inst.; range, 38°. Rain fell on four days; total amount, 1·16 in.; greatest fall on any one day, 0·98 in., on Sunday, 30th ult.

AN OFFICIAL PAINTING OF A SITTING OF THE CONGRESS has been ordered by the Berlin Municipality, and the commission has been entrusted at a cost of 3,000*l.* to Herr Anton von Werner.

CLESINGER'S STATUE OF THE REPUBLIC, which was unveiled at the Paris Exhibition on Sunday, represents France seated, with the physiognomy of a Roman matron, and with a head-dress a species of compromise between a helmet and a Phrygian cap. The right hand holds a sword, while the left rests on a tablet on which is inscribed, "République Française, Constitution, 25 Fevrier, 1875."

A REMARKABLE PEDESTRIAN FEAT has been undertaken by a Cincinnati diver, who proposes to walk under water along the bottom of the Ohio River, from Cincinnati to Cairo, a distance of about 500 miles, in 25 days, for a wager for 2,000*l.* He stipulates that a boat is to accompany him with an air pump, in order to supply him with air, and moreover that he is to be allowed to come up to the surface as often as he pleases, but that the boat is to be stopped whenever he does so, in order that he shall walk every step of the way.

AN UNUSUAL PROPORTION OF BRITISH DOCTORS AND NURSES have fallen victims to their zeal in the cause of humanity, owing to the recent campaign in Turkey. The Stafford House Committee employed 35 doctors, 11 of whom were dangerously ill and 2 died. The Red Crescent employed 45, of whom 14 were dangerously ill, and 7 died. The Red Cross employed 14, of whom 3 were severely ill, and 1 died. The Turkish Compassionate Fund employed 11, of whom 3 were dangerously ill. The Charity Sisters employed 40, of whom 27 were ill and 13 died. Total employed, 145; severely ill, 58; 23 died.

A NEW FLAG, according to the Paris Figaro, is about to be used in the French Army. The blue staff of the flag is surmounted by a rectangular scroll resembling that which served as a pedestal to the Roman eagles. On one side of the scroll is the number of regiment, and on the other the letters R.F. (République Française). This scroll is surmounted by an upright golden crown of laurel leaves through which passes a spear head. The flag itself is of silk, edged with gold fringe instead of the modest woollen material at present in use. A change is also being made in the uniform of the French troops. The tunic will be replaced by a pelisse or loose jacket similar to that worn at the present time by artillerymen, and which will now be adopted by both infantry and cavalry. Epaulettes are to be replaced by clover-shaped shoulder tabs of coloured wool for non-commissioned officers and privates, and in gold or silver for officers.

SWIMMING FOR GIRLS is strenuously advocated in a letter in The Times from Mr. John Macgregor (of the London Schools Swimming Club, School Board for London, Victoria Embankment). He states that hundreds of girls are learning to swim, and affirms that many hundred more would gladly learn if teachers could be had. As a proof of this Mr. Macgregor asserts that last year a class for thirty girls was begun late in the season, yet 25 of these were taught to swim in six lessons, and six of them won prizes. At present only five of the public baths are available for girls and female school teachers, but we sincerely hope that public attention may be drawn to this movement, which promises to be one of great benefit to the community at large, for, apart from all other considerations, it may be said, as Mr. Macgregor concludes, "Mothers and sisters who can swim will not let their boys be unwashed when on land or drowned when in the water."

AN EXHIBITION OF FANS was opened last Tuesday at Drapers' Hall, containing 1,259 specimens, valued at about 15,000*l.* One of the most valuable exhibits is Queen Anne's fan, and also a curious fan, painted by an Italian on chicken skin, with a little watch in the handle. There are also two or three peculiarly small hand-tablets, fashionable under the First Empire, still glistening with the inimitable glaze called vernis-Martin after the artist, whose secret died with him. There is one fan in the collection to which a singular legend is attached. The blades are strangely and unusually shaped, like the wooden beaters with which French laundresses sometimes kneaded the clothes they washed. The style is that of Louis XV., when the ladies of the Court, to show their distaste for the vulgar upstart Dubarry, are said to have had their fans so made that, without any open affront, they could remind her of her early life among the soap-suds. There is the jewelled fan presented by the Maharajah Dhuleep Sing to the Princess Alice, which is composed entirely of emeralds, rubies, and pearls, from the collection of Runjeet Singh, of Lahore, and also an old French fan, possibly the gem of the collection, belonging to Lady Musgrave, having been in the Musgrave family for a century, and representing a scene from the Æneid. Altogether, the Exhibition is well worth a visit, particularly from our lady readers.

THAT ACTORS have been frequently considered as public property even in their private life is a frequent complaint of the profession, and is not inaptly illustrated by a story told by the San Francisco Chronicle of Mr. Jefferson, the well-known Rip Van Winkle:—"The other morning, as Mr. Jefferson was coming from rehearsal, he was stopped suddenly by a gentleman, evidently just from Marysville, who was accompanied by his wife and some six or eight children. 'Are you Rip Van Winkle, mister?' Mr. J. J. admitted the fact. 'Well, I'm dern glad to hear it. You see, I was just trying to tell Maria and the children how all-fired elegant you acted last night. I'd take the hull bilin' on 'em this evening, but you see, Johnny's caught the mumps, and we're got to leave on the 4.40.' Not having anything else to say, Mr. Jefferson replied 'Indeed!' 'Yes, I was trying to show 'em how you told that story about your wife getting upset in the river. Couldn't you jest sit down on this fire plug and show Maria how you did it?' 'I think not,' responded the first actor of his day, icily. 'Don't see why you won't show the children. I allurs patronize the theater when I come up to sell hay. By the way, I was trying to catch the step when you dance with the girls in the first act. Come now, just walk into this fruit-store, that's a good fellow, and do it once or twice for me, won't you? It'll tickle the folks down our way most to death.' Jefferson says he intends to go armed after this." Talking of Mr. Jefferson, there is a popular story abroad that he declines to visit the Catskills, because the mountains there are not "set" as he has been accustomed to have them at Booth's, and the people who live near there have not the "common decency to haul them around into shape."

AMONGST ALIENS

By FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE

AUTHOR OF "A CHARMING FELLOW," "AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE," "BLACK SPIRITS AND WHITE," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

It seemed to have grown dark suddenly. I had had my eyes fixed on the glory of the sunset. The glow of crimson and purple and gold had died away behind the black dome of St. Peter's, and was succeeded by a long streak of orange colour, clear, intense, and solemn. One star glittered steel-bright above it, and the edges of the distant horizon were dim and vaporous. The profoundly pathetic beauty of those winter sunsets from the Pincian always moved me like a poem or a strain of solemn music. Every common street sound seemed to jar importunately with the serenity of the wondrous sky and the mournful stillness of the landscape beneath it. I had a feeling that the world ought to pause in its noisy whirl and be silent before that sunset. The air seemed to be vibrating with memories of the awful past, and that orange streak in the west to be intense with a mysterious meaning.

I had gazed at it until my eyes were dazzled, and when I turned them downward to the earth, I found that it was dark. It had been raining but an hour ago, and the pools of water all along the straight line of the Via Condotti, where the street lamps glittered in two converging rows, reflected, here and there, the lingering lights in the sky, whilst the houses on either hand were in blackest shadow.

"It is late!" I exclaimed to myself, as I drew my shawl closer against the chill evening air. "I must make haste home, or Lucy will be uneasy."

"Home" was not far distant. We lived in a street running steeply uphill from the Via Sistina, in a little lodging on the topmost story. That was all the better in Rome, they said; one was out of the malaria. I did not much concern myself with fears of the malaria (though, indeed, for Lucy's sake, it was well to take what precautions we could; Lucy was not so hardy as I), but the topmost story suited us in various ways. In the first place it suited our purses, which were slender. Then we had, from one window of our sitting-room, a glimpse across the house-tops of the distant Campagna, and nearly an hour more daylight than our neighbours on the lower floors. I climbed quickly up the long steep stairs, and opened our door with my key. Contrary to my expectation there was no light in the room which served us for drawing-room, study, boudoir, and dining-room, all in one. Lucy had not yet come home, then. A few logs smouldered in the open stove, as I had left them, and the lamp stood ready on the table. I struck a light and fastened the shutters, and blew at the smouldering wood until it blazed cheerfully. It made the shabby room look so pleasant and home-like, that I said aloud, although I was quite alone, "How I wish Lucy would come home and enjoy it!"

Then I sat down to finish a little study in black and white that I had been making from a plaster cast. I had my work all ready laid out on the table before me, and began to draw. In those days I never knew how time went when once I had my pencil in my hand; and, indeed, it is much the same with me now. I went on working until I was roused by a violent gust of wind which made the windows rattle. Windows rattle easily in Rome, where the panes of glass are generally loosely fixed into the wooden frames, and where wood-work as a rule is made in a crazy, clumsy fashion. But this was a really strong blast of wind. I heard it howl and moan as it swept round the corner of our street. Some drops of rain, too, struck against the glass. The thought that Lucy was out in such wild weather, whilst I was warm indoors, made me shudder sympathetically. I looked at my watch, and was startled to find that it marked a quarter-past six o'clock. I had been drawing for more than an hour, and Lucy not yet returned! She ought to have been at home long ago. The Palazzo Corleoni, where she went to give lessons in English, was down in the more central part of Rome, near the great church of the Gesù. But that was no distance for a good walker with young, active limbs, like Lucy. Besides, she had never been so late before. I was uneasy. It was in vain that I held my crayon firmly and continued to stare at my plaster model. The lines would not come rightly. My head was anxious and preoccupied, and refused to guide my blundering hand. I threw down the bit of black chalk impatiently.

At that moment the crack-voiced bell began to tinkle, and I ran to open the door, and there stood Lucy with her little gauze veil clinging to her face with moisture, and drops of rain glistening on her cloak. I unclasped the cloak from her shoulders as she stood, and shook it, and then drew her into the sitting-room.

"What a nice fire you have," she said in her fresh, clear voice. "I'm a little late, am I not, Catherine?"

A lump came up into my throat, and I felt angry at the same time. It hurt me to find her so easy and unconcerned, and talking so carelessly of being "a little late," when I had been suffering real pangs of anxiety about her. Yes; I had been frightened; and I only knew how oppressive the vague thronging fears had been, when I saw her standing safe before me.

"A little late," I answered drily; and bade her sit down by the fire and unlace her wet boots at once, whilst I went back to my drawing. But the pencil would not obey me even now. I felt the tremor of one who is suddenly made aware of a horrible danger escaped. What if Lucy had not come home safe! The thought made my heart sick. I conjured up all sorts of catastrophes which might have befallen her, furtively watching her from my place as she sat in the shine of the fire. Her hair had got loose, and fell in wavy curly locks on to one shoulder; and there were raindrops glistening on its clear soft brown. She had very pretty hair: hair of that rare kind which looks picturesque in disorder. Her cheeks and her delicate little nose were pink with the cold, and her pretty small hands were red and numbed, as she sat fumbling with chill fingers at the damp boot-lace. She seemed almost the same little Lucy who used to come to me for help in her struggles with rebellious buttons and complicated strings, in our nursery days. And all at once she lifted up her blue eyes with the very same innocent helpless look I remembered in them when she was three years old, and said, "I'm afraid I can't undo it, Catherine. My fingers are so cold."

I knelt down before her and unfastened the damp boots, and drew them off and her stockings too, and rubbed her feet with a dry towel.

"Thank you, Catherine dear," she said; "but it is a shame that you should do that. I can manage now by myself."

Then finding that I went on chafing her cold little feet, without making her any answer, she said timidly, "You ain't vexed with me about anything, are you, Catty dear?"

"I am vexed with myself for having been so foolish as to be frightened," said I, speaking very curtly, and keeping my head bent down.

"Frightened? Why? About me?"

"You are not usually an hour late; and when one is alone one gets nervous and fanciful, I suppose."

"An hour late! Oh, you must be mistaken, Catherine. They did keep me a little, but not so long as that. It's impossible."

I held up my watch, and she looked at it in amazement. "Oh my poor Catherine!" she exclaimed, putting her arms round my neck, and her soft cheek against mine, "how sorry I am! I know how frightened I should be if you did not come home punctually;—only you are always punctual."

I kissed her without letting her find out that there were tears in my eyes. I could not give any good reason to myself for their being there. But I had felt an unusual sense of melancholy and apprehension on me all the evening. The very sunset had seemed more intensely sad than usual; and to me its beauty is always sad. But such waves of emotion, if they cannot be altogether resisted, are best borne in silence. I hold my breath and keep still, and the tide flows over me and passes away.

Lucy brightened up immediately when I kissed her. Her affectionate nature could not endure that there should be a cloud between us. And indeed there had never come a cloud that a word could not dispel.

"And did you work late at the studio?" she asked. "And was old Signor Sandro very cross?"

"Yes; and no."

"No? I believe he is always cross! He would frighten me to death. But you have more courage. Oh how beautifully you are finishing this chalk study."

And so she chatted on whilst I filled the little tin tea-kettle with water, and set it on the fire to boil, and got the tea things ready. We allowed ourselves the luxury of tea in an evening. It reminded us of England, and that perhaps was the chief reason why I liked it.

"And now, Lucy," said I, when we were seated at the table, "now that you are thawed you must tell me what made you so late. It must not happen again, my child. I don't like your being out in the streets so late alone."

"I am not afraid, Catherine."

"That is not the whole question."

"And besides, you often are out by yourself later than this. Don't you remember when I had the sore throat, how you went all the way to the chemist's close to the Popolo, and it was nearly ten o'clock, and you said——"

"That's very different, Lucy."

"Why?"

"Because—— a young girl alone in the streets might be molested, or at least annoyed."

"And what are you then, Catty? An old woman? One would think you were eighty to hear you talk! But after all you are only six years older than I am."

"Never mind all that now, Lucy. We will finish that discussion another time. You have not answered my question as to how it came to pass that you are so late."

"Oh, they kept me at Palazzo Corleoni. I mean they asked me to stay a little while."

"I think the Princess ought to know better. I am sure you well earn your poor little pay in an hour. It is too bad to ask for more work out of you, Lucy."

"Oh, it wasn't the Princess. Besides I don't grudge a little extra time, dear."

"Not the Princess? Who was it, then?"

"It was Donna Laura and her brother."

"What had he to do with it?"

"Oh, he came in with a copy of a letter that he wanted translated into English, and Donna Laura said would I help her, just to oblige her brother. And I said yes."

"What was the letter about?"

"Merely a business letter, about sending a horse he has bought—Don Vittorio has bought—from England. I didn't mind doing it at all, Catherine dear."

I did not like the proceeding at all; and I said so. They were not above asking a favour, these great people, although their supercilious manner was incessantly reminding us that between the noble and princely House of Corleoni and two obscure English girls who were trying to earn a living, there was a great gulf fixed. Be it so. For my part I felt no yearning to bridge over the gulf, having my own opinion as to which side of it was the preferable one. But I did not approve of these new advances on the part of Donna Laura's brother. I could not help suspecting that he might have managed to get his letter translated without having recourse to his sister's English teacher, had he chosen to do so. I sat thinking, and, I suppose, frowning over my thoughts, for Lucy said, "I am sorry you are displeased, dear. And you look so stern that I am almost afraid to give you Donna Laura's message."

"A message for me? More innovations!"

"She sent you her compliments, and asked if you would be so very kind as to go to the Palazzo with me next Wednesday to look at some drawings of hers. And I—I think she wants you to do some for her."

"I should like to send word back that I only work for love or money, and therefore am obliged to refuse my services to Donna Laura de' Principi Bastiani-Corleoni.'"

"Oh, you wouldn't do that, Catherine?"

"No. But I should enjoy it. However, I cannot afford such luxuries as that. What is it all about? Do you know? If so, give me a full account, Lucy mine."

"Well,—if you won't mind my rambling a little,—because when my head is very full of different things, they never will come out exactly in order——"

"No, no. Ramble away, pussy dear."

Then she told me that there was to be a grand bazaar or fancy fair, in aid of a pious institution in which the ladies of the Roman aristocracy were interested. It was to be a very grand bazaar indeed. The Pope approved it, and had promised a silver vase as his contribution, which was to be raffled for. Cardinals and Monsignori smiled benevolently on the project. All the noble ladies—all those, that is to say, whose families held to the ancient régime, and were good Papalini, were working for it, and nobody who had even looked at the outside of the Quirinal since the year 1870 was to be allowed to have a hand in it on any pretence whatever. Among the chief promoters of it was the Princess Bastiani-Corleoni. She was to hold a stall with her eldest daughter Donna Laura. Donna Laura had some little reputation as an amateur artist, and her contributions to the stock in trade were to consist of water-colour sketches, painted fans and screens, and objects of that sort. I was wanted to assist in doing some of these things, and should, of course, be paid for my work. The "of course" was Lucy's. I did not feel sure that Donna Laura intended to pay me. But I was firmly resolved that I would make no pencil stroke without payment. I mused a little over the proposition.

"You will come, won't you, Catherine? For my sake. It would be so disagreeable for me to have to tell them that you refused."

"I will tell you what I'll do, Lucy; I will consult Signor Sandro, and if he says 'go,' I will go."

"Signor Sandro is sure to advise you not to go. I know he is."

"Why, pray?"

"Because he's so crabbed and cross. And besides he is a Red Republican, and he was exiled in the '48, and—and—I know he won't let you go."

I was a little surprised at Lucy's political information. But I let the subject drop then, and our talk drifted away to other things;—drifted to our childish days, as it so often did: to the pretty home in a suburb of a great English town where we had been born and bred: to the time when my father brought home a second wife, Lucy's mother, a gentle soft creature whom my brother and I were determined to hate before we saw her, and whom we adored and petted and ruled over before she had been a week in the house: to Lucy's self as a tiny blue-eyed baby, with the patientest, most plaintive little face, whom I held in my arms when I was little more than a baby myself. Her mother died when my half-sister was barely a twelvemonth old, and Lucy loved to hear me talk of the sweet dead mother whom she had no remembrance of. And now our father was dead too, and our only brother in South America fighting his way up in the world, and we two,—it seemed strange even after a twelvemonth, as we spoke of it,—were in Rome.

And then we talked of the future: how I was to paint a great picture which should take the world by storm, and be hung on the line at the Academy by unanimous acclamation of all the Hanging Committee the moment it was seen: and how I was to build the most artistic house that ever had been conceived, and fill it with beautiful old furniture and tapestry and china: and how my studio was to be besieged by eager buyers: and how I was never to accept a commission "even for hundreds of pounds," as Lucy said (her ideas of the value of money were very rudimentary in those days; and I believe a hundred pounds stood in her mind as an algebraic x, or symbol of an unknown quantity), unless I thoroughly liked the subject and felt it to be worthy of artistic treatment.

Generally Lucy's part in these prophetic visions was to marry somebody "very nice," and have a charming house near mine,—not too artistic; for Lucy had private objections to certain dull blues, and dingy greens, and tattered hangings which she had heard painters incomprehensibly admire,—and several lovely children whose portraits I was to paint. But to-night—I thought of it after she had gone to bed—she said no word as to her own future.

CHAPTER II.

Signor Sandro did not dissuade me from going to the Palazzo Corleoni. He smiled a little grimly when he heard of the works of art in preparation for the bazaar.

"I suppose you are to do the work, and the Principessina is to take all the praise," said he.

"I care nothing about the praise, master; but I cannot afford to work without pay. I might be studying, doing something to improve myself, instead of daubing banalities on pasteboard screens. And if I give up my time to Donna Laura, I must have some equivalent."

"You don't consider 'the honour' to be an equivalent?" asked Signor Sandro, looking over his maulstick at me with his grey bushy eyebrows drawn together.

"Not in the least. I think I understand pretty well what that honour is worth."

"I think you do, Caterina!" returned my master. And he took a pinch of snuff with a long-drawn sniff of satisfaction.

"I don't much like the Corleonis," said I. "They impose on Lucy. They pay her very poorly, and get more work out of her than is just. She is such a soft-hearted, grateful little creature that a kind word will make her do anything."

Signor Sandro shrugged his shoulders. "If you make yourself a sheep, the wolf will eat you," he answered drily. He was a good man; but he was not quite free from the national tendency to confound soft-heartedness with thick-headedness. He was theoretically intolerant, and contemptuous of people who allowed themselves to be imposed upon. But in practice he was the gentlest of beings; and little children tyrannised over him confidently.

We went on working in silence for a while, and then he said, "No; I see no reason why you should not go and earn a few francs at Palazzo Corleoni. The Princess is not a bad woman;—bigoted and prejudiced, but not a bad woman. I remember her very handsome, too, thirty years ago. They tell me she has taken to devotion in these days, but still,"—with a quaint apologetic inflection of voice, and with perfect seriousness,—"still I don't think she's a bad woman."

So I consented to go to the Palazzo Corleoni on the next Wednesday. I had been there once or twice before, to settle Lucy's engagement as English teacher. It is a splendid edifice, with a noble courtyard and staircase, all on the vast scale seen only in Rome. But it is chill and gloomy despite its grandeur. If one had to paint it, one would spread crimson cloth over the marble steps, and populate them with figures in picturesque mediæval costume, to give some idea of warmth and life. The withered old porter at the entrance, in his silver-laced livery and cocked hat, looked misanthropically out on to the street from under the cavernous archway. All the inmates of Palazzo Corleoni looked misanthropic when their eyes were turned towards the street. That was the tone of their party, the proper thing to do. The outer world was changed and abominable since the year 1870, and not to be contemplated without disgust. Even the great tortoiseshell cat, licking her whiskers in the midst of one small patch of sunshine in the courtyard, had a Tartuffian air of victimhood.

The Prince and Princess Bastiani-Corleoni did not occupy the whole of their huge palace, nor half, nor a quarter of it. The first floor was let to a foreign cardinal of great wealth, and the third to a rich American family, who paid highly for the privilege of putting the address of the Palazzo Corleoni on their visiting-cards. The Prince and Princess themselves inhabited a suite of rooms in the second story. This suite of rooms, however, ran along the whole front and one wing of the palace, and had as many cubic feet of space in it as would have furnished forth two or three London mansions. The Corleonis were not very rich in proportion to their rank, but they contrived to keep up a wonderful show of outward grandeur.

Lucy and I toiled up the long marble staircase to the second story; and, in answer to her modest little ring, were admitted into a large and lofty entrance hall, with great swinging leathern doors, such as you see in Continental churches. Gloom, cold, and ennui seemed to inhabit that entrance-hall. The marble pavement shot out icy gleams, here and there, in the subdued light. A vast carved settee of time-blackened walnut wood nearly filled one side of the hall, and on the other was an antique marble chimney-piece rising half way to the vaulted roof; but the hearth beneath it was walled up, and a brazier full of wood ashes set in the middle of the floor mocked numbed fingers and chill feet with a miserable pretence of warmth. Beyond the leather door at the further end of this vestibule there was an antechamber, carpeted and curtained, and therefore less inhuman in its aspect than the outer hall, but still bearing the impress of a formal rigidity devoid of all that goes to make up home. After that came a long suite of reception rooms, which the beneficent sun himself had touched with some genial kindness, and whose atmosphere, therefore, a little thawed one's spirits frozen by that terrible north-west passage through the hall and antechamber. But as for "home," these rooms, too, proclaimed their ignorance of that blessed word, in every fold of their stiff velvet draperies, in every glittering ray from their gilded picture-frames, in every line of their satin chairs and couches disposed at right angles with each other, and their ormolu tables unacquainted with books, and adorned chiefly with the tawdry, faded bonbonnières levied last New Year's Day by more or less voluntary contribution from the Princess's bachelor acquaintance. A grand pianoforte, left open in one corner of a huge, tasteless, gorgeous saloon, seemed to show its teeth at us. The whole atmosphere of the place depressed and chilled me, and I said as much to Lucy as we marched side by side through the rooms in the wake of the servant who was to announce us.

"O!" said she with a little look of surprise and disappointment, "I always think this suite is so splendid. And it is never very cold here, Catherine, so that must be your fancy. The sun shines on this side of the house all day long."

"Then it is the moral climate that does not agree with me."

"'Sh, dear. Here we are at the schoolroom."

We entered a room somewhat smaller than the others, but still of ample size, looking on to the courtyard. It had a few squares of common drugget disposed here and there on the brick floor, a horrible blue and yellow paper on the walls, and at one end a glazed book case filled with school books. On a large square table in the middle of the room stood a common office inkstand and a pounce-box, whose contents were spilt about over the green baize table-cover. There were also two or three exercise books, a dictionary, and a litter of papers. Such was the "still life" of the picture.

Two little girls,—with long growing limbs like young colts, sallow faces and soft dark eyes,—sat at the table engaged with their lessons. In the embrasure of one of the windows was set an easel, and in front of the easel stood Donna Laura Corleoni, the eldest daughter of the house. She was a handsome girl, with a fine rich tint in her cheeks like the tone of a damask rose, glossy dark hair, white teeth, and a pair of rather small, but very vivacious, black eyes. Her figure was singularly upright, and the carriage of her head in particular so erect, as to give her the air of perpetually looking over an invisible stiff cravat at one, which injured the grace of her appearance in my eyes.

She came forward and greeted us, speaking English with considerable fluency and perfect self-confidence. Her manner was not unpleasant, except for an odd strain in it which I find it difficult to describe, but which I felt distinctly: she spoke to me and looked at me with an undisguised frank air of examination, as who should say, "Now let me see what you are like!" but with no more apparent conception that she herself was exposed to an answering examination, than one might feel in contemplating some strange animal.

"These are my drawings, you see," she said. "But there is not time for me to finish all before the bazaar. I have still three screens and a box in carton which need to be painted, and these we must have by the end of the month. It is so important that mamma's stall be well filled, you know."

I could not perceive that it was of any importance to me whether the Princess's stall were full or empty; so I merely bowed my head and said nothing. Donna Laura looked at me with her quick black eyes as if she expected me to speak; but finding that I remained silent, she went on: "Well, you see what is to do, Meess Wilson. And for my own sketches, if you have some advice to give——"

This was rather an awkward question. There was ability in the young lady's work: a certain decision and sense of effect. Indeed, there was so much proof of ability, that the temptation passed through my mind to give her the sincerest advice I could, which would have been to throw all these things on the fire, lock up her colour-box for six months, and begin to study drawing seriously. But of course such an utterance on my part was out of the question. I limited myself to that portion of the matter which immediately concerned me, and answered, "I do not know whether you will think it worth while to employ me to paint these screens, Donna Laura. My time is of some value, and perhaps, as it is for a charity, you might prefer to get some friend to assist you who has leisure to do this sort of thing gratis."

Lucy coloured, and looked nervous at this plain speaking; but Donna Laura displayed no such sensitiveness.

She replied, "Oh, we would like that they should be very well done; because mamma's stall will be one of the best. You will talk with mamma by and by about the price. Now tell me, would you line this with red silk or blue silk?"

I drew nearer to the light, and was bending down my head to consider the point when I heard the door open and some one come into the room. Thinking it might be the Princess, I turned round to look, and saw Don Vittorio Corleoni.

I knew him well enough by sight. He was to be seen on the Pincian every afternoon at the fashionable hour in the fashionable season; and once or twice in the spring when I was making a study near the tomb of Cecilia Metella, I had seen him pass by on horseback. He rode well, and I had remarked him and his horse as a handsome pair of animals. He did not look quite so well off his horse as on it, for his legs—pitilessly displayed by the tight-fitting, fashionable trousers that he wore—appeared weak and "weedy," like the limbs of a ricketty child. But his face was undoubtedly very handsome. He had sharply-cut features, a clear pale skin, hair and whiskers arranged after the English fashion, and of that rich blonde hue which one sees in Venetian pictures, and a pair of eyes like sapphires. A very handsome face, in truth, but one which I disliked and mistrusted with an irresistible repulsion. The leading characteristic which stamped it was, I should say, a cruel, thin-lipped sort of sensuality. The forehead was rather weak, but not dull. What those sapphire-blue eyes did see, they saw clearly, microscopically,—accurately perceptive of the animalculæ in a glass of water, hopelessly blind to the stars. Let no one appeal to that face for sympathy with the higher sentiments!—it did not believe in their existence. But still, inasmuch as a sane human creature can scarcely exist without some grain of imagination, I discovered later that even Don Vittorio Corleoni possessed a small modicum of that faculty, and he expended it all on one object: the greatness and prosperity of the princely House of Bastiani-Corleoni. That was his ideal in life. Everything else that he recognised could be touched or tasted.

Donna Laura asked her brother what he wanted, with her brisk, martinet air, which contrasted oddly with his feline quietude of manner and soft drawling voice. What did he want? He wanted a letter deciphered and translated: another letter from the horse dealer in Yorkshire. Could Laura do it? If not, perhaps Meess Lucy would be kind enough?

"Meess Lucy" held out her hand for the letter with alacrity. "Oh I shall be very glad. It is no trouble at all," she murmured shyly. There was a tremulous smile on her lips, and a light in her innocent eyes, which gave me a dull pain at the heart.

"This Meess Lucy's sister, Meess Wilson," said Donna Laura, speaking in Italian, and indicating me to her brother with a wave of the hand.

Don Vittorio drew his heels close together, and made me a grave formal bow. I was conscious that my salutation in return was stiff and awkward. I was altogether ill at ease. After one cool glance of inspection Don Vittorio withdrew his attention from me altogether; that is to say, he withdrew his eyes from me. But I felt that he observed me furtively. From that moment whenever we two met we watched one another mistrustfully.

"You must not interrupt us, Vittorio," said Donna Laura. "We are very busy, Meess Wilson and I. And you know how important it is that mamma's stall should be splendid. I cannot attend to you now. Meess Wilson and I are going to mamma to speak of business. Come, Meess Wilson. Make haste with your letter, Vittorio. You know you waste the children's English hour with all this tiresome affair of your horse. And mamma would not be pleased if she knew it."

Donna Laura walked off, motioning me to follow her. I had no choice but to do so. "I shall come back here before I go away, Lucy," I said quickly. Lucy did not hear me. She had her head bent down over Don Vittorio's letter, whilst that patrician gentleman stood very near the school table, stroking his youngest sister's hair, and gazing admiringly at Lucy's delicate little hand as it lay on the green cloth under his eyes.

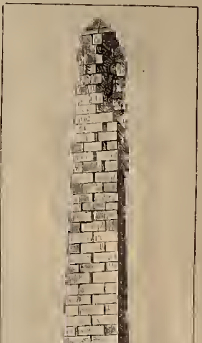
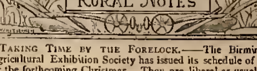
THE MONUMENT TO GENERAL BAIRD RECENTLY STRUCK BY LIGHTNING

THE subject of our illustration is an obelisk which was erected to the memory of General Sir David Baird, of whose martial deeds we read in the history of our campaigns in India, Africa, and Spain. In the latter, at the Battle of Corunna, he lost an arm. The monument stands 434 feet above the sea, on the summit of Tomachaistle, near Crieff, Perthshire, the site of the early Royal Castle of Earn, and was erected by his widow at a cost of 15,000*l.* It is built of blocks of Aberdeen granite of about four tons' weight each. On the 28th May, during the passage of a thunderstorm over the district, the column was struck by the lightning and damaged in the manner shown in our illustration. About twenty stones have been injured, ten courses of the south-west corner being thrown to the ground, smashing the wrought-iron railing at the base, and one of the inscription tablets being severed diagonally and its lower part blown out. The stones forming the ten highest courses are now hanging loose and dangerous, and may come down at any moment, though, curiously enough, the apex is intact. To repair the obelisk, it will be necessary to reset the stones almost from the base, and the cost is estimated at something like 1,250*l.* It is to be hoped that the restoration will be carried out; for, to say nothing of the grand old soldier to whose memory it was erected, it is an eyesore and a danger in its present state. It is interesting to note that the General, when his army was in Egypt, in 1802, with no fighting to do, employed his men in moving Cleopatra's Needle to the banks of the Nile, which they did by means of wooden rollers. They could not overcome the difficulty of the ship, however, and so it remained on the shore at Alexandria till more modern ingenuity found a means of conveying it to England.



Our engraving is from a photograph by Mr. T. F. M'Farlane, Crieff.



RURAL NOTES

TAKING TIME BY THE FORELOCK.——The Birmingham Agricultural Exhibition Society has issued its schedule of prizes for the forthcoming Christmas. They are liberal as usual, such as to attract the best cattle "wandering about" after having been well cared for in their stalls at home, and to make the mouths of exhibitors as well as those of consumers water. In all 685*l.* in ordinary prize money is offered for cattle, 253*l.* for sheep, and about 120*l.* for pigs. These sums, however, by no means represent the values that appertain to the winners. There are other prizes in the shape of cups, plate, and money, which swell up the total to nearly 2,000*l.*

BRITISH STOCK FROM THE PARIS EXHIBITION.——In the last "Rural Notes" there was glorification as to the great victories which we insular people had won at Paris, in shorthorns, in polled Aberdeens, in sheep. Alas! now,

> Like Witherington, we needs must wail
> Like one in doleful dumps
> For now our legs are smoten off,
> And we stand not on our stumps.

The quotation is not quite literal, but, unfortunately, too true. The cattle from Paris are down on their knees. Lady Pigot, in a letter to The Times, bitterly complains of the stoppage of her cattle at Brown's Wharf, the value of which animals she estimates at 5,000*l.* Lady Pigot was requested to exhibit at Paris "by those who ought to have known what risks I should have run," and it was not until the second day of the show that it was intimated that the animals would be subjected to fourteen days' quarantine on their return to this country. Her ladyship maintains that according to the French inspectors there was no disease in the yard, "neither was there foot-and-mouth disease in all France at that moment." The mere fact, however, is this, that at Brown's Wharf, by no means one of a sanatorial character, several cattle are down with the disease, and that among those which are left in durance vile besides Lady Pigot's are Mr. M'Combie's champion prize animals against the world at Paris, the Marquis of Exeter's grand Telemacina, one of the finest shorthorn heifers in the kingdom, and two of Lord Bective's heifers. It will be remembered that last year his lordship gave 4,500 guineas for one heifer. It is pitiful to see the countenances of the herdsmen at Blackwall, who expected to have had after their jaunt to Paris the usual "merry-go-round" of the Royal of England and other chief shows in the provinces. Now it is likely enough that they will have to sit kicking their heels and biting their nails in the dingy precincts of the wharf for the next six weeks, unless the owners elect to slaughter, as some, including the Prince of Wales, have already done, rather than incur the exorbitant charges at the wharf.

> We gaed a waefu' gait yestreen,
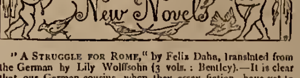
> We hae gaen a gait we'll dearly rue, is the "ower word" of the Scotsmen connected with sheep and cattle, who crossed from Boulogne so buoyantly ten days ago. Quarantine may be said to be upon its trial. Unless Government provide better accommodation for quarantine, we should say at once slaughter all animals at the port of debarkation. Better death than the "Black Hole of Calcutta," than which Brown's Wharf is no better, as the herdsmen and shepherds declare.

CATTLE DISEASE.——After a long and wearisome discussion, a kind of thrice told tale business, the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill has passed a second time in the House of Commons with unlimited cheers. It is scarcely likely that it will pass through Committee without many Amendments; probably it will never go back again to the Upper House and come down to the Lower in time to be finally passed before grouse-shooting begins, and Parliament ends.

IMPORTATION OF CATTLE.——At the time the debate upon the Duke of Richmond's Bill is going on so hotly, it is curious to note that a supplement to the London Gazette directs "that animals brought from a port or place in Her Majesty's possessions in North America or from the United States may be landed at the basin or dock and premises known as the Roath Basin of the Bute Docks, situate at Cardiff." Surely, unless there be some occult reason known to the Privy Council, Liverpool or Glasgow would have been better destinations for animals coming from the Northern States to feed the people of Great Britain.

THE WEATHER.——The past ten days have been favourable for the hay harvest on the whole. Where the grass was cut before the terrible thunder storm of Sunday week much extra work has been necessary in order to get it into condition for stacking, but the hot sun and genial breezes since have facilitated making and in-gathering greatly, and the crop is found to be plentiful. The sunny weather has also had a good effect upon all corn crops, and roots likewise.

MISCELLANEOUS.——In the six months ending June, 5,211 head of cattle, 401 horses, 3,318 sheep, and 838 pigs have been landed at Liverpool by Canadian steamship lines.—Every now and again there is a commotion in the daily newspapers about horseshoes. The discussion generally ends in nothing, except perhaps that a little puff of that or this shoe might benefit for the nonce a particular patentee. Some of the journals advocate the abnegation of shoes altogether. No doubt such unnatural appendages might be dispensed with in colts and fillies, as they are by boys and lasses in some parts of Scotland, but horses of an older growth could not well travel over ill-Macadamised roads without them.—It has been arranged that trotting matches in connection with the Show of Horses at Paris will commence on September 7th. The Minister of Agriculture and Commerce has obtained a vote of 60,000 francs to be distributed in prizes, the object being to improve the French half-bred horses.



New Novels

"A STRUGGLE FOR ROME," by Felix Dahn, translated from the German by Lily Wolffsohn (3 vols.: Bentley).—It is clear that our German cousins, when they essay fiction, have yet to acquire the gift concerning which Sir Arthur Helps discoursed so well and wisely in the last chapter of "Companions of My Solitude," and which he styled "The Art of Knowing When to Leave Off." It needs something like German patience—a patience, we fear, denied to the bulk of the English novel-reading public—to master a book of this kind, a historical romance of the first half of the sixth century of our era, of more than 1,240 pages in length. We cannot but regret that Herr Dahn should have shown so little consideration for the weakness of average human nature, for we have admired portions of his story so much as to make us feel that we should have valued and enjoyed it as a whole had it only been shorter, say, by a third. We could hardly have supposed that we could have been brought to take so lively an interest in so far-away a series of events as the struggle for the possession of Rome and of Italy between the armies of the Byzantine Emperor Justinian, led by Belisarius and Narses, and the chiefs who succeeded the great and wise Theodoric in the Italian Kingdom of the Goths. But, unfamiliar or unknown as the heroes of this struggle are to all but those intimately acquainted with the pages of Gibbon, Herr Dahn has gone a great way to make them seem real and life-like in our eyes, and if his picture of the sixth century is less vivid and powerful than that of the fifth drawn by Mr. Kingsley in "Hypatia," it may at any rate, we should say, lay claim to much greater historical accuracy. Most of the leading characters here introduced, as Amalaswintha, the daughter of Theodoric, Witichis, Totila, and Teja, the three last Gothic kings of Italy, as well as the Greeks, Belisarius and Narses, are historical; but the central figure of the story, the Roman aristocrat, Cethegus Cæsarius, is a creation of the author's imagination, though it is known that a person of that name actually existed. The conception is certainly a fine and striking one. In the Princeps Senatus we are made to see a man highly gifted both by nature and fortune, cool, brave, and daring, and utterly unscrupulous as to the means by which he may accomplish his end. And this end, indistinguishably compounded of pure patriotism and selfish ambition, is to free Rome, the Eternal City, from the hateful yoke of the foreigner, whether Greek or Goth, and render her again mistress of the world, with himself, Cethegus, descendant as he believes of the great Julius, as Dictator or Emperor. We can assure those who can give the necessary time, and do not shrink from a little mental exertion, that Herr Dahn's "Struggle for Rome" contains much that will repay their attention; but we can hardly suppose that it is likely to become a general favourite.

"Benedicta," by Mrs. Alfred Phillips (3 vols.: Macmillan).—Mrs. Alfred Phillips's title-page would lead us to infer that she was a novice in fiction, and this impression is borne out by the character of her story. It is one of much more than ordinary merit, and with plenty of promise of higher excellence in the future, but, at the same time, one that shows that its author has yet a great deal to learn. Benedicta Heathcote is a singularly fresh, high-toned, and charming heroine; and in dealing with characters like her and her father the Member, with Mrs. Blake, the serenely selfish widow of large family and slender means, and with the sharp-tongued but generous-hearted Aunt Grimshaw, the author is thoroughly at home and at her ease, and effective and amusing enough. But when she goes beyond her range, and attempts to depict characters and a world of which, we take it, she knows little, except from other people's novels, her sketches are apt to be somewhat far-fetched and disappointing. We can hardly believe that so good and clever a girl as we are intended to believe Olivia Blake could have suffered herself to become so deeply entangled—to quote one of Policeman X's immortal ballads—

> With a gent she met promiscus,
> Walking in the public street.

And the said "gent," who passes under the name of Charles Lufton, is altogether too "stagey" a villain, and the villainy he meditates of too improbable a character. Like Sir Lucius O'Trigger, who declared himself "too poor to afford to do a dirty action," Lufton is too much in need of the good offices of influential people to be able to afford to forfeit them by indulgence in the particular kind of business he is here made to attempt. The tragic catastrophe, too, which is so wantonly and needlessly "sprung upon" us at the very last, without a note of warning to lead us to anticipate it, is an artistic blunder of itself enough to prove that Mrs. Phillips can have paid but little attention to the first principles of construction. There is no fitness or suitability in it, and the reader feels his sensibilities pained and outraged for nothing. Still, the blemishes we have dwelt upon are such as time and practice may do much to cure, and Mrs. Phillips possesses gifts as a novelist that will lead us to look forward to another story from her with pleasure.

"Viva," by Mrs. Forrester, author of "Mignon," &c. (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—Mrs. Forrester tells us towards the conclusion of her story that it "is not written for young people, and, indeed, she would rather they should not read it." Perhaps it would be as well they should not, as they would hardly find it improving or edifying, seeing that it is but another variation on the well-worn theme of a breach of the seventh commandment and its usual results—weariness and satiety on the part of the man, and a too late repentance on that of the lady. Of course Mrs. Forrester's sentiments are throughout as admirable as those of Joseph Surface himself, but the subject is one which we think—as we have often before said—is much better let alone, at any rate by lady novelists; and there is no such pre-eminent artistic excellence in her manner of telling her story as might in some measure atone for its unpleasantness.

"Hands, not Hearts," by Lady Isabella Schuster (Chapman and Hall).—There is a good deal of smart, cynical writing in this story—if, indeed, that can be called a story which is rather a satire upon the vices and follies of the age, set forth in a series of chapters loosely strung together. The tone of the book is bitter and unpleasant in the extreme; and there is not a character in it who excites a spark of interest or sympathy; but it is not dull, and there is at least this much to be said in its favour—that there are less than two hundred pages of it.

FASHIONS

In our variable climate it is prudent to be prepared for sudden changes, and most of us are aware how difficult it is to cure a summer cold or cough; hence, when we start, after sundown, for a moonlight fête—by land or water—it is well to eschew all light materials. At one time for a fashion writer to mention velvet in July would have been thought treason, but now we find costumes of this material very much worn at this season, more especially for evening outdoor fêtes.

Nothing can be more appropriate for such occasions than a Princess dress of silk velvet, quite plain, buttoned or laced up the back, made with a demi-train, and on the hem a pleated muslin frill, from six to twelve inches deep. For this rigid style of dress an almost faultless figure is required, and still more so for a satin, which outlines closer, hence some drapery is desirable for the thin as well as the stout figure; for the former, an upper dress or polonaise of white Madras muslin, or thin silk of the genus Tussore, Nagpore, Corah, &c., for the latter a more substantial fabric, such as poplin, cashmere, or silk damask.

Our Court festivities have been subdued by mourning attire for the past few weeks, culminating in the death of the young Queen of Spain, for whose premature decease white with trimmings of mauve or violet are the most appropriate mourning emblems beyond the immediate Court circle.

There is no difficulty in arranging what may be called complimentary mourning on a descending scale, from dead black silk to white satin or pearl grey cashmere, all we need say on the subject is that bonnets, gloves, and stockings must correspond in colour, and even shade, with the costume worn.

Three half-mourning ball costumes for a mother and her two daughters were recently made thus: The first of black rich corded silk, Princess shape, the front breadth, from the throat to the hem, embroidered in white and black crystal beads, a wide black net scarf, handsomely embroidered to correspond, and edged with waved fringe, was tied carelessly at the left side; white tulle cap spotted with jet beads; a jet butterfly with outspread wings fastened, three white ostrich feather tips. The elder daughter wore a dress of pearl grey satin, shot with silver, made quite plain, excepting a cascade of rich old Venetian point lace down the front, fastened at intervals with pearl sprays; her hair was dressed à la Romaine, fastened with bands of pearl beads, on the left side a pearl butterfly. The younger sister's dress consisted of a white silk petticoat, with three silver gauze scarfs fastened at irregular intervals with water lilies and white frosted leaves; corsage à la vierge on the left shoulder a half-blown lily with diamond dewdrops, the same in the hair.

For morning, noon, and night white, of a pearl or cream shade, will be worn—from the inexpensive muslinette to the costly satin and brocade—whilst the warm weather lasts.

Industrious fingers, with the help of a sewing machine, may make up for a comparatively trifling cost some half-dozen morning robes of white cambric, sateen, or muslinette, trimmed with double-faced ribbons, if for mourning, of black and white, grey and black, or mauve and white, &c. If not for mourning, of "Queen Anne linen," a new material, in the style of the period named above—cambric muslin with parti-coloured trimmings—School of Art dresses, elegantly designed, with neutral tint foundations and gorgeous needlework bands of net, embroidered in filoselle roses, wild flowers, &c.

A few words, en parenthèse, as to fancy bazaars, which are on the tapis in town and country at the present moment. Stall-keepers should not wear train skirts, but adopt dresses short, or else fastened up to clear the ground, and also avoid all hanging drapery about the sleeves, as calculated to carry away the numerous fragile trifles from their stalls.

The "Kermesse de l'Orangerie"—recently organised for the poor children of Paris—was so great a success, that our English lady philanthropists may take a hint therefrom, especially as regards the dairy stall, à la Trianon, where the daintiest of amateur dairy-maids, attired après Marie Antoinette, sold iced milk and cream of the purest kind, although somewhat exalted in price.

A Parisian contemporary gives us a graphic description of three elegant costumes worn on this occasion, selected from a large number:—

No. 1, "A short dress of white muslin, most elaborately trimmed with Valenciennes lace, over which was a polonaise of white brocaded silk, trimmed with a simple white fringe, white Leghorn bonnet, with a large white feather.

No. 2, "A long dress, with a Medicis bodice, open very low, but filled up with a lace tucker, the material a species of crêpe de Chine, the colour of which it was impossible to describe—between rose, lilac, and pale claret; bonnet of pale gold, with a feather to match the dress.

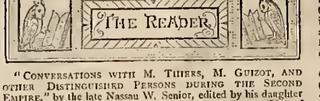
"No. 3 costume was of a mauve shade, with a short skirt of satin, over which was an upper skirt of mauve-coloured striped gauze; a satin paletot, with revers, fastened on the shoulder and hip; a mauve gauze fichu, with a frill of lace, which veiled this very open corsage, completed a most graceful toilette."

In Paris jackets for out-door wear are quite out of fashion, and in London we but seldom see them, excepting when made loose and sleeveless, to match a morning dress. Shawlettes, mantlettes, and fichus of the lightest materials are worn, somewhat elaborately trimmed, with cascades of lace on the back.

Silk and wire grenadine, black, white, or self colour, is cool and endurable for everyday costumes, but a still cooler material is Indian silk, which, being opaque, requires little else but a muslinette petticoat under it, instead of a more substantial fabric. Extremely pretty and inexpensive are some of the morning costumes, for example, the hair-striped calicoes, with groups of narrow lines in three or more colours, made very plainly, with yoke bodices and long loops of double-faced ribbons to match. Costumes of sateen, or glazed linen, which, at first sight, appear to be satin, are made in every imaginable shade: the favourite colours are noisette, fawn, greens of every hue, including the young and mature hazel twig, sulphur, cardinal red, and navy blue.

There is a perfect mania in England for Beefeater hats, which are becoming but to the very few and disfigure the many; for certain this fashion will soon die out. As we suggested some time since natural flowers are now much worn, not only for evening but day wear. In Paris there is more than one floral depôt where fashionable dames send their bonnets daily to be ornamented with real flowers. Those of our readers who have neither the taste nor the inclination to decorate with natural flowers will have no difficulty in procuring exquisite imitations thereof. Wild flowers are more in vogue than their cultivated species; buttercups, daisies, harebells, Canterbury bells, heath, ivy, wild roses, and honeysuckle are not only used for trimming, but often the bonnet is composed of flowers only.—Three charming bonnets were recently made for a bridal trousseau. The one of white satin finely gathered and fluted in the front; on one side, towards the left, was a spray of mignonette, on the other a large satin bow, lined with sea-green. The other was composed of blue forget-me-nots and scarlet pimpernel. The third of brown net thickly studded with beads shaded from amber to brown, a bouquet of wild flowers and grass on the left side.

Mittens are much worn now, more especially by the fortunate owners of handsome rings or pretty hands, or both. The Louis XIII. are made of netted black silk with a deep fringe beading—the Louis XV. are also black netted, but embroidered in white on the back, and bands at the wrist and top.



THE READER

"Conversations with M. Thiers, M. Guizot, and other Distinguished Persons during the Second Empire," by the late Nassau W. Senior, edited by his daughter (2 vols.: Hurst and Blackett)—a continuation (1852 to 1860) of the extracts from Mr. Senior's journals, of which the first series appeared some time in '71—must not be ranked among everyday fruit of the current book season. It would be difficult, indeed, to overrate the historic interest—if not the positive historic value—of these conversations, held with the most famous men of Western Europe throughout the earlier and luckier years of Napoleonic rule, when the alliance of the two Western Powers was the keystone of European policy in the present, and the doubt whether it might not one day be broken to promote dynastic ends by a "revenge for Waterloo," the chief disquietude that clouded over the future. Mr. Senior had quite a Boswellian gift of getting great men to talk freely, and even more than Boswellian pertinacity in taking notes of all they said, going, indeed, so far at times as to send his journal to them next day for additions and corrections. What charm of manner secured for him this ascendancy, to which all apparently submitted, and some, notably M. Thiers, with manifest delight, is not sufficiently clear. No process certainly could be better fitted to ensure the fullest and most authentic reports of every conversation he thought worth recording. And Mr. Senior had never to fill up his note-books with conversations that were commonplace or barren. His interlocutors were either the people who make history themselves, or who stand in closest relation to those who do—Thiers, Guizot, the late King Leopold, in the former class; Madame Cornu, Merimée, Evans, the Emperor's dentist, in the latter; Chrzanowski, Leon Faucher, Montalembert, &c., among those who come midway between the two. Yet the interest which these conversations deservedly excite is greater, we are inclined to think, than their actual historic value, whether as elucidating certain passages in the past, or as pregnant with hints for the better understanding of the present. Not unfrequently, indeed, we meet with something of direct application to the politics of the hour—Vefyk Pasha's good-humoured but pointed description of the essential difference between the East and the West; Chrzanowski's shrewd remarks on the weakness of the Balkans as a line of defence, &c. On the whole, however, the impression left is of the talk of men versatile, talented, and well-informed, but floating on the surface of a sea whose real depths they have not, with all their wit, the power to plumb, dissatisfied and puzzled by "Celui-ci," as they familiarly name the Emperor, looking forward to a catastrophe, they know not what, regretting, in a half-hearted sort of way, the thirst for annexation which had been excited by the easy acquisition of Savoy and which was now beginning to be directed towards Belgium and the Rhine, but with little idea seemingly of the real strength of the Italian passion for unity, or the still deeper, if less demonstrative, thirst for national union that was gathering strength beyond the Rhine—the men, in fact, whatever their politics, on whom the movements of the next ten years—the present conversations end in 1860—were to come one after another as a series of surprises. Still, this only makes the volumes truer pictures of a period when, if ever, blind chance and undecided purpose were powerful among the rulers of mankind.

Of two new books called into being by the Arctic Expedition of 1875-6, the palm for excellence as well as splendour must unhesitatingly be awarded to the noble volume, "Shores of the Polar Seas," by Edward L. Moss, M.D., illustrated by sixteen chromo-lithographs and numerous engravings made on the spot by the author (Marcus Ward and Co.). We grieve to say it: the story of our late Polar Expedition is too commonly a little wearisome. Even the able "official narrative" of Sir G. Nares has attractions mainly for the scientific reader—the ardent naturalist or geographer. Dr. Moss has succeeded in giving us a volume which is thoroughly entertaining at the same time that it is reasonably scientific. The sketches of scenes which "few can ever see for themselves" put before us better than any word-painting could do the grim masses of stratified salt-ice amidst which the Alert found winter quarters, the outlook over the ever-frozen sea, the solitude where the lonely cross denotes the grave of the dead sailor, the "effects" of winter or of the returning dawn; the letter-press—judiciously compressed, and passing lightly over incidents of which too much has been already said—enables us all the more thoroughly to realise the fantastic dangers of the highest latitude reached by living man, the toils of the sledge journeys, the dreariness of perpetual night, the scanty chances of escape if serious accident befell the ship. As a volume for the drawing-room, "Shores of the Polar Sea" have scarcely a competitor in the entire mass of arctic literature.

Our commendations of Dr. Moss will suggest, we fear, comparisons unfavourable to the second of our Arctic volumes, "The Great Frozen Sea," by Captain Markham (Daldy, Isbister, and Co.), a popular narrative by the late second in command of the Alert, of the events already described by his chief from a more strictly scientific point of view. Nor can we aver that in Captain Markham's book will be found much that is absolutely novel. But it is a sailorly, straightforward tale, with more than one exciting chapter—"Egerton and Rawson's Sledge Journey" and the "Return of the Northern Division" among the best—and more than one hint of value for the future—e.g., on the best precautions against the damp—the result of excessive condensation—which, strange to say, is the chief discomfort of an Arctic winter, and (with the perpetual darkness) its chiefest peril and the great pre-disposing cause to scurvy. One chapter only could we have wished curtailed—the account of Arctic "High Jinks" and "Theatricals." We may be very old-fashioned, but we cannot help thinking this feature of the late Expedition has already received quite unnecessary prominence.

What shall be said of the "O'Connell Centenary Record, 1875, Published by Authority of the O'Connell Centenary Committee" (Dublin: J. Dollard, Dame Street), but that it is a handsome and a ponderous volume got up with judgment and good taste, and every way worthy of a celebration which, despite certain contretemps that need not now be recapitulated, was honourable alike to the Irish people and to the dead. It is a volume, perhaps, rather for show than use. We can hardly fancy even the most ardent Nationalist delighting to re-peruse the extraordinary speech of General Butler, the courteous commonplaces of the foreign Bishops, or the broadsheet printed and distributed en marche by the Dublin compositors, though a second reading might be bestowed on the oration Lord O'Hagan did not deliver, and the eloquent Centenary Ode of Mr. D. F. M'Carthy. Still, there is a good deal in it besides the mere record of all that did or should have taken place in August, 1875—a memoir of the Liberator, a neat sketch of early Irish history, later historical retrospects suggested by memorable sites near the line of march of the procession through the city, reminiscences of the Famine, and of the battle for Catholic education—very much in a word, to interest the youthful Celt, though hardly equally acceptable to the Saxon who, poor man, is scarcely prepared to find himself at every turn held guilty of seven centuries of wrongdoing.

In his "Gaddings with a Primitive People" (Remington and Co.), Mr. Baillie Grohman transports his readers, nothing loath, to his favourite ground for anecdote and adventure, the secluded valleys of "Land Tirol." The little volumes, though thinner in substance, and more careless in style than their predecessor, "Tyrol and the Tyrolese," are only a little less amusing in their easy pictures of village scenes and manners which in another generation will have almost ceased to be. One quite agrees with the rustic landlord that it would be worth while to come all the way from Paris for the Christmas Paradise Play—a much more primitive and enjoyable affair than the famous Passion Play of Ober-Ammergau—so well described in Chapter I., and devoutly wishes that the day may be far distant when fashion, extravagance, and "Herren-Leut" destroy so curious a survival of old times as the peasant watering-place at S. Where, again, can we find a prettier idyll—not certainly of too straight-laced a type—than the story of Kati, the Alp-girl, and her lover, or a more sensational village hero than "ferocious Jokel, the Wild-Dieb? Or, if the reader looks for greater names, here is the story—a true one, it is said—of Bismarck's early love and his rejection by the Catholic father of a Tyrolese peasant maid, and the accident which, had the Heavens so willed it, might have turned the future Hermit of Varzin into a quiet mountain farmer. For an hour or two of pleasant reading we know few books of the present year we can commend more warmly.

Young people at Christmas time are liable to be overwhelmed by an avalanche of story books, but the Christmas supply is reckoned to last the year, and fresh literature for the summer holidays is rarely provided. A pleasant collection of juvenile books, however, comes from Messrs. Griffith and Farran. Foremost for interest stands "Rosamond Fane," by M. and C. Lee, which is founded on the escape of the Duke of York, Charles I.'s second son, afterwards James II., from his captivity in London, and is far above the average of historical fictions. Rosamond herself, sorely divided between devotion to the Royal cause and loyalty to her Roundhead uncle, is remarkably well drawn, nor are the characters of the gloomy Duke of York and his meek sister, Elizabeth, much inferior.—Equally founded on fact is Mr. W. H. Kingston's "Peter the Whaler," although the veracious adventures therein detailed are stirring enough to match the most ingenious fictitious creations. This fresh edition of an attractive tale of Arctic experiences will delight schoolboys, and teach them some moral lessons to boot.—Mr. H. Severne's "Chums" is also intended for boyish perusal, but differs little from previous recitals of school life.—It is discouraging to would-be imitators that good children in books generally die or become invalids, and surely the hero of "Clement's Trial and Victory," by "M. E. B.," might have been reformed by some less severe visitation than that of blindness, a tragedy which mars an otherwise praiseworthy story. The same authoress furnishes a simple tale of peasant life in "Little Lisette, the Orphan of Alsace."—"Granny's Storebox" is well worth opening, as it is filled with strikingly original fairy legends, well borne out by the illustrations. A few of the imaginary beings are, however, rather horrible, and might give nervous little ones the nightmare.—Lastly comes our old familiar friend, Mrs. Trimmer's "History of the Robins," charmingly illustrated by Harrison Weir.—All play and no work being as hurtful as the reverse maxim, a capital geography book for children, "At Home and Abroad," by J. K. Laughton (Rivingtons), may be warmly commended for lesson-time. Here are no dry bones of geography, but plain and attractive accounts of the countries of the world.—Rhymes for the little ones are provided in "Poetry for Children," edited by J. E. Clarke (Warne); while "The Parent's Manual" (W. Wells Gardner) furnishes simple prayers and instructions for teaching the first elements of our faith.

FEMALE CONVICT PRISONS

II.

Woking within recent years has become quite a familiar word, and, though twenty-five miles from town, is in some respects like a suburb of the metropolis. The prison consists of a magnificent mass of buildings, in extensive grounds, with a large number of residences for officials, constituting altogether quite a little town. All travellers on the South-Western are familiar with the neighbourhood, the wide extent of breezy common, and the fragrant fir plantations. It is a walk of three miles through a pretty unsophisticated country from the railway station to the convict prison. I was directed to cross a wooden bridge, and go by the "Woking River" as the nearest way. The so-called Woking River turned out a canal, apparently disused; there were a few pleasure-boats, but no barges, and the canal is assuming a wild river-like appearance. I should like to turn out a national school to pasture on the never-ending succession of blackberry bushes. I returned by the pleasant high road, with its green margin wider than the road itself, and bordering on some of the finest nursery grounds in England. The air was both soft and bracing, and the site of the prison is admirably chosen on a commanding eminence. It is one of our largest prisons. The number of convicts is hardly ever less than fifteen hundred. Of these slightly the larger half consist of women; the men are all invalids. The excellent climate has made Woking a sanatorium. Broadmoor is for those mentally afflicted, and there is a large number of invalids at Prince's Town, Dartmoor; but the male prisoners at Woking are entirely invalids. The result is that the entire arrangements partake much more of the character of a hospital than of a prison. The men employed outdoors looked hearty enough, but a warder truly said that this was no sign. There might be internal disease. "A fellow seems all right," said a warder, "and the next thing we hear of him is that he is dead." I was shown a room called a Jury Room. There is an inquest on every convict who dies in prison, and at Woking the inquests occur on an average of once a week. If the authorities are satisfied that liberation from prison is essential for a prisoner's life he would most probably be released, but it is hardly likely that a sick convict can procure the same comfort and attention out of doors as he obtains within the prison walls.

The Female Convict Prison at Woking is, however, not an invalid prison. It contains the great mass of female convict prisoners in England, and they appear generally in a high state of health. The different classes of prisoners are distinguishable by their dress. In summer the first class wear lilac, the second dark blue, the third light blue. In winter the three classes wear respectively blue, green, and brown serge. The condition of labourers in the country and of the crowded poor in London streets and alleys is not to be compared with that of the Woking criminals. But at the same time the criminals would gladly exchange their lot for the very poorest in town or country. There are vast enclosed green spaces for exercise, and all around rises a corridor which gives shelter in wet weather. In the exercise hour the prisoners moved about in leisurely groups like schoolgirls. It was very interesting to watch the prisoners in the "silence" hour and in the "association" hour. In the "silent" hour each woman sits on a stool placed at the door of her cell. There is a dead stillness. In the "association" hour they sit by twos and threes together, and all around was a cheerful hubbub of voices. Each cell has its supply of religious and secular publications, novels and newspapers being excluded. Then I inspected the food department, and, as far as I could judge by the eye, bread and meat, soup and porridge, were all excellent. In this department was Dixblanc, the Belgian, who murdered her mistress in Park Lane under circumstances of peculiar atrocity. She has a good prison character, and is in the first class. Indeed the worst criminals often make the best prisoners. It seems as if they concentrated into a single act all the fierce wickedness of their lives. They are more easy to manage, and on the whole seem a better class than habitual criminals. In the different workshops there was one of peculiar interest, and only found in Woking. This is the mosaic department. Under able, kindly tuition, the women do a good deal of remunerative work for contracts for mosaic in churches and public buildings. They have done a good deal of mosaic work for St. Paul's Cathedral, for the Leicester Municipal Buildings, and for the South Kensington Museum. Some of them—not many, however—evince a considerable taste for form and colour, and an art education would not be thrown away upon them.

The first aspect of things is of a very favourable kind, and the general aspect may be taken as the true one. We must combine with our survey trustworthy information which may be attainable. Some years ago a couple of works were published by a writer who called herself a "Prison Matron," and is supposed to have received a considerable amount of literary assistance. Her books are entirely authentic, although a certain amount of change has taken place since they first appeared, and it is only fair to say, to some extent, happened through their appearance. Warders, matrons, and prisoners are able to give the most vivid details of prison life, although they are somewhat at a loss when they come to discuss the principles of criminal law. Her volumes display the inner life of female prisons, although in a way in which it is not revealed to prison visitants, though armed with every Government facility. We should also say that Mr. Horace Mayhew, the most diligent investigator of all forms of London life, has collected some information on the subject. The very first thing which happens to a female convict is that which grieves her most, the cutting of her hair. The convict girls have wept and raved when their hair has been shorn. After a time they fall pretty much into the prison routine, except some few fierce and forlorn natures, which are liable to "break out." One of the most extraordinary practices of female prisoners is conveyed by this expression. Nothing is known in the convict prisons of France and Germany of such breakings out as are by no means unusual in English prisons. On these occasions the prisoners will destroy everything within reach; some poor women will even go to the authorities and declare that they know that they are on the point of breaking out, and in such a case they will be promptly secured before any mischief is done. At the risk of being maimed, a prisoner will dash her hand through glass, or seek to destroy the iron bed and utensils. Sometimes the refractory prisoner will become little better than a dangerous wild beast; she will assault the matron, and bring her within fear of her life. In this rabid state they have been known to set fire to their cells, or to hang themselves. Many of these cases are little known, as they are dealt with summarily by the Directors. The painful suspicion arises whether a monotonous, prolonged imprisonment has not a tendency to drive women out of their senses. There is a frightful proportion of cases of insanity and imbecility among them.

For every kind of impudence the authorities are of course prepared. To quote one amusing instance, a convict said that the Doctor, the Chaplain, and the Directors were "sets of men hired to wait upon us—that's all they were;" and added the general opinion that they were "a set of bad 'uns." It is quite a common amusement to contrive to blow the matron's candle out as she promenades the corridors. These female convicts often resemble "the seven mighty daughters of the plough" in their muscular strength and endurance. Unfortunately, the prisoners can often make the matron's position a bed of thorns. One curious thing about the airing-ground is, that the women acquire a peculiar gait in walking,—a gait so general and peculiar, that a prison matron can often tell in the London streets a person who has been in a Government prison. In the airing-ground and the association yard the lady prisoners are speedily identified. These persons generally suffer deplorably, and are ill able to do the prison work. Their case is speedily diagnosed by the other prisoners. If they are young, it is assumed to be a case of child-murder; if older, it is murder, or attempted murder, through jealousy; a middle-aged woman is put down as a fancy thief; one who is older and sterner looking, as a forger or receiver of stolen goods. It is surprising how often the surmise is correct. But the women are not content until they manage to know all about the case of the last arrival. They manage to tell each other the whole of their respective histories; and at times they combine the tales of the past with plans for the future. Unfortunately, in the association wards the intimacy often tends to the degradation of weaker natures, and the plotting and planning of future mischief. The female official who has published her experience fills a great many of her own pages with the stories of different criminals. Some of these belong to various causes célèbres, and many would suit the school of the romance of crime. Articles travel about a prison in a most extraordinary way. They often pass from hand to hand. Wine will go from the infirmary to some far-off destination. Honour among thieves is an established institution, and female thieves are the worst of thieves. The poor creatures have often never had a chance; have been regularly trained in the "Guilt Gardens" of which "S. G. O." used to write. The prisoners somehow contrive to obtain some degree of variation from the stereotyped sameness of the prison. They can always, on stated occasions, see the Superintendent or the Director, frequently on very frivolous grounds, and generally for the sake of some little break in the ordinary course of things. In a similar way the doctor is liable to be interviewed. Even in prison there is space for female vanity; they are coquettish in their caps, and manage to get hairpins and combs. One great event in the lives of the prisoners is "letter day," when once in a month they are permitted to receive letters which have passed scrutiny. They are often sadly agitated and distressed before and after the "letter day." Many similar scenes occur on the same visiting days, scenes that are often of the most pathetic kind. Of course, very stringent rules are made respecting visits and letters, but larger powers of discretion might be left with the authorities.

A BANKER'S NOTES

V.

IT may not be out of place, in concluding these Notes, to turn briefly from the incidental and whimsical side of a banker's business, to which in these papers attention has mainly been called, to glance at that which constitutes the staple of his every-day duties. The chief source of a bank's profits may generally be stated as arising from the mode in which the aggregate of sums entrusted to its care on deposit is invested or placed, so as to be readily available in case of need or emergency. It follows that within certain limits it is the endeavour of every bank to increase its deposits to the greatest possible extent in every legitimate way. Depositors may roughly be divided into three classes. First, the large class, really the back-bone of any banking system, who, too timid to trust its capital to investments in railways, foreign bonds, or such like fluctuating securities, deposits its money in its chosen bank, receiving in return interest at the rate of one per cent. under the Bank of England rate of discount. This important class for the last year or two, during which bank rates have been excessively low, has seriously suffered in cases where income is dependent on the interest of money so deposited. Were it not for the fate that has overtaken those who put their trust in certain foreign stocks, doubtless larger amounts would have been diverted from the home banks for investment in similar unstable securities. As a matter of fact a very large aggregate amount hitherto deposited "at call" has been withdrawn during the past year or two from our home banks, and deposited in the more thriving of our Colonial banks at fixed rates for fixed periods. It may be an open question whether the rates offered as inducements to the public by some of the Colonial banks are not higher than can legitimately be afforded; but there is a certain satisfaction in any case to the patriotic mind that if our "widows and clergymen" (the proverbial prey of Stock Exchange vultures) are to invest their savings outside the old country, their doing so will tend to the development and prosperity of our colonies.

The second important class of customers on which to a large extent the prosperity of a bank depends consists of merchants, and others, who for the sake of the convenience of their business leave in their banker's hands an average creditor balance, paying in and drawing from the account as the daily calls of business require, the banker being compensated for his trouble by allowing no interest on such accounts. Large permanent balances of this kind, yielding no interest, are not, as may be imagined, the rule, a customer alive to his own good naturally exercising the option given him of transferring any amount he may not immediately require from his current operative account to the interest-bearing "deposit receipt."

The third, and perhaps most numerous class (if the provincial banks are included) is made up of the host of men in a small way of business, shopkeepers, master-mechanics, farmers, or professional men who live up to their income, to whom it is not only a convenience but almost a necessity to have their earnings or capital placed in safe custody, and in such a way as to be at once attainable. It has not been the policy of the large London banks to encourage accounts of this sort. Instead of allowing interest for the small sums that remain in their hands this way, a commission, varying from one to ten guineas, is charged. Many an industrious though struggling man in business, through whose hands considerable sums pass in the course of the year, is deterred from opening a bank-account because he cannot afford to pay such a tax. It may be worth pointing out that a great deal of the success of the Scotch system of banking has arisen (allowing for other causes which cannot here be entered upon) from encouraging every class to bring its earnings, for however short a time, to be deposited at interest, irrespective of the amount deposited. The aggregate amount left in the hands of the banks from this class (though individually trifling) represents no mean proportion of the total deposits of the country. In Scotland, as I pointed out in a previous paper, whenever there is a kirk there is almost certain to be a branch-bank at hand, gleaning in the floating capital of the locality, and there commissions for accounts, operative or inoperative, are unknown; the humblest shepherd, as has been remarked, expects his "siller to breed siller," and this policy results in the fact that the total deposits of the eleven prosperous Scotch banks exceeds the respectable aggregate of eighty millions sterling. There may not be the same motive for such banks south of the Tweed as have not the privilege of note-issue (possessed by all the Scotch banks in Scotland) to encourage small operative accounts, yet there can be little doubt that in the long run the more generous policy would tend to the banks' as well as the public profit. Although it may be justifiable to allow no interest on accounts that fall under a stated balance it seems hard, taking into account the benefit that well-managed banks derive from the accumulated deposits of small accounts, to tax struggling industrious people with commissions more or less heavy for a privilege which (apart from the trouble) contributes to the prosperity of such institutions.

A word may in conclusion be permitted in reference to a very old grievance under which the employés of the London banks have long groaned, one of the few real grievances now left in the remedying of which (for it is surely capable of remedy) some reformer may earn grateful laurels—I refer to the Saturday half-holiday movement. It does seem somewhat strange that while workmen throw aside their tools at twelve o'clock, and merchants, and merchants' clerks, are hurrying from the City to catch two o'clock trains for suburban fields and lanes, that bank-clerks should have to toil over their ledgers and cash-books till four o'clock (although the banks close at three o'clock to the public, an hour's work remains to be done by the majority of employés) and frequently later. This in winter means reaching home tired and jaded every working day of the week after dark. Is it wonderful that there are rounded shoulders and pale faces behind the desks scowling at late customers on Saturday afternoons? Why is it that in the provinces, in cities, towns, and country villages, the banks can close on Saturdays at hours varying from twelve to two o'clock, while the London banks find it imperative to remain open till three o'clock? Allowing for the obvious reason of the vastness of the business transacted in the City as compared with the largest provincial towns, it is a fact that the same efforts to attain the end in view are not employed either by the public, or by the banks in London, as has grown to be the habit in Liverpool and Glasgow. In the provincial towns, e.g. it has become very much the custom, good for the labouring community as well as the banks, to withdraw the amounts required for payments and workmen's wages on Friday instead of Saturday. This lightens the bustle of work which at any rate falls on Saturday, from the circumstance that all bills falling due on Sunday are legally due on Saturday. If this were to become the custom in London an important step would be taken towards the end in view. Rather than that the half-holiday should not be given it might not be altogether out of the pale of possibilities for Sir John Lubbock, who has already conferred such boons not only on bank employés but on mercantile society generally, to consider the feasibility of introducing a bill before Parliament proposing to make bills falling due on Sunday payable on Monday instead of, as at present, Saturday. Such a movement, although much may be argued against it, would in reality be as great a benefit to the mercantile community as it would be to the over-worked and under-paid staff of the London banks. The recent movement in the direction of shortening the hours of labour seemed to turn upon the question as to whether it would be better to open the banks for business at ten instead of nine o'clock daily, or let the existing morning arrangements remain, and instead close earlier on Saturdays. Because the representatives of the different banks could not agree as to which was most feasible the matter has been, for the time, dropped. It is to be hoped that ere long it will be seen that by management and tact both boons may be granted without unduly interfering with the public convenience, or detracting from the business of the various banks acting unanimously. The Colonial, Foreign and Scotch banks in London begin business at ten o'clock, and in cases of colonial and foreign banks close on Saturdays at two o'clock, an example that cannot too soon be followed by the older and larger establishments. It should form an early part of the programme of the new Bankers' Institute that has within the last week or two sprung into existence in London to take this matter up earnestly and enthusiastically now that we are fairly into summer, on public as well as private grounds, and in carrying the measure successfully through the Institute will at once popularise itself among the class to whom it appeals, and for whose benefit it has ostensibly came into existence.

RECENT POETRY AND VERSE

IT is open to question whether the immense popularity which Mr. Swinburne's poetry at one time enjoyed with a certain class of readers has not waned during the last few years; this may be owing partly to the number of inferior writers who, without possessing his talent, have found it easy to copy his tricks of style, and so brought the measures which were at first so taking rather into disrepute, but it cannot be denied that there is an almost invariable sameness in his themes, and an apparent want of virility in their treatment. This, of course, applies only to his minor lyrics, such as constitute the bulk of "Poems and Ballads" (Second Series), by Algernon Charles Swinburne (Chatto and Windus); his more serious works, such as "Bothwell" or "Erectheus," stand entirely apart. There is much that is pleasant in the book, a little that is distinctly the reverse, a good deal that is simply dull, but nothing that can be called new. Really the best of the poems are "Four Songs of Four Seasons," one of which, "Winter in Northumberland," appeared years ago in a magazine under a different name. "In the Bay" has fine passages of the declamatory sort, and "A Vision of Spring in Winter" is very sweet and pictorial, whilst of the "tender grace" of "A Birth Song," the following stanza may be taken as a sample:—

Now, ere thy sense forget
The heaven that fills it yet,
   Now, sleeping or awake,
If thou couldst tell, or we Ask and be heard of thee,
   For love's undying sake,
From thy dumb lips divine and bright mute speech,
Such news might touch our ear
That then would burn to hear
Too high a message now for man's to reach.

Here the poet is seen at his best, but when he is addressing the French authors who have taken so strong a hold of his imagination he will find comparatively few sympathisers. The classical verses and translations are clever, but have the same drawback, and, all things considered, the collection will hardly add to his reputation.

It is always a pleasant task to record distinct progress in the work of a new author, and this, we think, may be fairly recognised in "Berthold," and other poems, by Meta Orred (Smith, Elder and Co.).—The author seems to have gained in dignity of expression, as exemplified in "Lohengrin," which, although it would in all probability never have been written had the "Idylls of the King" not been, is an unusually favourable specimen of the school founded upon Mr. Tennyson. The knight's address to the swan and Elsa's remorse are both really fine passages. Then there is increased facility in the management of the lyric measures, and some of the shorter pieces—especially those of a religious tendency—are excellent; we may select for particular praise "Thou shalt be satisfied," "The Moon and the Brook," and "Forgiveness," which is the best of the three. For the principal poem we confess we have no great admiration; it is a gruesome story, and its manner is not attractive; the author is at her best in her less ambitious efforts.

Although in his prefatory letter Mr. Symonds disclaims the title of poet, it may safely be averred that he has a better right to it than many more pretentious writers. In "Many Moods," a volume of verse, by John Addington Symonds (Smith, Elder, and Co.), will be found not only the scholarship and delicacy of intuition for which the author's known works would have prepared us, but an unusual command of the various metres employed—if we except the blank verse, which is not good—deep thought, and the fullest perception of the beauties of Nature, coupled with a vivid power of reproduction. The four principal themes selected for exposition are Love, Friendship, Death, and Sleep, and all are admirably treated. As instance of the poet's varying moods, we may cite first of all the best piece in the book, "I Felici;" next, "In the Mentone Graveyard;" and, after these, "The Lotos-wreath of Antinous" and "At Castellamare," which would not have disgraced the best of those singers who have hymned the spring. Mr. Symonds elsewhere shows that he can rise to great heights; the address of Aristodemus to Callicrates, beginning "Hadst thou come branded with a thousand stripes," could hardly be finer as a sample of passion and pathos combined. He is, if not a poet in the highest sense, at least a writer of unusually good verse, which, unlike most, will bear re-reading.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The Berlin Congress has been working with a will this week, and up to the present time all the deliberations have passed off most smoothly, and all the questions which have been brought forward have been settled in the fewest possible words. Prince Bismarck allows no time to be wasted, and it is even thought that the sittings may terminate on Monday next, and the outline of the settlement between the various nations having been sketched out, the details will be filled in more leisurely and by diplomatists with more time at their disposal than the Prime Ministers of Germany, Great Britain, Russia, and Austria. To take up the thread of the proceedings where we left them last week, it appears that in the sitting on the 26th ult. Prince Gortchakoff, who had not been present for some days, came down and frightened everybody by declaring that his colleagues had made far greater concessions than Russia had ever intended. It was thought that this foreshadowed their withdrawal, but the Russian Premier speedily reassured the meeting by pointing out the unselfishness of his country, which, having made sacrifices for a war in the "cause of Christianity and civilisation," was also capable of making sacrifices for "the great work of pacification." These words of the veteran Chancellor were at once courteously acknowledged by Lord Beaconsfield in one of his grave and characteristic speeches. On the 28th was celebrated what has been not inaptly termed the morganatic marriage of Count Andrassy with Bosnia and Herzegovina—the custody of those provinces being there and then handed over to Austro-Hungarian keeping. Count Andrassy read over a memorial desiring Congress to come to some resolution for tranquilising the provinces in question, pointing out that Austria had 150,000 refugees on her hands who refused to return to their homes while the provinces remained under Turkish rule, and that hitherto the Turks had proved completely unequal to the task of maintaining peace and order. The Marquis of Salisbury then suggested that Austria should be at once charged to occupy Bosnia and Herzegovina, and to undertake the administration. He was seconded by M. Waddington, and after a brief remonstrance from the Turkish Plenipotentiary, which brought forth a somewhat amusing expression of "astonishment" from Prince Bismarck that the Turkish Plenipotentiaries should "hesitate to yield to the unanimous opinion of the Congress," the proposal was adopted by all but the Turkish Plenipotentiaries, and duly accepted by Count Andrassy. The next question was the independence of Servia, which was proclaimed—with the condition that civil and religious liberty must exist without distinction of creed—a measure especially intended to emancipate the Jews, who suffer under great disadvantages in the Eastern Christian provinces of Europe.

The Greek delegates, MM. Delyannis and Rhangabe, were at last admitted to the Congress on Saturday, when they read a long memoire, setting forth and justifying the "legitimate" aspirations of Greece, and, while making no specific demands, broadly suggesting that Greek authority should in some form be established over the territories which possess a large Hellenic population—Epirus, Thessaly, and the island of Crete—and which, being in a chronic state of insurrection, engender much trouble and disturbance on the frontiers of King George's domains. Having read the memorial, the delegates retired, and the discussion was adjourned until the Plenipotentiaries had had time to consult together in those private sittings which have thus far done so much to secure the unanimity and tranquillity of the deliberations. It is thought that, while Greece will not obtain Crete, she will be awarded the protectorate of Thessaly and Epirus, after the same fashion that Bosnia and Herzegovina have been allotted to Austria, the annexed or "occupied" territory thus ranging from the Gulf of Volo to the Gulf of Arta, across Thessaly and Epirus, following the line of the Kuba river and the Pindapigadia Hills. On Monday came the Roumanian delegates, MM. Cogalniceano and Bratiano, who also read long memoires recounting the well-known history of the Roumanian Question, and protesting against the annexation of Bessarabia by Russia. After their withdrawal the Congress at once plunged into a full discussion of the matter, the British, French, and Italian Plenipotentiaries speaking in favour of granting an efficient frontier to the little State. Finally it was settled that that portion of Bessarabia which had been taken from Russia by the Treaty of 1856 should be restored to her—namely, that bounded on the east by the Pruth, and on the north by the Kilia Valley, including of course the Danube mouth of that name. The St. George's and Sulina mouths still remain in the possession of Roumania, which moreover is compensated for her loss of Bessarabia by the acquirement of the Dobrudscha, extending to the Gulf of Mangalin, and including Silistria. Her independence has also been proclaimed, subject to the same condition—of perfect equality of all creeds and races—as had been imposed upon Servia. Kustendjie, however, although nominally belonging to Roumania, has been declared a free port.

The Montenegrin question was also practically settled at the same sitting, Montenegro receiving the long-wished-for port of Antivari, and an accession of territory on the north and north-east—about half the quantity allotted by the Treaty of San Stefano—a curtailment due to the instance of Austria, which has also insisted upon Antivari being declared a neutral port, although open to Austrian war vessels. The exact delimitation of both Montenegrin and Servian territories has, however, been entrusted to a Commission appointed by the Congress. The chief alteration in the concession to Servia will be the widening of the military zone between the principality and Montenegro. On Tuesday, the Congress returned to matters more directly affecting the Great Powers, and the question of the free navigation of the Danube, and its mouths in particular, was discussed and settled on the basis of the existing regulations; increased powers, however, on the proposition of England, being granted to the International Commission. The vexed question of the war indemnity was also discussed, but no definitive result was reached beyond that Count Schouvaloff renewed his assurances that Russia had no idea of compounding with Turkey by obtaining a further cession of territory in lieu of the money. The matter, which so eminently affects the interest of Turkish bondholders all over Europe, will probably be handed over to a Commission.

Such is a brief resumé of the proceedings of the past week, by which it will be seen that some very important results have been achieved, the only important point as yet untouched being that of Batoum, which it is thought will after all be made a free port, as England is unwilling to see so important a naval station handed over to Russia, while Turkey declares her inability to compel the inhabitants to submit to be handed over to Russian rule. Turkey, also, is still protesting strongly against the Austrian occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and although reminded by Prince Bismarck that Congress has restored to her a rich province, and that if she accepts part she is bound to accept the whole of the decisions of the Congress, the Plenipotentiaries of the Porte still continue obstinately to refuse their consent to the measure. It is not thought likely, however, that the Turks will offer any forcible resistance, but it is probably felt in Constantinople that some show of opposition must be made in order to keep the fanatical portion of the community from rising against the Sultan. Nor are the other countries in the East very much better satisfied with the Congress award. In Roumania the Government organ denounces the action of the Berlin Congress with regard to Bessarabia as "the greatest iniquity of the nineteenth century"—the persistence of the Congress in enfranchising the Jews being regarded as insult added to injury. In Montenegro, also, there is some irritation at the comparatively small amount of territory awarded, while Servia is by no means satisfied at not obtaining a further increase upon the terms of San Stefano. In the mean time Austria is busily preparing for her occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and is making every preparation in the event of her encountering any serious resistance.

In CONSTANTINOPLE all at present is quiet, and the chief event is the death from typhus of Mr. Masters, the well-known Commissioner of the Turkish Compassionate Fund, whose portrait we published in our issue of No. 432, March 9th, 1878.

FRANCE.——The great national fête of Sunday last has formed almost the sole topic of the week. The day was fortunately fine, the proceedings passed off without any untoward incident, and may be pronounced to have been an unqualified success. The streets were everywhere profusely decorated from end to end of the capital—the Faubourg St. Germain perhaps excepted—the poorer and artisan quarters showing an especial enthusiasm by completely draping the houses in the humbler streets. Almost every arrondissement also had organised a special fair, with booths, pole climbing, and races, while the public programme was inaugurated by the firing of cannon in the early morning, and by the unveiling of Clesinger's statue on the Champ de Mars by MM. Teisserenc de Bort and De Marcère at nine o'clock. The latter Minister took the occasion to make a thoroughly Republican speech—stating that "the Republican party had at last become the nation . . . . that France had resumed her place amongst nations; and, without setting up for a model, she could with some pride show the world the state of her civilisation." Throughout the day the streets were thronged by a perfectly good-humoured crowd in the best of holiday-making tempers, most people wearing tri-coloured ribbons, or bouquets, or little flags—the omnibuses and cabs being profusely decked with the national colours. In the afternoon there was a grand concert in the Tuileries, at which the chief pieces were a new composition by M. Gounod, entitled "Vive la France," and an excerpt from Victor Hugo's "Chants du Crépuscule," entitled "Gloire à la France," and beginning in the following not very lively strain:—

> Ceux qui pieusement sont morts pour la Patrie,
> Ont droit qu' à leur cercueil la foule vienne et prie.

The great features of the fête, however, were the general illumination, and the illuminated regatta of some two hundred small boats on the lakes of the Bois de Boulogne, which was itself a blaze of light with electrical lamps and Bengal fires, while the long avenue of the Champs Elysées, from the Tuileries to the Arc de Triomphe, was illuminated a giorno, the Place de la Concorde being especially brilliant. Various displays of fireworks took place, and the fête ended with a grand retraite aux flambeaux, consisting of four bands, 100 drummers, 150 trumpeters, 100 Cuirassiers, and 300 infantry soldiers, bearing lanterns or torches. It is impossible in our confined space to give a detailed description of the events of the day, but we may mention that it is said to have eclipsed all former fêtes which have been held even in Paris, and that the poor were not forgotten, a Government distribution of alms taking place in the morning, while twelve hundred and sixty-nine Communists received remission of their sentences.

Politically speaking there is little or nothing to chronicle. People profess themselves disappointed with the results of the Congress, and with England's action in particular, the Débats reproaches Lord Beaconsfield with deserting the colours to which he declared so firm an adherence, and the Temps declaring that "Congress has destroyed with one hand what it has built up with the other." The only home political item has been the reception by M. Léon Say of an English deputation protesting against the French system of granting bounties to sugar refiners. M. Léon Say, in a very courteous reply, told the deputation that they were mistaken in representing that a million sterling was paid to the refiners as a drawback, but that both he and his colleagues were opposed to the system of bonuses for exportation, and that the French Government is carefully examining the question, and is even preparing a Bill, and it is hoped that in the autumn they would be able to do something to remove all causes of complaint.—To turn to the Exhibition, the admission on Sunday was reduced for that day to twenty-five centimes, and next day four waggons had to be sent from the Ministry of Finance to fetch away the bronze money paid on the occasion, 130,000 people having been estimated to have visited the Champs de Mars.—The International Dog Show was opened on Sunday, the main exhibitors being French and English. The Prince of Wales carries off a gold medal for a setter, two silver medals for a mastiff and a bloodhound, and a bronze medal for a spaniel. Twenty out of the fifty-eight medals are taken by English fanciers.—The Literary Congress has come to a close after, in its final sitting, recommending the formation of a society of authors in each country, with an International Society in Paris.—Various other congresses are being held in the Trocadéro Palace, and at the close of last week there was a meeting of the French Geographical Society in the Amphitheatre of the Sorbonne to present the gold medal of the Society to Mr. H. M. Stanley, the well-known African explorer.—Another Parisian lion, the Shah, left for Vienna on Tuesday, the Marshal seeing him off at the station.

There have been some riotous proceedings at Marseilles, owing to the proposed removal of a statue of Bishop Belzunce from its present site, as also from the prohibition by the Mayor of the religious processions in connection with the Fête Dieu.

GERMANY.——The Emperor continues to grow better, and, Congress matters apart, public attention is absorbed in the forthcoming election and by a letter which the Crown Prince has written to Pope Leo XIII. It appears that in March the Emperor acknowledged the intimation of the Papal election by a courteous letter to the Pope, to which the latter replied that "he hoped that the good understanding which formerly existed between the Vatican and the Berlin Governments would be restored by a change in the laws and Charter of Prussia." To this the Crown Prince returned a firm though respectful refusal to modify the "Charter and laws of Prussia in accordance with the exigencies of the statutes of your Church." The Prince, however, concludes with a hope that, "although principles may clash, the conciliatory sentiments of both parties will open to Prussia a road to peace—a road which has never been closed against other States." The publication of this letter is thought to signify that all negotiations are at an end, and the manly language of the Crown Prince has excited general approval, although the Government can now hardly count upon Ultramontane support during the forthcoming election.—All strangers arriving at Berlin are required to be provided with passports or papers of identification.

SPAIN.——The greatest grief continues to be manifested in Madrid for the loss of Queen Mercedes, who has been temporarily buried in the Escurial, and the grief is deepened by the rumours already abroad of intrigues amongst the various parties whom the King's marriage had apparently cemented together. The King has decided to build a church near the Palace to contain a splendid mausoleum in memory of the late Queen.

MISCELLANEOUS.——From ITALY the only news is a demonstration at Venice against the Austrian Consul, who was thought to have prevented an excursion which had been organised by the young men of Trieste.—SWITZERLAND has been celebrating the much-discussed Rousseau Centenary with great fervour at Geneva.—In EGYPT great relief has been experienced by the beginning of the annual rising of the Nile.—In INDIA the weather is the great anxiety, but the meteorological reports are now more favourable, and moderate rain has fallen in Bombay and the Central Provinces. In Madras, however, the number on the relief works have risen to 135,935, an increase of 10,130. The Parsees who wished to form a volunteer corps have now been authorised to join any European volunteer corps already organised.—The Indian war in the UNITED STATES continues, and a success of the troops is reported from Curry Creek, Oregon, where the Indians were surprised and pursued to Stein's Mountain, where 2,000 warriors are believed to be assembled.—There has been more fighting in SOUTH AFRICA, where the Kaffirs have been still further defeated and Sandilli has been killed. The House of Assembly has approved of Sir Bartle Frere's policy by 37 votes against 22.

THE COURT

THE Queen and Princess Beatrice will remain at Windsor until the end of next week, when they will again leave for Balmoral. On Saturday Her Majesty drove out, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and Princess Louise Margaret of Prussia, and afterwards held a Council. In the evening the Prince and Princess Christian, Princess Louise Margaret of Prussia, the Duchess of Roxburghe, the Lord Chamberlain, Lord Henniker, and Lieutenant-General H. Ponsonby dined with the Queen. On Sunday Her Majesty attended Divine Service in the private chapel, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, Princess Louise Margaret of Prussia, and the Duke of Connaught, the Rev. W. Boyd Carpenter, Vicar of St. James's, Holloway, preached. On Monday and Tuesday the Queen took her usual drives with Princess Beatrice, and on Wednesday Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia arrived at the Castle.

On Saturday the Prince and Princess of Wales visited the ex-Empress Eugénie and Prince Louis Napoleon at Chislehurst, and in the afternoon the Prince, attended by his suite, took a trip on the Thames in a steam launch to Maidenhead Bridge. On Monday the Princess Christian, Princess Louise Margaret of Prussia, and the Duke of Connaught lunched at Marlborough House. The Duke of Cambridge and Prince Louis Napoleon also visited the Prince and Princess. In the afternoon the Prince and Princess of Wales were present at a garden party given by the Earl and Countess of Listowel, at Knightsbridge, and in the evening dined with the Earl and Countess of Wilton in Grosvenor Square. On Tuesday the Prince and Princess went to Bestwood Hall, Nottingham, the seat of the Duke of St. Alban's, and on Wednesday opened the Nottingham Castle Museum. As we shall probably publish some illustrations of the proceedings, we reserve any detailed account. On Thursday the Prince and Princess left Nottingham, for Peterborough, on a visit to the Marquis of Huntly and Earl Fitzwilliam, and were present at the Hound Show and Agricultural Exhibition. The Prince and Princess are expected to be present at the Maidenhead Regatta at Great Marlow to-day (Saturday), when they will probably join the steam launch at Maidenhead Bridge, and proceed down the river to Temple House, the seat of Colonel Williams. The Prince and Princess are unable to be present at the approaching Norwich Festival.

The Princess Louise last week visited the Exhibition of Paintings on China at Messrs. Howell and James's Art Galleries, and consented to become a patroness of the Exhibition. The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne are staying at Cumberland Lodge on a visit to the Prince and Princess Christian. Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia and suite went to the Royal Aquarium, Westminster, on Saturday, and on Monday, accompanied by Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, inspected the fleet assembled in the Portland Roads, and witnessed some torpedo practice.—The Grand Duke and Duchess of Hesse Darmstadt left for England on Wednesday.—The Duke of Cambridge arrived at Gloucester House from Malta on Sunday morning.—The report of a projected marriage between the Princess Thyra of Denmark and Prince Louis Napoleon is gaining ground.—In consequence of the death of the Queen of Spain, the Court will go into mourning until the 19th inst., half mourning being worn after the 12th inst.—The betrothal of Prince Eugène, Duke of Leuchtenberg, to Mdlle. Skobeleff, sister of the well-known Russian General, is reported from St. Petersburg.—The death of the Emperor of Morocco is announced.

CHURCH NEWS

THE PAN-ANGLICAN SYNOD.——The long-talked-of gathering of the Bishops of the Anglican Communion was commenced at Lambeth Palace on Tuesday, when nearly one hundred prelates received the Sacrament from the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury. They assembled in the Guard Room, and walked thence, in procession, to the Chapel, where the Communion Service was performed, and a sermon was preached by the Archbishop of York. After the service they were photographed in their robes, in front of the Palace, and in the afternoon the opening meeting of the Synod was held in the Library, the inaugural address being delivered by the Primate as President, who urged the importance of letting the great question of promoting Gospel truth, in the face of prevalent infidelity and ignorance, stand foremost, rather than the comparatively small questions of Church government and details of organisation and order, which must of necessity vary in different lands. The first subject discussed, "The best mode of maintaining union among the various Churches of the Anglican Communion," was introduced by the Bishop of Winchester. On Wednesday the Synod reassembled, the subjects discussed being, "Voluntary Boards of Arbitration for Churches to which such an Arrangement may be applicable," and "The Relation to each other of Missionary Bishops and of Missionaries in various Branches of the Anglican Communion acting in the same country." On Thursday the subjects were, "The Position of Anglican Chaplains and Chaplaincies on the Continent of Europe and Elsewhere," and "Modern Forms of Infidelity, and the best Means of Dealing with them;" and on Friday (yesterday), "The Condition, Progress, and Needs of the various Churches of the Anglican Communion." After this the Conference adjourns till Tuesday, July 23rd, when it will sit until Friday to receive and discuss the reports of the various Committees; the entire proceedings being brought to an end on Saturday, July 27th, with a special service in St. Paul's. The Times says, "It would be as impertinent to assume that the foreign members of the Synod have much to learn of us, as it would be unjust to the Primate of All England to suppose that he countenances, even tacitly, the suggestion that he should be recognised as 'Metropolitan of the Anglican Church.' The Church of England may learn, however, something from its guests, whatever they may learn from it. It may learn at least how an Episcopal clergy can maintain order and keep the reverence of its flock without the aid of the State, the resources of a State endowment, or the support and patronage of a great aristocracy." On Wednesday evening about eighty of the bishops dined at the Mansion House with the Lord Mayor. The Archbishop of York, responding to the toast of the evening said that though the Conference sat with closed doors there was no great mystery after all, for the first thing that brought them together was complete sympathy. They were not about to promulgate a fresh body of canons, and to force them on the world, or on that part of it which was English-spoken, but they were meeting together in council. The conflict with the powers of evil was a hard and difficult conflict. They wished to see their brethren, to see in them the power of the Lord Jesus Christ that they might be emulous of them.

VARIOUS.——The first anniversary meeting of the Reformed Episcopal Church was held on Wednesday, in Mr. Newman Hall's Chapel, lent for the occasion. There was a plain Church of England service, and an address by Bishop Gregg, who said that the Church of England was like a ship which, having started for a Protestant port, had changed its course, and was now sailing direct for Rome. He denounced the various superstitious tendencies, and the evils of sacerdotalism; and said that he considered the present Prayer-book was greatly the cause of many of the existing evils. The Reformed Episcopal Church had therefore entirely revised it, freed it from all sacerdotalism, had thoroughly uprooted all its dangerous dogmas, and the revised edition now in the press would shortly be issued.—The Mackonochie case was argued before the Queen's Bench Division during two days last week, but judgment was reserved. The Lord Chief Justice, after consultation with Justices Mellor and Lush, remarked that they had no doubt on the point that Mr. Mackonochie's offence was within the jurisdiction of the Spiritual Courts; but that it was a matter for serious consideration whether, under the statute, Letters of Request from the Bishop should not have been addressed to the authorities before the suit was instituted. It was quite clear that there were no Letters of Request putting the Court of Arches in motion; and, that being so, they had to consider whether the disobedience of the monition constituted such contumacy as to give the Judge of the Arches Court sufficient authority to inflict the particular form of punishment which had been applied.—The Revised Prayer Book of the Church of Ireland came into force on the 1st inst., and the first effect of it has been the formal renunciation of Church membership by Lord James Butler, the leading champion of revision in the General Synod. He says that there is less to offend the eye and mind in the halls for public entertainment and exhibition, than in the chambers of imagery which are rising or have been reopened as cathedrals in the leading towns of Ireland. These are all under the "Church of Ireland," and with its cognisance and sanction. For all that is true in that system he has the same love that he ever had; but it is overlaid with corruptions, which he thinks are increasing day by day.—Last Sunday being Hospital Sunday, special sermons were preached at most of the churches and chapels in the metropolis. At St. Paul's there were three services, the preachers being Bishop Claughton, the Bishop of Hereford, and the Rev. Dr. Barry. At Westminster Abbey Dean Stanley preached, and at both places the congregations were large, as they were also at the Chapels Royal Savoy, Whitehall, and St. James's. Mr. Spurgeon preached at the Tabernacle, Dr. Parker at the City Temple, and the Chief Rabbi at the Great Synagogue, St. James's Place. The Globe says that at the door of a West End church handbills were distributed suggesting that contributions should be withheld "till the crime of torturing live creatures be made penal by law." The amount of the collections received at the Mansion House up to Wednesday was 9,000*l*.—The 117th anniversary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel was celebrated last week by the holding of a Missionary Conference at St. James's Hall, the Primate presiding.—The Rev. S. D. Headlam, whom the Bishop of London recently dismissed from the curacy of Bethnal Green for having lectured in favour of theatres and music halls, has just been presented with 100*l*. and an address of sympathy, amongst the subscribers to which are Miss Helen Taylor and Mr. P. A. Taylor, M.P.—Mr. Cross has declined to receive a deputation from the Sunday Society respecting the "New Criminal Code Bill." He remarks that no change in the law is contemplated by the Code, and recommends them to apply to the Attorney-General if in their opinion the existing law is not expressed in the Code.—The Bishop of Lichfield has become a Vice-President of the Poor Clergy Relief Corporation, the annual sermon of which will be preached to-morrow (Sunday) morning by the Bishop of Manchester at St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, when the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs will attend in State.—The Vicar-General's Office, with authority from the Primate for granting marriage licences for London and the whole Province of Canterbury, has been moved, after fifty years, from Bell Yard to the first floor of 5, Dean's Court, Doctors' Commons, immediately opposite the Deanery House of St. Paul's.

RELICS OF MESSRS. MOODY AND SANKEY are now amongst the most precious possessions across the Atlantic. After some recent revival meetings at Newhaven in Connecticut, the tabernacle erected for the assemblies was sold by auction, and every scrap of furniture and fittings found eager purchasers. Chairs and benches went at large prices, and there was a lively competition for the mouth-pieces of speaking-tubes.

MUSIC

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.——The revival of Meyerbeer's Prophète, after an interval of nine years, has been found attractive more on account of the varied beauties of the music and the gorgeous splendour of the mise en scène than of anything very remarkable in the cast of the dramatis personæ. Fides is a character beyond the intellectual scope of that clever contralto, Madame Scalchi, who, when removed from her legitimate sphere, tries to make up for the absence of other qualities by giving forced emphasis to those with which she is naturally endowed. Such was the impression created upon many amateurs by her impersonation of Leonora in La Favorita, which otherwise merited praise; but in her Fides we are still more convincingly reminded of the limits within which Madame Scalchi's talent can be exhibited to advantage. After having said this much, more will hardly be expected; and, indeed, it would be unkind to Madame Scalchi herself, who, with her fine voice, and in her sphere, has always met with due appreciation, but who, notwithstanding her fine voice (which, by the way, she is beginning unnecessarily to force), is out of that sphere wherever high mental capacity is essential. Signor Gayarre's John of Leyden, to those who remember Mario, and after Mario, Tamberlik, in the part, must seem tame in proportion, whether regarded from a dramatic or a vocal standpoint. It has, however, unquestionable merit, and as times go, it would in all probability be no easy matter to obtain a more generally acceptable representative of the impostor king. The orchestra, under the direction of Signor Vianesi, played the noble Coronation March superbly; while the picturesque and animated skating scene, as lively and bustling as ever, was rendered all the more interesting by the admirably expert, and at the same time graceful dancing of Mdlle. Zucchi—a valuable addition to Mr. Gye's ballet company. The success of the Spanish prima donna, Mdlle. Cepeda, has been fully confirmed by her performance as Valentine, in the Huguenots. Valentine, as the opera is presented in London, has but two scenes in which a singer and actress, no matter how gifted, can find any chance of distinction; these being the interview with Marcel in the Prè aux Clercs, and that with Raoul, after the "Benediction of the Swords," in the house of Nevers, each comprising a duet which which alone would immortalise its composer. In both scenes Mdlle. Cepeda not only showed that the character of Valentine was just as much in her line as that of Lucrezia, but that Meyerbeer's music was no less familiar to her than Donizetti's. A little more physical force is all that is wanting. In the upper tones, which Meyerbeer seldom reckons upon for his culminating effects, the voice of Mdlle. Cepeda is somewhat forced, and therefore comparatively weak. This, in some degree, robs her most earnest efforts of their intended effect. In other respects the new prima donna is all that could be desired, both in feeling and execution; and her second essay before a London public may be pronounced in every way as successful as her first. She has true passion, joined to the power of manifesting it without descending to exaggerated emphasis or over-wrought demeanour. The Urbain (or "Urbano") of Mdlle. Anna di Belocca deserves a strong word of praise. This young and prepossessing artist is exactly fitted to the part, which she looks and acts in perfection. Nor could we wish to hear the tuneful air, "Nobil Signor," delivered with more charm of voice or unaffected elegance of style. The other performances during the present week have been simply repetitions. To-night the opera is to be Dinorah; and for Tuesday we are promised Flotow's last work, Alma l'Incantatrice. It will be welcome, if only because it is a novelty.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.——Since our last the event at this theatre has been the appearance of Madame Pappenheim as the devoted heroine of Fidelio. We may say at once that, though the ordeal here was far more perilous than that incurred by the heroine of the Huguenots, the German-American prima donna passed through it with equal, if not, indeed, with greater success. Madame Pappenheim is, in fact, a genuine artist, and it need scarcely be suggested that none but a genuine artist could have any chance of winning approval in such a character as Beethoven's Leonora. She must be actress and singer together, or the attempt is hopeless. Madame Pappenheim showed herself both, and that in a manner to admit of no denial. Indisposed at the beginning she was not completely mistress of her resources till the great scena which Leonora declaims in soliloquy, after having overheard (unseen) the dialogue in which Rocco, the gaoler, is incited by Pizarro, governor of the State prison, to the murder of his at once hated and dreaded enemy, Florestan. Here, showing that her temporary indisposition had passed away, she sang with no less vigour than sentiment, creating a marked impression by her thoughtful and touching rendering of the exquisitely beautiful apostrophe of "Hope." The absolute Leonora, the unmistakable Fidelio, was now before us; and from that moment the illusion was kept up to the very end. It must suffice to add that a more earnest and moving revelation of Leonora's suppressed emotion while engaged by Rocco in digging the grave where Florestan is to be inhumed after his intended assassination by Pizarro, could not easily be imagined. Then, the interposition of Leonora between her husband and his arch-enemy, the incident of the pistol, and from that to the triumph of Leonora, and the final duet between the heroic wife and the husband whom she has rescued from impending fate, were worthy the powerful and affecting situation, and rouse the audience from a quasi-lethargy to irrepressible demonstrations of approval. No more need be added to convince our readers that Madame Pappenheim's Fidelio was a success as honourably won as it was undisputed. The general performance of Beethoven's master-work had many points to commend. The Florestan of Signor Bettini and the Rocco of Herr Behrens were both comparatively feeble; but, on the other hand, the Jacquino of Signor Rinaldini was more than acceptable, the Pizarro of Signor Galassi was in all respects excellent, and the Marcellina of Mdlle. Bauermeister beyond praise. The chorus—especially in the scene where the State prisoners are temporarily allowed to see the light of day and breathe the fresh air (so eloquently expressed in Beethoven's music) left something to desire; but the orchestra, under Sir Michael Costa, who is never seemingly happier than when conducting Fidelio, was from end to end irreproachable. The great overture to Leonora, played between the first and second acts—the accepted "No. 3"—was magnificently executed, and unanimously encored, which prolonged the performance nearly three-quarters of an hour. No one, however, complained. One cannot have too much of Fidelio; and, as we all know, its performances are few and far between. Repetitions of the Trovatore, Lucia, the Sonnambula, and Carmen (to which we shall have again to refer) make up the history of the week. To-night we are promised Balfe's Talismano, with Madame Etelka Gerster and Mdlle. Caroline Salla in the leading characters. Again welcome!

WAIFS.——Madame Christine Nilsson left London for Paris, en route to Mont d'Or, where she will make a month's sojourn for the benefit of her health. She returns to England in the autumn, for a provincial tour, under the direction of that spirited entrepreneur, Mr. Hyatt.—Mdlle. Zaré Thalberg leaves London to-day for Barcelona. We are glad to know that this charming young artist will return to us next season. In her way she is a rara avis, and rare birds in these days are not to be lightly disregarded.—The health of M. Victor Massé, composer of Paul et Virginie, has much improved by his brief sojourn in the South of France. He is now at Montpelier, where it is his intention to remain for a considerable period.—The first two parts of Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen brought, in twenty-two evenings, no less than 14,000 marks (about 7,000*l*.) to the treasury of the Leipsic Opera House. The remaining two parts are in preparation.—Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's "Biblical Idyll," Rebecca, has been performed, with great success, under the direction of its eminent composer, by the Association for Classical Sacred Music at Stuttgart. Why do we never hear any of Hiller's sacred compositions in this country? What Mendelssohn thought of his contemporary and intimate friend is known to all who have perused the very interesting correspondence of that veritable "last of the Romans."—The Grand Opera in Paris is to be opened gratuitously every Sunday during the International Exhibition, for the convenience of foreigners and so-styled "provincials," who will thus be able to inspect what Parisians look upon with admiring eyes, as a world's wonder, but which inquiring strangers are apt to regard as a wanton expenditure, of invaluable space, for the sake of a show, meaning absolutely nothing. The old "foyer" in the Rue Lepelletier, where people congregated and exchanged opinions between the acts of a new opera, answered every purpose.—Both Le Nozze di Figaro and Il Barbière di Siviglia have been reset by adventurous young Italian musicians. On Rossini being invited to compose new music for Don Giovanni his answer was, "Vous vous moquez de moi. Mozart n'est pas Paesiello." That Rossini reset the Barbière of Paesiello is notorious, but that he was too clever to enter the lists with Mozart is equally well known.

THEATRES

At the STRAND, Mr. W. S. Gilbert's half-farcical, half-satirical incongruity Engaged has taken the place of Our Club, the performance of which, in consequence of the company's previous provincial engagements has been suspended. Mr. George Honey created roars of laughter in his original character of Cheviot Hill, and Miss Julia Stewart's representation of the "gude girl" Maggie, was admirable. Mr. E. Bruce as Belvawny, Mr. Cecil Murray as Macalaster, Miss Louise Hibbert as Belinda, and Miss L. Telbin as Minnie, were tolerably good in their respective parts.

ASTLEY'S.——Mazeppa has again been revived at this house, the chief attraction being Miss Lisa Weber and her trained horse, the latter wearing almost as much clothing as the former. Mr. Augustus Glover is the implacable Tartar chief, and the Cruvelli troupe of dancers appear in two grand incidental ballets. The drama is only intended to run for a few weeks, while the manageress, Miss Virginia Blackwood, takes rest, prior to the production of Land Ahead, a new "Irish National Drama," by George Manville Fenn; and a new sensational drama of London life, by W. Muskerry.

At the CANTERBURY Hall, the spectacular entertainment of Plevna, which by the way seems to be as popular as ever with all classes of sightseers, even the Maharajah of Johore being one of the audience last Monday, has been supplemented with a so-called political-musical sketch entitled Peace or War—A Sequel to the Conference, in which Messrs. Charles Otley and Russell Grover enact the chief members of the Berlin Conference. The portrayal of Prince Gortchakoff is the best done, but the remainder are far too bombastic and noisy to bear the slightest possible resemblance—even that of a caricature—to the originals. Moreover the nature of the dialogue, in which England is glorified at the expense of every other country, can hardly be termed good taste—even when viewed from the most ultra-patriotic point of view.

LEGAL

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.——A Treasury prosecution has been commenced against a Foreign Office writer, who is charged with "having committed a breach of trust in copying and appropriating and wilfully stealing a secret document, purporting to be a communication between the Governments of Russia and England;" an offence which Mr. Poland contends is "larceny," and, as such, punishable with three years' penal servitude, or two years' imprisonment with or without hard labour. The case has been adjourned until the return of Mr. Currie from Berlin, as his evidence is required; and meanwhile the offender has been admitted to bail, one of his sureties being the proprietor of The Globe, to which paper he is suspected of having sold the information for the small sum of 42*l*. We doubt if a conviction can be secured, as Marvin, who received a miserable salary of 10*d*. per hour, appears to have been employed in copying the document, and unless it can be proved that he carried off the despatch itself, or a copy of it upon Government paper, the offence will scarcely amount to larceny, whilst "breach of trust" seems to be excluded by the admission made by Mr. March, the Superintendent of the Treaty Department, in his evidence, that although Marvin had no authority to make use, outside the office, of knowledge acquired during business hours, there was no actual prohibition, or positive agreement not to do so.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——Two cases which have recently been decided by the Court of Appeal are worth noting as instances of the subtlety of the law. The first is that of a gamekeeper who had been convicted of stealing a bag containing twenty rabbits, which he had in his possession when given into custody. The Court, however, quashed the conviction on the ground that at common law wild animals could not be made the subject of larceny. The other instance was even more remarkable: a shop-boy, being detected in the act of stealing a cigar, made a statement concerning a man named Baker, which induced his master to instruct him to hand the cigar with some others to Baker, who after accepting them was charged as a "receiver," and convicted by a jury. An appeal was however made on the ground that the stolen cigar, after being taken away from the boy, ceased to be of the nature of stolen property, and the Court of Appeal holding this to be good law quashed this conviction also. Verily in legal matters "we must speak (and act) by the card, or equivocation will undo us."—The Sligo Steamship Company have just been fined 173*l.* for carrying 1,098 passengers on a steamer which was only licensed for 350. They pleaded that the people forced themselves on board, and that only 327 of them paid their fares, but surely the captain of the boat could have refused to leave the pier until those who had not paid returned ashore. What if the vessel had been wrecked with such a disproportionate freight of human beings?—The cost of the military and extra policemen at Accrington during the late strike amounts to nearly 400*l.* Forty of the 5th Dragoons were there five weeks, thirty infantry three weeks, and extra policemen seven weeks. The innkeepers charged 3*s.* 9*d.* per day for the keep of each horse. The Town Council will have to pay the money, and then get it back from the Hundred.—At Wednesbury, a barber has been fined one halfpenny for "following his worldly calling on Sundays." The magistrate said that he hoped no more such cases would be brought before him.—John Edward Irving, the swindler and thief who passed himself off as a relation of Canon Duckworth, and whose past career is well-known to the police, has been convicted, and sentenced to eight years' penal servitude, and seven years' police supervision.—Another impostor, who by his "conversance with Gospel Truth" obtained a number of suppers and shillings from a benevolent gentleman whom he robbed on the first opportunity, has been allotted five months' hard labour.—Messrs. Brooks and Sons, who have so often appeared as plaintiffs in actions respecting Fine Art Copyright, were last week defendants in a suit brought by Mr. Hughes, the painter of a picture called "Fighting for the Standard," the design of which they had unlawfully appropriated; an injunction was granted.—There was a disgraceful scene at the Clerkenwell mortuary the other day. While an inquest was being held, a drunken woman forced herself into the courtyard, shrieking that her child was being cut up. She was ejected; but in the confusion a man tried to steal some butter belonging to the keeper of the mortuary, whose wife he knocked down. The would-be thief, who bears the singularly àpropos name of Churchyard, has been sentenced to fourteen days' hard labour.

Ball's Pond Road, Islington,
December, 1877.

SIR,—I wish to inform you I have taken your PARR'S LIFE PILLS for forty-seven years, and no other medicine, and as I have always found them to do me good, I have recommended them to all my friends; and to prove the truth to you I have sent you a few lines, inclosed, which I composed and sent to one of my sons, with a box of your valuable Pills, begging of him to try them. I am now in my 77th year, and hearty and well, but unfortunately lost my dear husband five years since; but my dear children are my preservers, and I am as happy as any old maid. If you wish to make use of these lines in any way you are at liberty to do so.

E. J. CATLIN.

MESSRS. JAY
RESPECTFULLY request the honour of a visit from Ladies and Gentlemen visiting the British metropolis to inspect a variety of ELEGANT COSTUMES, Parisian Mantles, Artistic Millinery, Hats, and every variety in dress, specially selected by a very experienced modiste in Paris, and representing the correct fashions of the season.

The following extract from an American paper is a pleasing testimony to the system of business adopted at this house:—
"We visited during our sojourn in London last year the warehouse of Messrs. Jay, the most noted establishment of the kind in the world. In looking through its numerous departments we were able to appreciate the true cause of the distinguished success which has attended the establishment for many years.
"Messrs. Jay receive large supplies of costumes and millinery direct from the first houses in Paris, and they are sold at much more moderate prices than ladies can procure them on the Continent. We take pleasure in directing the attention of our fair readers to this time-honoured establishment, where we are sure they will be honestly and loyally dealt with."

THE ANGLO-TURKISH TREATY.——It was well known in English society that some such arrangement as that which has just been concluded between England and Turkey was contemplated; yet the publication of the Treaty took England as well as the rest of the world by surprise. The scheme is so vast, and may be followed by consequences of such enormous importance, that people could hardly for a day or two realise that it was anything more than a mere vague proposal. We are convinced that the more it is studied the more heartily it will be approved by the nation. Whatever the ultimate intentions of Russia may have been, there can be no doubt, as Lord Salisbury has pointed out, that her seizure of Turkish territory in Asia, if followed by no action on our part, would have thoroughly undermined the respect of the various populations for the authority of the Porte. Thus a process would have begun which must inevitably have resulted in a period of utter disorder, followed by the complete triumph of Russia over the whole of Asia Minor. Of course, were the destiny of these regions of no more importance to us than to the Germans or the French, we should have had no just reason to interfere. But, whether rightly or wrongly, the highest authorities in England are unanimous in their opinion that if we are to retain India it is absolutely necessary that an end should be put to Russian conquests in this quarter. That being so, the Government had simply no alternative but to act as it has done. An outcry has been raised with respect to the enormous responsibility we undertake; and it must be admitted that it would hardly be possible to overrate the difficulty of our new duties. The question for the country, however, is whether the price we pay is too high for the advantages we gain; and we do not think that on that point there will be much difference of opinion when the first excitement has passed off. After all, a nation which rules India without feeling the strain very severely need not shrink from fresh obligations; and it must not be forgotten that, while we shall be securing our own interests, we shall effectually promote some of the highest interests of humanity. These Asiatic races have for centuries been languishing under the rule of Turkey. Protected by England, they will by-and-by take courage; they will learn to believe in themselves, and come under the influence of Western ideas and aspirations. As to the manner in which the treaty has been concluded, we may expect that serious charges will be made against the Ministry. Englishmen who do not implicitly obey the dictates of party leaders will, however, listen with indifference to these accusations. They will understand that it would have been simply impossible for the Cabinet to raise the question in Parliament, and that it had ample reason to believe that its policy was in substantial harmony with the convictions and wishes of the English people.

THE NEW BULGARIA.——While the Congress have been sitting in friendly conclave at Berlin, and distributing to various claimants slices of the Turkish Empire, horrible scenes have been enacted in the region of the Rhodope Mountains, if we are to accept the testimony, corroborated by Consul Fawcett, of Mr. Bartlett, the Special Commissioner of the Turkish Compassionate Fund. The notorious "Bulgarian atrocities" of 1876, which aroused such an anti-Turkish sentiment in this country, and thereby gave the Russians their cherished opportunity of carrying fire and sword into Turkey without opposition on the part of England, were abominable and indefensible, no doubt, but still they were in the nature of reprisals. They were the outcome of an abortive Bulgarian revolt, accompanied by massacre. Terror begets cruelty, and the Mussulman minority, whose friends and relatives had been slaughtered by the Bulgarians, were not unwilling that the Bulgarians should be slaughtered in their turn. But the present atrocities, as described by Mr. Bartlett, are of a far less excusable character. The Russian troops are in military possession of the province, and they surely ought to be able to preserve order; instead of which, they are charged with actually aiding and abetting the Bulgarians in a systematic course of rapine, lust, and murder. If this is a fair sample of Russian occupation, it is plain that the less their territorial gain from the decisions of the Congress the better for the human race in general; but it is to be hoped that the frightful condition of this unfortunate province arises from purely exceptional causes. At all events, here is an opportunity for Mr. Gladstone. Let him investigate these facts closely, and if he finds they are substantiated, let him denounce them as eloquently and energetically as he denounced the atrocities of 1876. We shall then be able to believe that in the agitation of two years since he was actuated by genuine patriotism rather than by motives of faction.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE.——Many compliments have been paid to University College this week in connection with the celebration of its fiftieth anniversary, and it is generally admitted that they have been well deserved. It is difficult to realise that at the time of its establishment an Englishman who did not belong to the Church of England could obtain a University education only by attending a Scotch or a foreign University. Such, however was the case; and many religious people were horrified when it was proposed to set up an institution at which persons of any creed or none might receive an intellectual training of the highest kind. The experiment was tried, and it has been justified by complete success. Churchmen, Dissenters, Jews, and even Mahomedans have met at University College on common ground, and multitudes of them have acquired instruction there which has equipped them for useful and distinguished careers. The College, however, has been of service not only by educating youths of every religious type, but by practically proving that the methods of Oxford and Cambridge are not the only methods by which lofty culture may be communicated. No one who knows the great English universities would condemn offhand their system of teaching. It is well adapted for the class of men who attend them; but the tendency of those connected with them has been to look down with contempt upon Universities and colleges which move upon any other lines than theirs. University College has approached more closely to the Scottish and the German types; and the results it achieves are acknowledged to be thoroughly sound. The fact is of great importance, since it has encouraged the growth of similar colleges elsewhere, and may be hoped to be still more influential in the same way in future. The authorities of the college are about to make a new experiment by admitting women to its classes. They are to be congratulated on their courage; and we have very little doubt that long before another half century has passed they will have proved that they led the way in a reform of immense significance for the best interests of the nation.

CYPRUS.——A week ago most of our countrymen knew no more of Cyprus than that it was a large island somewhere in the Mediterranean Sea, and even persons with a taste for geography would have been puzzled—unless they were fresh from school—to decide offhand whether Crete or Cyprus lay most to the eastward. The promulgation of the Anglo-Turkish Treaty has in a moment raised the island from obscurity to celebrity. Able editors have been busily hunting up their gazetteers and all other available sources of information, and so it comes to pass that at the present time the majority of what may be styled "the well-informed classes" know rather more about Cyprus than they know about Bedfordshire. What the Germans call "earth-hunger" is a characteristic of all enterprising nations, but whereas Continental nations covet wide stretches of hill and dale, mountain and plain, the appetite of England, as befits a naval Power, has, within European limits, been chiefly satisfied with islands and maritime points. Such tit-bits of territory are more easy of retention than larger conquests. France in 1815 lost nearly all the territorial fruits of Napoleon's victories, whereas England is still mistress of Malta, Gibraltar, and Heligoland. To a country which rules so many dependencies, the acquisition of Cyprus would be in itself but a trifling matter; as, however, we occupy the island, not for its own sake, but avowedly as a barrier against further Russian encroachments, the annexation brings with it most serious responsibilities. The only really effectual way to keep Russia within her present limits will be for us to make Asiatic Turkey so prosperous and contented that there shall be no excuse for disaffection within her borders. This is a gigantic task, but it may be accomplished by the nation which has brought India to its present condition, and which will be able to take warning by the many mistakes which from time to time have been made in our Indian policy. If England and Russia both resolve to administer their respective territories in this spirit, there need be no jealous enmity between them, but, on the contrary, merely a generous rivalry. As for Cyprus itself, British occupation is pretty sure to be beneficial. Marshes will be drained, harbours will be improved, trade will be freed from shackles, and before many years one of its now almost deserted ports may become a Levantine Barrow-in-Furness.

ITALY AND THE PRINCIPALITIES.——The small States which surround Turkey are evidently intensely dissatisfied with the decisions of the Congress. Each of them hoped that it was about to receive considerable extension, and the hopes of all alike have been miserably disappointed. Austria, by obtaining Bosnia and Herzegovina, has acquired an influence over the whole of South-Eastern Europe that is sure to go on increasing. The Servians, Montenegrins, and Roumanians understand this perfectly, and begin to fear that they may one day find themselves subjects of the Austrian Emperor. It is said that in these circumstances they are looking to Italy for help. Russia they have every reason to distrust; if she were to defend them against Austria she would do so only to secure them for herself. But Italy, it is thought, would be more disinterested; at all events, any benefits she might hope to obtain would not be of a kind to hamper Slavonic aspirations. Unfortunately the Italians seem to be giving some ground for these foolish notions. Their newspapers are calling Count Corti severely to account for having sanctioned the concessions which have been made to Austria and England, and proclaim that the mission of Italy ought to be to encourage rising nationalities. It is to be hoped that the Italian Government will give no heed to wild talk of this sort. Italy has quite enough to do in looking after her own welfare. She has still to put down brigandage within her borders; and she has many hard problems to solve in relation to the Church before she can claim to be regarded as a thoroughly united nation. Moreover, the objects for which her sympathy is invited are in no sense worthy of it. Greece, indeed, may have before her an important future, and it may hereafter be the business of England, as well as of Italy, to aid Hellenic development. But the petty Slavonic States are far behind Greece, and there probably is not one of them which is capable of undertaking larger responsibilities than those which already devolve upon it. They so bitterly dislike each other that the best thing which could happen to them would be to obtain a guarantee of virtual independence under Austrian protection.

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING.——Those members of the House of Commons who wish for verbatim reports of their speeches should make use of the phonograph, which wonderful instrument will, we presume, reproduce every hum, and ha!, and gasp, and stammer, and needless repetition, and grammatical tangle. A specimen of such a speech, printed verbatim et literatim, would for once in a way be worth looking at, but we strongly object to its being done continuously at the expense of the country. It may, however, be suspected, that what the honourable gentlemen who cry out for more accurate reporting really want is not an exact reproduction of their oratory with all its faults and imperfections, but a reproduction with the roughnesses and awkwardnesses polished up into sense and grammar. This is exactly what the skilful newspaper reporters do at present; but then, unfortunately, they do not give everybody equal measure. If Mr. Bright speaks for half-an-hour, he gets half-an-hour's worth of print, whereas some lesser light speaks twice as long, and finds to his disgust that he is compressed into a dozen lines. Is there any remedy for this grievance? We do not believe in official reports, which would cost a great deal of money, would be very little read, and would, if subject to the subsequent corrections of the speakers, be scarcely trustworthy reports of what they really did say. But we think the arrangements of the House might be altered so as to give more accommodation to provincial reporters than now exists. A very few extra seats would suffice if it were arranged that those seats should be occupied by the reporters of those newspapers whose local affairs were under debate. For instance, if a Mining Bill were under discussion, the Staffordshire and Durham, Lancashire, Yorkshire, and South Wales reporters would be to the fore. As for those members who speak on subjects of general interest, but who nevertheless find their oratory mercilessly curtailed by the reporters, they may, although lacking Mr. Bright's oratorical gifts, borrow some useful hints from his method of procedure. If they will settle beforehand in their own minds exactly what they want to say, and then say it in the fewest and simplest words possible, they will not only be more fully reported, but will catch the Speaker's eye oftener than they now do.

ENGLISHMEN AND FOREIGN POLITICS.——It used to be a common saying that no people in the world were more ignorant of other nations than the English. And the saying was probably quite true, for Englishmen had too high a sense of their own importance to trouble themselves about other countries. At present they are in a very different mood. Events have absolutely compelled them to look abroad; and within the last two years they have read more about the leading nations of the Continent than at any time since the fall of the First Napoleon. It is to be hoped that they will not relapse into their old insular ways when peace has been finally secured. Nothing would tend so much to enlarge English conceptions and sympathies as some appreciation of our great rivals; and it would add new zest to the life of many excellent people if they took a genuine interest in important foreign movements. Above all, we should save ourselves from innumerable blunders by learning the exact facts respecting the States with which we are forced into contact. Who does not see that the mistakes committed by Englishmen at the beginning of these Eastern troubles were chiefly due to ignorance? Everybody now knows the objects of Russian ambition. Two years ago they were by no means generally understood; hence the mischievous agitations which encouraged Russia to serve humanity by slaughtering half a million Mahomedans.

A little more knowledge would have prevented politicians from making a spectacle of themselves by giving way to momentary impulses. Fortunately the country soon recovered itself; and it has not on this occasion had to pay dearly for being blind to circumstances which were obvious to the rest of the world. Unless we take warning by recent experience, we cannot be sure that we shall always be equally lucky.

THE NATURAL HISTORY COLLECTIONS.——Are we for or against removing these collections from the British Museum to South Kensington? Well, that depends on the view we take of the object of these collections. If they are intended for the entertainment of the public, we should say, keep them where they are, because Bloomsbury is within walking distance for most Londoners, whereas South Kensington involves a railway journey, which is a serious consideration to a humble paterfamilias blessed with several children. But if these collections are mainly intended for the benefit of scientific students, by all means remove them to the West, where they will have plenty of elbow-room, instead of being, as at present, jammed so closely together that it is often difficult to get a fair view of the various specimens. Why not, however, make a compromise? Why should not the bulk of the collections be sent to South Kensington, and a selection be still kept at the British Museum? The humbler order of sightseers, the young folks especially, are mightily fond of looking at birds, beasts, and fishes, whether alive or stuffed—they don't want an exhaustive collection—a few well-selected and artistically stuffed typical specimens would fully meet their demands. Otherwise, we fear the time-honoured old British Museum will become a dreary and unattractive place, for the average Briton cares very little for Assyrian and Egyptian, or even Greek and Roman sculptures. In order to feel a genuine interest in these antique works of art, some previous education is needed, whereas anybody can appreciate a stuffed giraffe. As for the Library, it is increasing at such a rate that it will speedily swamp all the other collections, unless the Museum authorities are empowered to use their option in accepting books. About the year 2000 the nuisance will probably have reached such a pitch that our descendants will celebrate the new century by making on Primrose Hill a big bonfire of the bulk of the nineteenth century novels, and magazines, and newspapers, and railway guides which their silly ancestors stored up so carefully.

HOMES FOR WORKING GIRLS.——We are glad to see that at the meeting held to celebrate the opening of the St. John Street Home it was decided to avoid big barrack-like buildings, and to keep these institutions within manageable dimensions. This decision was sensible in every way,—it avoids that outlay in bricks and mortar whereby so much good charitable money has been wasted, and it causes the so-called Home to be really more like a genuine home, and not like a union workhouse. Out of the thousands of young girls who are employed in flower, and box, and cartridge making, in millinery and clothing establishments, and all the other work of that kind for which girls are fit, and which they foolishly seem to like so much better than domestic service, there are many, of course, who have decent homes to go to, and these are comparatively fortunate, for no charitable supervision equals parental affection. Many, however, do not possess this advantage, they are orphans, or their parents are persons of such behaviour that they are better away from them. For such girls the Homes are a real godsend, and the fact that there they will be visited by ladies who will take a kindly interest in them will have a humanising and refining effect on them. As a rule, factory girls know nothing of women of higher rank than themselves, and hence they are far inferior in manners and deportment to the majority of maidservants, a point which does not escape the notice of respectable men of their own condition who are contemplating marriage.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

THE DEATH OF THE QUEEN OF SPAIN

INTENSE sympathy has been aroused throughout Spain by the death of the youthful Queen, and when, on Friday, the 28th ult., the day following the Queen's death, her body lay in state in the Salon de las Columnas, in the Royal Palace at Madrid, some seventy thousand persons were admitted to take a last look at their Queen, in the very hall where, but a few months ago, she had held her bridal festivities. The body was exposed in a chapelle ardente, upon a richly decorated bed, guarded by halberdiers, knights, and lords-in-waiting. On the next day a Mass was said in the hall, at which the Ministers, Grandees, and the various Foreign Plenipotentiaries were present, and then a procession was formed to convey the body to the railway station, whence it was to be taken by train to the Escurial for temporary interment. After the Mass, therefore, the coffin was carried by eight grandees of Spain to a magnificent hearse, which was drawn by eight white horses decked with golden plumes, led by footmen in the full livery of the Palace, but without any sign of mourning. "They were," the correspondent of The Times writes, "the same horses which conducted the Queen as a bride from the Church of the Atocha to the Palace." Behind the hearse came the clergy, and then some of the Ministers and the chief of the Queen's household, the cortège being escorted by detachments of infantry and artillery. At the station the coffin was transferred to the train, and, on its arrival at the Escurial, was taken to the chapel, where it awaits the official funeral which was to take place Thursday. The Queen's remains will eventually rest in a monument especially erected for her by the King; for, as she has died without issue, she is not entitled to interment in the Panteon de los Reyes, and the Tomb of the Kings in the Escurial.

THE SERVIAN AND MONTENEGRIN DELEGATES AT THE BERLIN CONFERENCE

M. RISTICS, who has been to Berlin in order to keep a careful watch over Servian interests, and to take care that his country secures a full share of the division of Turkish spoil which has been taking place under the supervision of the Congress, is the Premier and Foreign Minister of Servia, and has been the constant and truthful adviser of Prince Milan Obrenovitch throughout the whole of the present crisis in the East. He was at the head of affairs when, in August, 1876, Servia suddenly and somewhat unexpectedly declared war against Turkey, and, notwithstanding all the reverses of the Servian troops, remained almost to the last the leader of the "War-to-Death party." Notwithstanding the pacific tendencies of the Prince, he persuaded him to break off the negotiations for a truce which, at the instance of England, were being carried on in September, 1876, but joined the Prince in repudiating General Tchernaieff's action in proclaiming Prince Milan King of Servia, considering the step—as, under the circumstances, it certainly was—eminently impolitic and premature. After the disasters of Djunis and Alexinatz, however, M. Ristics was obliged to adopt a more pacific tone, and, after the Constantinople Conference had failed to induce the Porte to come to a satisfactory settlement, he concluded peace with Turkey by direct negotiations. Last December, however, war was once more declared against Turkey, and now M. Ristics is patiently awaiting the decision of the Congress which is to reward him for all the labours of the past years, and restore to him some of the popularity which at one time, in the height of Servia's misfortunes, had completely deserted him in his own country, where he was looked upon as the prime cause of all her sufferings. The rectification of frontiers, however, which are now being deliberated, and in which Servia will largely share, will speedily restore him to popular favour, and he will be deservedly ranked amongst one of the most patriotic, hard-working, and far-seeing Ministers whom the little State has yet had at the head of affairs. Our portrait is from a photograph by M. Walery, 9*bis*, Rue de Londres, Paris.

M. BOGIDAR PETROVICH is a young man of thirty-three, and is the person next in importance to the Prince, as head of the junior branch of the reigning family, the senior consisting at present only of his second cousin, Nicholas I., and his son, a little boy of seven. He is President of the Senate, the Supreme Court, and the Privy Council, and has been educated at Paris, at the College Louis-le-Grand, and the École de Droit. He has held his official position ever since his return, at the age of twenty-two; and has, besides, fulfilled many important missions abroad, and commanded armies in the field. In the campaign of 1876 he had command of the Southern Army, and inflicted great losses on the Turks at Fundina, Medum, and Rogani, though terribly overmatched. After the armistice he went to Constantinople to negotiate, and returned in May, 1877, to resume his former command. During Suleiman Pasha's dangerous operations, he was left with a mere handful of men to hold in check Ali Saib's formidable force, and contrived, by his cool daring, activity, and vigilance, to head back with great slaughter every attempt of an enemy ten times as strong. He has now been sent to Berlin to attend the Congress as consultative delegate for Montenegro.—Our portrait is from a photograph by Herr Adele of Vienna.

THE ROYAL CALEDONIAN BALL

THE annual fancy dress ball, under the patronage of the Queen, for the benefit of the Royal Caledonian Asylum and the Royal Scottish Hospital, took place at Willis's Rooms on Friday night, the 28th ult., under the patronage of a long array of ladies connected with the leading Scottish families. Owing to the Court mourning, the Prince and Princess were unable to attend, and the same cause kept many others away.

The regulation that "no gentleman can be admitted to the ball unless in the Highland garb, full Court dress, fancy dress, or uniform," was strictly observed. The Scotch gentlemen present generally wore the Highland dress, and the military and naval uniforms were numerous. The fancy dresses outnumbered those of last year, and were often very becoming.

At ten o'clock the boys and girls of the Caledonian Asylum, 110 in number, arrived, and presently, headed by the Prince of Wales's Piper, formerly a boy in the school, marched round the ball-room.

The company numbered about 600, including two distinguished foreigners, the Prince Imperial and the King of Bonny. If the band in the course of the evening chanced to play "Cam' ye by Athol," his West African Majesty may easily have taken the refrain "Bonnie Prince Charlie," as a personal compliment. The chief terpsichorean attractions of the ball were the Highland Quadrille and another fancy quadrille.

"To me," says our artist, "the feature of the evening was the spirit thrown into the dancing, the result no doubt of the Scotch reels that were danced and the schottisches which followed. The reels, together with some quadrilles, were danced by prearranged sets, and my picture represents one of these, the ladies in which wore all a similar dress, as I have represented. All the men in these dances were, of course, in kilts, and they generally were piped to by the bagpipes, not appearing to relish the band so well as the pipes. In one reel there is a particular feature where the men turn their partners as I have shown, and this I selected to draw. These usually unemotional people became quite carried away by the esprit of their national dance, and the ladies danced as one seldom sees ladies do in a ball-room, and the men shrieked the peculiar noise that generally accompanies the dancing of the reel, till I thought hydrophobia was setting in."

"AMONGST ALIENS"

A NOVELETTE by Mrs. T. A. Trollope, is commenced on page 37.

CAT v. DOG

THE aim of the artist in this picture, or rather series of pictures, is to show that the dog is a much nicer animal than the cat, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to reverse his present fiscal arrangements, and lay a tax on cats, allowing dogs to go scot free. He contrasts the good deeds of caninity with the evil deeds of felinity. In the centre a Newfoundland dog is saving from drowning a child who has tumbled into the water while trying to get his boat; while all around are depicted the misdeeds of Pussy, such as the nocturnal symphony, poaching, breaking china, stealing cream, wrecking flower-beds, and preying on goldfish and canaries.

This picture, we suspect, will cause some considerable indignation among the Pussophils, who will stigmatise it as very unfair and one-sided. Let us, then, take a brief on their behalf, and defend the cat against his detractors. Even the good deed depicted in the centre can only be justly attributed to one or two breeds of dogs; the majority of dogs are as unlikely to save a child from drowning as a cat, being equally destitute of the physical strength, or the aptitude for swimming. Then, as for Pussy's misdeeds, can they not all be matched by the canine tribe? When a dog makes night hideous by baying the moon it is quite as disagreeable to an uneasy sleeper as when a tom cat serenades one or more of his sweethearts on the house-top. Do dogs never worry sheep, catch hares and rabbits, or chase fowls and ducks about? As for cream-stealing, a prudent dairymaid is quite as careful to keep a dog out of her domain as a cat. Judging from our own experience, dogs do quite as much harm in gardens digging holes as cats; and, as for mischief, a puppy is quite as troublesome and far more clumsy than a kitten. We admit that dogs do not meddle with singing birds and goldfish and that cats occasionally do, but may we not place against this the vast services rendered by cats in keeping down the pest of rats and mice? Some dogs will kill rats readily enough, but they will not be at the trouble of lying in wait for them as cats will. When we add to this that you cannot approach many houses without being saluted by a snarling, yelping brute of a dog, and that some of these pets give out a very offensive odour (a fact of which their owners never seem aware), and that that frightful malady, rabies, is originally developed in dogs not in cats, we think we, who, personally, are lovers of both dogs and cats, have said enough to prove that, if cats can be a nuisance, dogs are sometimes a still greater nuisance.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION—THE VICTORIAN COURT

THE Australian Colonies, as a whole, are especially well represented at the Paris Exhibition, where each political division of the great island-continent possesses a small section to itself, in which it can display its own particular manufactures and products to the best advantage. Amongst the foremost of the groups comes the Victorian Court, a view of which is depicted in our illustration, and which contains a very fair collection of the exhibits of that colony. One of the chief features of the Court is a yellow obelisk, showing the amount of gold taken from each mine; while in the centre of the section is a grand trophy, around which stand figures of diggers, of stock-drivers, and of natives. There are minor trophies of cloth, bottles of wine, and biscuits; while wool, preserved meats, furs, models of the fruits grown in the colony, native-raised silk, and even chemicals, metal castors, carriages, and billiard-tables, form a prominent part of the display. One of the prettiest exhibits is a case of emus' eggs, handsomely and tastefully set in silver. The mineral exhibit is exceedingly good, as might have been expected, the cases of auriferous quartz and "wash-dirt" being especially interesting. Altogether the whole Court, and the careful and thoughtful manner in which the exhibits have been arranged, reflect great credit upon the gentlemen in charge.

FREDERICK LEIGHTON, R.A.

MR. LEIGHTON was born at Scarborough, December 3rd, 1830, and early evinced a passion for painting. He began his studies in Rome at the age of eleven, and diligently prosecuted them for many years both in that city, at Berlin, Frankfort, and Paris, profiting also by the counsel and aid of Hiram Powers, Robert Fleury, and Ary Scheffer. His large picture of "Cimabue," representing the triumphant procession through the streets of Florence of that painter's picture of the "Madonna," was exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1855. Coming from a native artist, till then unknown in England, it made a great impression on the public, and was at once purchased by the Queen. We need not here give a list of the numerous pictures which Mr. Leighton has since painted, and which have completely fulfilled the distinguished promise which his earlier works indicated, but we may add that he has also executed many drawings for book illustrations, among which may be specially mentioned his designs for George Eliot's Florentine tale of "Romola." "Whatever diversity of opinion," says a judicious critic, "may exist respecting some characteristics of Mr. Leighton's art, it is universally admitted that no English painter's works are distinguished in greater, or perhaps equal degree, by the attribute of style; that is to say, as preserved on the Continent by long and uninterrupted adherence to the examples and traditions of the schools, especially that of Venice."—Our engraving, which forms the frontispiece to Vol. XVII., is from a drawing from life, by Mr. Leslie Ward.

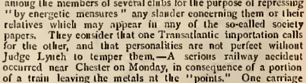
THE FÊTES AT OSTEND.—II.

THERE is nothing to add to the account which we gave last week of these festivities. Watering-places, especially French watering-places, are always gay and lively in the season; and the scene which our artist has depicted may be witnessed every day. The "Baigneurs" and "Baigneuses" are "common objects" by the sea shore, and very amusing it is to watch them giving a "young duchess" her matutinal dip, or to listen to their chatter and gossip after the tide has gone out and the labours of the day are over. When tired of listening to them, we can stroll through the crowd of loiterers on the "Plage," past innocent youth in the persons of little Mary and Jane paddling knee-deep in the water, and comfortable old age in that of Herr Doctor, who is enjoying a cigar and a glass after his morning's dip; and so onward towards the pier, where we can hire a fishing-net or line, or if too languid for even that pastime, climb up to the grassy downs, and there indulge in a siesta, like "Mossoo," who thinks it so jolly to dream away one's hours.

HOME.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.——The chief news of the week has been the announcement of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, signed so long ago as the 4th ult., by which the island of Cyprus is to be assigned to and occupied by England, who undertakes to assist Turkey against any future invasion of her Asiatic territory by Russia. Opinions naturally differ very widely, both as regards the policy of this transaction, and the secrecy with which it has been carried out. The Times says that the great moral justification of the measure is, that it will be in every way to the advantage, not merely of the Sultan, but of the populations of the East. The Morning Post thinks that the only drawback to the feeling which it must excite is the deep regret that this simple, natural, and distinctive exercise of British power and British statesmanship has been delayed so long. The Standard contends that it would be difficult to conceive a more important step, or one better calculated to reconcile the English nation to occurrences they were naturally disposed to deplore. The Daily Telegraph is certain that public opinion throughout the country will hail the Convention as a stroke of most masterly and far-seeing policy, which in an instant reverses and remedies all the evil effects of the recent war upon British interests, at the same time exhibiting British power to the Eastern world in the best possible light, free on one side from the shadow of fear, and on the other from the taint of selfishness. The Pall Mall Gazette has reason to believe that the agreement was officially known to almost all the Powers represented at the Congress, and remarks that the Government ask no more and undertake no more than is absolutely needed for the purpose in view, and that the moderate and unpretentious character of the Treaty will do much to reconcile a grudging opposition to the scheme. On the other hand, the Daily News considers that we have had thrust upon us a task involving limitless cost, unceasing stress, strain, and danger, a sort of task which, we may fairly say, has never in history been satisfactorily performed, or ended in anything but failure, and that this has been put upon England without her consent, without her knowledge, and in disregard of the settled practices of her constitutional system. The Guardian says that cautious Englishmen will feel that Lord Beaconsfield, by committing the country, so far as with him lies, to deal a blow in a certain contingency, has really made it more vulnerable. We have an immediate sensation like that of an electric shock, and an uncomfortable assurance that a coming earthquake is possible. The Nonconformist thinks that fearful responsibilities have been brought upon the British people by the development of Lord Beaconsfield's fantastic Oriental policy. It means a larger army and fleet and a yearly increase of expenditure which would pay for the fee simple of the island of Cyprus ten times over. We have taken upon ourselves to make a nation out of the most varied, fanatical, and heterogeneous materials. The prospect is truly appalling. Modern history does not record an instance in which so stupendous a task has been undertaken on such slight pretences.—The National Federation of Liberal Associations have issued a circular declaring that the conclusion of such an alliance between the Government of the Queen and that of the Sultan at the request of the former and without the knowledge of Parliament is inimical to the interests of the nation and dangerous to the liberties of the people.—The Metropolitan Conservative Association have resolved to give Lord Beaconsfield a grand reception on his return from Berlin. A congratulatory address is to be presented to him on his arrival at Charing Cross, and the members of the deputation will line the road from the railway terminus to Whitehall.—Sir Stafford Northcote met with a slight accident on Saturday last, striking his head against the framework of a partially opened window. The result was that he could not attend the meeting of the Conservative party which was held at the Foreign Office on Monday to consider the state of public business in the House of Commons, and Mr. Cross presided in his stead.—Speaking at a civic banquet on Friday last, Mr. Butt expressed a hope that Parliament would long continue to represent the intellect, life, and power of the nation. He believed that the Rules of the House were strong enough now to preserve its dignity and grandeur as they had done in past times of trouble and adversity.—Presiding at the annual meeting of the Cobden Club on Saturday, Mr. T. B. Potter, M.P. spoke of the satisfactory nature of the report, which showed that good work had been done throughout the year. Mr. Rylands, M.P., expressed his conviction that the club would find its work very difficult while the country was under the influence of the present Prime Minister. There was not a single principle lying at the root of Cobden's teaching which obtained the slightest sympathy from Lord Beaconsfield.—Mr. Bright, M.P., writing to a member of the United Kingdom Alliance, says that though he is in favour of legislating to promote temperance, he cannot vote for Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Bill, and he does not expect temperance legislation to make progress until the Permissive Bill is abandoned, and a more practicable and reasonable measure is offered in its stead.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The nineteenth annual meeting of the National Rifle Association commenced on Saturday with every prospect of success. Some modifications have been made in the arrangements of the Camp, and the telephone is to be put to a practical test for communication between the firing points and the butts. The prize list is almost identical with that of last year, the only difference being the addition of a Challenge Cup and goblets, value 150*l.*, given by Messrs. Mappin Brothers, the conditions for which are similar to those of the Loyd-Lindsay competition, each man being required to run three-quarters of a mile, taking two flights of hurdles en route, and fire seven shots each at 500 and 600 yards. The Queen's Prize and the St. George's Challenge Vase are the principle "events," the entries for the former being 2,500 as against 2,232 last year. Lord and Lady Wharncliffe took up their residence at the "Cottage" on Saturday, and the earliest regiments to arrive were the 29th and 37th Middlesex, and the London Scottish. On Sunday there was a church parade in the camp of the 1st Surrey, where Dr. Maclear, headmaster of King's College, preached the sermon. On Monday, the band of the Victorias played in the Umbrella Tent, and afterwards at the Cottage. On Tuesday there was a theatrical entertainment in the Civil Service Camp, and on Wednesday a concert. The weather hitherto has been favourable, and the shooting good.—On Tuesday, the foundation stone of an extension of the buildings of University College, Gower Street, was laid by Earl Granville, the occasion being the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of the institution. Mr. Goschen, M.P., Treasurer of the College, read an address, giving an historical narrative of its origin and progress.—The Royal Agricultural Society's Show was opened at Bristol on Tuesday. We reserve our account of the proceedings until next week, when we shall publish a number of illustrations in connection with the event.—On Thursday, the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London paid a State visit to Blackpool for the purpose of opening the new Winter Gardens there, the festivities in connection with which were to be continued yesterday (Friday) and to-day.—The new life-boat, Albert Edward, which the Freemasons of England have endowed as a thank-offering for the safe return of the Prince of Wales from India, was launched on Wednesday at Clacton-on-Sea.—On Tuesday, the Duke of Connaught presided at the annual festival of the Royal Masonic Institution for Boys, which was held at the Alexandra Palace. Lord Suffield, in proposing his health, congratulated His Royal Highness on his approaching marriage, and the Duke in responding said that it would touch her Royal Highness very much when he informed her of the kind reception which the first public reference to her name had met with in England. It was announced that the subscriptions from the various lodges amounted to 10,100*l.*, and that there were twenty lists yet to come in.—A party of working-men, consisting of one currier, two tanners, and one leatherdresser, have been sent from Leeds to the Paris Exhibition by their employers to report on the nature and class of work, the rate of wages, and the hours of labour prevalent in their trade in France.—The Examiner mentions a rumour that a Vigilance Committee has been formed among the members of several clubs for the purpose of repressing "by energetic measures" any slander concerning them or their relatives which may appear in any of the so-called society papers. They consider that one Transatlantic importation calls for the other, and that personalities are not perfect without Judge Lynch to temper them.—A serious railway accident occurred near Chester on Monday, in consequence of a portion of a train leaving the metals at the "points." One carriage was overturned, and several of its occupants were badly injured, one so much so that he died soon afterwards.—On Sunday, there was a fatal fire at Manchester, which resulted in the deaths of three children, and very serious injuries were sustained by a number of other persons.—The New Pallas district, County Limerick, which has so often been the scene of faction fights, was on Sunday night disturbed by an affray of a very serious character, in which the rival factions known as the Three-Year-Olds and the Four-Year-Olds, to the number of about 200, took part. Pitchforks, spades, reaping hooks, and every description of weapon was used with murderous effect, and many severe wounds were inflicted. One man, who was stabbed with a pitchfork, has since died, and his assailant has been arrested. The quarrel originated in a dispute about a stray cow which was alleged to have trespassed.



PARLIAMENT

THE monotony of events in Parliament was brilliantly varied on Monday by one of those surprises which Lord Beaconsfield apparently keeps in stock. The appearance of the House of Commons at half-past four indicated expectation. During the previous week the House has been rarely more than half full, and the members present consisted of the hard-working and steady-going class, who think that membership has its duties as well as its privileges. But on Monday the gathering was largely leavened by the presence of that still larger class of hon. members who look upon the House as a pleasant place of resort, where there is always something going on, and where occasionally (as at the opera) there is a special attraction.

The attraction in the present instance was curiosity to know whether a statement which had appeared in one of the papers was true, and whether Cyprus was once more under the domination of an English sovereign—a domination first achieved by Richard Cœur de Lion. One familiar figure was absent from the crowded benches. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, still suffering from an accident which, oddly enough, has not been attributed to Russian duplicity or to the secret action of Prince Bismarck, was absent, and in his place sat Mr. Cross, nervously gnawing at the place where, previous to his becoming a Cabinet Minister, finger-nails used to grow. There were numerous preliminary questions, most of them dealing with the Cattle Plague Bill, with which, it was understood, a private meeting of the Conservative party, held earlier in the day, had been chiefly occupied. When these were disposed of, the Marquis of Hartington rose and put the question which was on everybody's lips. The noble lord spoke in a light, almost scoffing manner, as if anticipating an immediate denial of the rumour to which he alluded. If this expectation was held out, it was doomed to disappointment. Mr. Cross, promptly rising, and easily assuming the position of leader of the House, read a reply which confirmed in its fullest details the rumour of the day. England had entered into an offensive and defensive alliance with the Porte, and virtually assumed the protectorate of Turkey in Asia, and, in order the better to perform her new duties, had had the island of Cyprus assigned to her. A governor had even been fixed upon for the post, and Sir Garnet Wolseley would, at long interval, succeed Othello in the governorship of Cyprus.

Mr. Cross read out this statement in a formal manner, and with close attention to the manuscript held before him. When he came to the portion of the statement which alluded to undertakings to be given by the Sultan for the better government of his subjects, a shout of laughter, amid which the tones of Mr. Mundella were distinctly recognisable, burst forth from the Liberal benches. The Conservatives answered by an angry cheer, and a pause was thus afforded sufficiently long for Mr. Cross to take breath in his hurried reading. When the noise had subsided, he went on as before, and sat down amid loud Ministerial cheers. The Marquis of Hartington, rising again, asked whether the Powers in Congress had been made acquainted with this momentous step. But Mr. Cross, sheltering himself behind a Parliamentary form, asked that notice might be given; and, upon a further question from Mr. Gladstone, referred the right hon. gentleman to the papers which were to be immediately forthcoming.

The Marquis of Hartington, apparently overcome by the new departure taken by the Government, was not in his place on Tuesday, and in his absence Mr. Forster pursued the inquiry as to whether the Congress had been made informed of the Convention. Ministers, however, were not inclined or prepared to answer the question, awkwardly fencing with it by stating that they had "no official information of the formal communication" of the fact. The same answer was given in both Houses of Parliament. The Commons having a morning sitting, it came on there first, and Mr. Forster seriously frightened Mr. Bourke by the emphatic manner in which he deprecated this quibble, and sternly repeated his question. In a state of almost ludicrous alarm Mr. Bourke held on to the manuscript of his answer, and timidly repeated its terms, though, in deference to the great and somewhat truculent authority opposite him, he endeavoured to vary its phraseology. The Duke of Richmond had the advantage of Mr. Bourke's misfortune, and when in the House of Lords the noble Duke, having made the same answer to a similar question from Earl Granville, was in identical manner pressed to be more explicit, he answered in an airy manner that would not have disgraced the Premier, that he "really could not charge his memory" with the fact. With this dual answer both Lords and Commons had to be content, and there the matter slept to come up later in the week, and promising to occupy with absorbing interest the remaining few weeks of the Session.

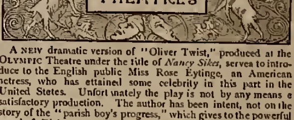
For the rest the business of the week has not differed in dulness from immediately preceding records. The whole of Monday night was occupied in saying over again all that could be said about the Cattle Plague Bill. A slight variation was made by the fact that the Government, possibly alarmed by the opposition of the boroughs, had agreed to a concession, whereby live cattle imported from Spain, Portugal, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, may, at the discretion of the Privy Council, be admitted into the country. Everybody knew that to make further speeches about the Bill after this would be a sheer waste of time. The concession, although not fully equalling the desires of the Opposition, marked the full length the Government were inclined to go at the present stage of the Bill. A great deal might happen in Committee; but of course the essential preliminary was that the House should go into Committee. This it did pro formâ at midnight, Mr. Torrens, who seven hours earlier had moved an amendment, being satisfied with the opportunity furnished to himself and his friends to make speeches. On Tuesday progress was made with the Highways Bill; and Wednesday was given up to the cheerful topic of Primogeniture, Conservatives and Liberals being for once widely and distinctly divided on Mr. Potter's Bill, cunningly but unavailingly designed to "put down primogeniture."

SPORTING

THE TURF.——The July meeting at Newmarket this week, was favoured with weather which few could mend if they had the ordering of it; and the presence of the Prince of Wales added a zest to the réunion. Though but few "foreign" horses from other English training quarters joined in the fray, the home contingent was sufficiently powerful to make up good fields, and supply most interesting contests. A "foreigner," however, scored first, in the shape of Lord Zetland's Hadrada, who won the opening event, beating the favourite, Ambergris, who could only get third. Julius Cæsar settled his opponents easily enough, in the Hundred Sov. Plate; and then came the race of the meeting, the July Stakes for two-year-olds. For this eight runners came to the post, and of course after recent running Ruperra, the newly-named son of Adventurer and Lady Morgan, was made favourite at 11 to 8 on. The race was really reduced to a match, and though Gunnersbury, who will still see a better day, made a strong bid for it, the favourite won without much difficulty by a length, Count Lagrange's Rayon d'Or being a bad third. Thus if there were anything like the speculation on the Derby which was the fashion years ago, we should have a strong favourite for the Blue Ribbon of next year. The talent were right again in the Two-Year-Old Stakes in spotting Massena as the winner, against whom they got the fair odds of 4 to 1. For the Cheveley Stakes there were only three starters, and 7 to 4 was laid on Trappist, but the erratic Chevron, who can go like the wind when he cares to do so, did the whole of the running, and won in a canter by two lengths from Camembert. On the second day, however, Trappist made amends for his defeat by winning the July Cup, and reversing recent running with Ecossais and Lollypop, who ran second and third, while Julius Cæsar could only manage to secure the fourth place. A field of fourteen contested a Selling Plate of 100 sovs., for which Captain Machell supplied the favourite in Vril, his recent purchase, who won easily by two lengths, and was bought in for 205 gs. Ambergris was again doomed to defeat in the Beaufort Stakes, Lord Zetland again scoring with Spiegelschiff. Though only three started in the Midsummer Stakes, the race was an interesting one, as Thurio, the Grand Prix winner, tried to give Jannette 8lbs. This he failed to do, Lord Falmouth's filly beating him by two lengths, and thus advancing herself to the post of next favourite after Insulaire for the St. Leger.—The sale of Mr. Blenkiron's Middle Park yearlings on Saturday last did not show as good an average as that of the Cobham youngsters, a little over 214 guineas being the average obtained. Only two animals reached figures, Lord Rosebery buying a son of Rosicrucian and Anderida for 1,100 guineas, and Mr. Oldaker giving 100 more for a bay colt by Maccaroni from Lady Sophia.

CRICKET.——Since our last notes two great matches have been played in London between the Gentlemen and Players. The first was at Kennington Oval, and was credited to the Gentlemen by 55 runs. For some time it seemed as if the professionals would be victorious, as the Gentlemen only made 76 in their first innings. The Players, however, could only put together 122, and then the Gentlemen followed with 202, leaving their adversaries 157 to get to win, a task they failed to perform. Mr. W. G. Grace showed us his best form, scoring 40 in his first and 63 in his second innings. The best scores made by the Players were Shrewsbury, 34 and 27. In the second match, played at Lord's, the professionals fared much worse than in the first, the Gentlemen winning by no less than 206 runs. Mr. W. G. Grace again made the highest score, marking 90 in his first innings. Selby, for the Players, made the next best, 88 being his figures. There will not be a third match this year at Prince's as last season; and it may be added that the Gentlemen in the recent contests have shown that they still are more than a match for the Players, as they have been for some years past.—It is agreed on all hands that two of the most enjoyable days of the London season were Monday and Tuesday last, at the cricket ground of the Orleans Club at Twickenham, where an eleven captained by Mr. C. T. Thornton, of hard-hitting memory, played the Australian team, who were the guests of the Club. A brilliant assemblage of rank and beauty was present, and some brilliant cricket was shown on both sides. Eventually the game had to be drawn, rather in favour of Mr. Thornton's eleven.—The Australians have also shown excellent play in Wales and at Stockport against odds.—Kent has been defeated again, Sussex winning the inter-county match by 57 runs.

AQUATICS.——For once Henley Regatta was celebrated without rain. The Thames R.C. beat Jesus, Cambridge, in the final heat for the Grand Challenge Cup; Columbia College, New York, won the Visitors' Challenge Cup for four oars; and the London R.C., for the ninth time, we believe, in succession, took the Stewards' Fours, the Sho-wae-cae-me-te Club, Munro, America, failing at last to keep the lead they held for a great part of the distance, when rowing about 46 to 48 strokes per minute. The Thames Challenge Cup for Eights was also won by the London R.C. The Eton boys made a good fight with Jesus College for the Ladies' Challenge Plate, but lost by two lengths. The pairs fell an easy prey to Ellison and Edwardes-Moss, of Oxford, the latter also winning the Diamond Sculls.



THEATRES

A NEW dramatic version of "Oliver Twist," produced at the OLYMPIC Theatre under the title of Nancy Sikes, serves to introduce to the English public Miss Rose Eytinge, an American actress, who has attained some celebrity in this part in the United States. Unfortunately the play is not by any means a satisfactory production. The author has been intent, not on the story of the "parish boy's progress," which gives to the powerful novel of Dickens an interest running through it like a silver thread, but only on Sikes, Nancy, and their dissolute and criminal associates. The idea, in brief, is to make Nancy, not Oliver, the central figure of the tale, and unquestionably the lights and shades of that subtly-drawn character might afford to a great actress fine opportunities for the display of her powers. The playwright, however, has forgotten that a heroine can only interest us in relation to a story which awakens sympathy. Nancy, in "Oliver Twist," has her allotted part in a great moral drama wherein the sombre tints are relieved by a predominating element of moral beauty. The plan of the American dramatist almost of necessity deprives the tale of this refining and ennobling element; and it must be confessed that he has taken no pains to furnish his work with any compensating feature. From first to last we are in the presence of hardened ruffians and mean pilferers, whose vile attributes are rendered more repulsive still by the grotesque exaggerations of some of the performers. A notion that the criminal atmosphere of the play might be rendered less oppressive by occasional scenes of a boisterous, farcical character seems to have taken possession of the dramatist's mind. Hence the scene changes now and then, during the five acts to which it is extended, from Fagin's lodgings to a street or a police court, where some curious proceedings take place, reminding the spectators of a riotous pantomime rather than of a tragic drama. To speak plainly, the vulgarity of these displays aggravates the offence, and renders doubly revolting the final scene in which Nancy is deliberately murdered by her paramour, and is seen slowly dying with a gash upon the forehead. Under conditions of this kind Miss Eytinge is not seen to advantage; but she gives some evidence of power, and now and then approaches the true note of pathos. The character is, however, not the Nancy of Dickens's creation, but altogether a more commonplace and inconsistent person. An actor named Searle—also, we believe, from America—plays the part of Sikes with a degree of quiet self-possession, and a suggestion of dogged obstinacy, and relentless determination of a highly artistic kind.

At the same theatre, on the occasion of the benefit of Mr. George Coleman on Saturday last, a new comedy was produced, entitled Viviane. The piece is founded on a story in the Cornhill Magazine, by the clever writer who assumes the pseudonym of "The Member for Paris;" and hence probably it is that his name appears in the playbill as joint-author with Mr. George Canninge. The story, called in the bills The Romance of a French Marriage, is that of a young lady who, blinded by love, persists in attributing good qualities to a worthless man until, satisfied of her delusion, she finally bestows her hand upon a truer and more worthy admirer who has heroically sacrificed himself, and generously protected her against her own follies. The story is too slight to afford matter for the three acts in which it is set forth; and the attempt to give it substance by the introduction of scenes of gossip, and incidents of a trivial and feebly humorous kind, were rather wearying to the audience. The comedy, however, supported by the talents of Miss Pateman, Mr. Vezin, Miss Brennan, Mr. W. H. Stephens, and Miss Massey (a pleasing young actress new to the London stage), was patiently received.

The GAIETY stage—by far the hardest-worked stage in London—is shortly to have a week or two's rest. Since the opening of this popular house, under the management of Mr. Hollingshead, nearly ten years ago, its doors can scarcely be said to have been closed. A new flooring to the stage has now become absolutely needful, and advantage is to be taken of the brief holiday for repairs and redecorations throughout the house.

The ADELPHI Theatre has passed out of the hands of Mr. Chatterton; but the change of management involves no change in the programme, Proof being still the chief attraction.

Mr. Irving took his annual benefit at the LYCEUM on Monday, when he re-appeared as Jingle in Pickwick and Mathias in The Bells. The success of these revivals has suggested the withdrawal of Vanderdecken, and they will continue to be played to the close of the season.

MR. AND MRS. GERMAN REED'S ENTERTAINMENT.——The new second part at St. George's Hall is of home manufacture, being the offspring of the imagination of Mr. Arthur Law. It is called An Artful Automaton, the "machine" being none other than a Mr. Crawley Slide, a scandalising journalist in a sea-side town, whose greatest delight is to pry into the concerns of every new visitor to the place. In pursuit of this objectionable hobby he gets into the drawing-room of Miss Prunella Fosselle, a lady of scientific tastes and occupations, where he hears a great deal to his disadvantage, and gets slightly punished for his impudence. Miss F. Holland was very good as Miss Fosselle, as was Mr. A. Reed as Crawley Slide; but the fun is rather forced, and falls somewhat flat after Doubleday's Will and Mr. Corney Grain's Paris Exhibition.

A NEW WEEKLY JOURNAL, entitled The Britannic, to be devoted to the interests of British subjects in the United States, will shortly appear in New York. At present there is no English newspaper throughout the United States.

Scraps

VICTOR HUGO, who overworked himself at the Paris Literary Congress, is now better, and has gone to Guernsey.

QUEEN ISABELLA'S JEWELS have been sold in Paris. The amount of the first three days' sale reached nearly 40,000*l*.

A MUSEUM OF DECORATIVE ART in Paris is being organised. Sir R. Wallace has subscribed 400*l*. towards it, and upwards of of 42,000*l*. has already been collected from other sources.

MR. EDWARD SAMUELSON, the energetic Chairman of the Art Committee of the Liverpool Corporation, under whose auspices the Autumn Exhibition of Pictures has been so successful since its institution seven years since has, we understand, retired from the Committee.

THE FINE ART JURY OF THE PARIS EXHIBITION have awarded medals of honour to Mr. Millais and Mr. Hubert Herkomer for their pictures exhibited. The other foreign medallists are M. Wauters of Belgium, Herr Mackart of Austria, and Herr Munkacsy of Hungary. The Frenchmen thus honoured are MM. Cabanel, Gérome, Meissonnier, Français, and Bouguereau.

THE GLASGOW FINE ART LOAN EXHIBITION appears to be a great success, the attendance up to last week being 45,000, and the amount to the credit in the bank being 3,000*l*. The Committee have now decided to keep the Exhibition open in August in order to afford English and other tourists when passing through Glasgow to the Highlands an opportunity of seeing the art treasures of Glasgow.

A SCIENTIFIC, LITERARY, AND ARTISTIC EXPEDITION is about to be undertaken under the direction of Professors Pauchich and Valtrovich of Belgrade, through the newly-acquired districts of Old Servia, for the purpose of examining the old churches and monasteries there, taking sketches of the historical remains and collecting MSS., and whatever other literary curiosities are to be found.

THE "NEW YORK HERALD" ARCTIC EXPEDITION for the discovery of the North Pole is in active course of preparation, and the well-known Arctic yacht, the Pandora, which has been bought for the expedition by Mr. Bennett, has been rechristened by him at Havre the Jeannette. She will fit out at San Francisco, whence she will start on her mission next June, taking the Behring Straits route. It is said that this little trip is estimated to cost its energetic promoter 40,000*l*.

COLOUR BLINDNESS OR "DALTONISM" is not uncommon in France. M. Favre's studies at the Académie des Sciences prove that no fewer than 3,000,000 persons across the Channel are afflicted with inability to distinguish colours. Women are far more predisposed to this affection than men, the proportion of the latter being only 10 per cent. Nine cases out of ten may be cured in young patients, the best mode of treatment consisting of methodical exercises upon coloured objects.

THE BURNING OF AN ICE-SHIP is reported from India. The vessel in question was struck by lightning, and the electric fluid passing through the deck and the foremast pierced a hole some ten feet in diameter through the ice, melting about thirty tons, and setting fire to and slightly burning some of the beams of the ship in its passage. This incident may account for the disappearance of many a vessel reported "missing," as lightning conductors are not as generally used on shipboard as they should be, from a mistaken idea which prevails that they afford an additional attraction to the electricity, and so endanger the safety of the vessel.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY IS TO BE OPEN FREE on three Sundays during the present season, namely, July 14th, 21st, and August 3rd. On July 14th it will be available only to the subscribers and members of the Sunday Society, but on the two following Sundays the public will be admitted by tickets issued by the Sunday Society, and which will be forwarded by post on the receipt of a stamped envelope. All applications must be by letter to the Honorary Secretary, 19, Charing Cross. In order that these visits may be as instructive and interesting as possible the Society has published a special catalogue, price 3*d*., which must be obtained before the visiting day.

SPIRITUAL DESTITUTION IN PARIS.——The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London "strongly recommend the effort" now being made by the Rev. J. Aberigh Mackay, Chaplain of the Marbeuf in Paris, to collect money for the rebuilding of his dilapidated church. The circular, containing the letters of the Prelates, says:—"For thousands of the English-speaking population there is no church accommodation whatever." There is a scattered multitude of "British mechanics, coachmen, cabmen, grooms, butlers, valets, couriers, guides, and their families, few of whom ever enter a church (partly because they have no church to go to) until they are brought, one by one, in their coffins, for burial. It is proposed to build a church, with 1,500 sittings, of which 1,000 shall be for ever free." The Chaplain is now in London. Address, 15, Harrington Square, N.W.

LONDON MORTALITY decreased last week, and 1,511 deaths were registered, against 1,570 during the previous seven days, a decline of 59, being 96 above the average, and at the rate of 22·0 per 1,000. There were 108 deaths from whooping-cough (an increase of 11, and exceeding the average by 65), 145 from diarrhœa (an increase of 73, being 11 above the average, including 109 infants under one year of age), 19 from small-pox (a decline of 19), 31 from measles (an increase of 7), 19 from scarlet fever (a decline of 4), 11 from diphtheria (an increase of 4), and 17 from different forms of fever (a decline of 2). There were 2,520 births registered (an increase of 260), exceeding the average by 228. The mean temperature was 60·1 deg., and 1·2 deg. below the average of the sixty years, 1814-73. The duration of sunshine during the week was 21·6 hours, the sun being 115·1 hours above the horizon.

A SINGULAR VENGEANCE UPON AN EXTORTIONATE LANDLORD was recently wreaked by an Englishman who, when travelling in Switzerland, had been charged by an innkeeper ten francs for a basin of bouillon. A few days after the landlord received an unpaid letter from another country, simply containing these words: "Dear Sir,—Your bouillon was good, but somewhat dear." In about a month came a hamper, with every appearance of being filled with unlimited patés, but in reality only containing a similar letter, the carriage of course not being defrayed. Then ensued a box, which arrived from the West Indies, labelled "Best Coffee." The landlord, delighted, pays the carriage, but only finds the inevitable epistle. Finally the joke became known, and was repeated at length in the journals, until the unfortunate landlord was compelled to sell up the hotel and to leave, to practise his wiles "in fields and pastures new." It is needless to say that the purchaser at once changed the name of the unfortunate inn.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——Though the Berlin Congress has not brought its labours to a close so soon as had been hoped, the members have been working hard, and the sittings have been more frequent and far more prolonged than during the two first weeks, the Batoum Question being somewhat more difficult of settlement than was expected. Frontier delimitations, also, and other minor details, have all contributed to the delay; while Lord Beaconsfield's coup de théâtre of the Anglo-Turkish Treaty and the occupation of Cyprus has not tended to precipitate the close of the Congress. Still, all things considered, matters have gone on very smoothly; and, although there have been some brisk discussions between the British and the Russian delegates, Lord Beaconsfield and Prince Gortschakoff are apparently the best friends in the world, and, if we are to believe a most gushing telegram from Baron Reuter, so far from being annoyed at the Anglo-Turkish Treaty (it is true that Count Schouvaloff knew of its existence three weeks ago), the Russian Premier declared that "he saw no difference between England's occupation of Cyprus and her occupation of Malta, and that he should always be pleased with everything that served to strengthen the English road to India, as calculated to promote the prosperity of the whole world" (!) After this we are told that a feeling of sincere confidence was established between the two statesmen, who shook hands "as a pledge of the new sentiments and relations which have arisen between the two Powers." To return to the Congress deliberations, the chief questions settled at the close of last week were the establishment of complete freedom of the Danube to all flags as far as the Iron Gates, which are handed over to Austrian keeping; and the settlement of the Greek demands, to which, on the proposition of the French Plenipotentiaries, the Congress replied by "inviting" the Sublime Porte to come to an understanding with the Greek Government for the rectification of frontiers, expressing an opinion that the line should be drawn from the Valley of Salambria, on the Ægean, to the mouth of the Kalamas, on the west coast. Should any difficulty arise, however, the Powers offer to act as mediators. As may be imagined, this has given little satisfaction to the Greeks and their partisans, who declare themselves bitterly disappointed at not obtaining a definitive cession of territory.

The question of Batoum came on for consideration on Monday, when Prince Gortschakoff at once declared that the Czar was willing to make the town a free port, and Lord Beaconsfield immediately announced that "England could not but be satisfied with the equitable and reassuring resolution of the Czar." Lord Salisbury, however, then rose and spoke at length respecting the unfortunate Lazis who are so stoutly rebelling against any idea of a Russian occupation. The Russians, however, although they have consented to the abandonment of the district of Bayazid, were not prepared to exclude the territory occupied by this people (ironically termed by Prince Bismarck "un tribu interessant") from their scheme of annexation, and consequently this question, together with that of the demolition and non-erection of fortifications at Batoum became the subject of active private deliberations which were not ended until Tuesday night. The Congress sat on that day, but was chiefly occupied with frontier delimitations and with receiving the Persian delegate, Malcolm Khan, and communicating to him the cession by Turkey to Persia of Khotour. On Wednesday the Batoum question was finally settled, the town being handed over to the Russians on condition that the harbour is "essentially" devoted to commercial purposes, but a large portion of the surrounding Mussulman population remains under the sovereignty of the Porte. The exact frontier line, however, is to be settled by a Military Commission. On the same day the "reading over" of the first portion of the Treaty of Peace took place—nearly fifty articles being thus definitively passed. On the proposition of the Russian delegates also Congress discussed the means of enforcing the terms of the Treaty, but at the suggestion of Prince Bismarck, decided to leave each nation to look after the clauses affecting its own interests. Lord Beaconsfield, being unwell with an attack of gout, was not present at the sitting.

The great outside topic of the week, however, has not been the Congress, but the Anglo-Turkish Convention, which was signed by Lord Salisbury and Safvet Pasha on June 4th. In a long prelude to the document Lord Salisbury states as the raison d'être of the Treaty in question that as Russia appears unwilling to recede from her determination to annex Batoum and the fortresses north of the Araxes, the British Government thinks that the various populations of "Syria, Asia-Minor, and Mesopotamia," seeing that Turkey has no guarantee for its own existence except its own strength, would calculate upon the speedy fall of the Ottoman Government, and would turn their eyes towards its successor—namely, Russia, who would thus exercise a powerful influence in disintegrating the Asiatic dominion of the Porte. As the British Government could not accept such a state of things in "regions whose political condition deeply concerns the Oriental interests of Great Britain," and as it does not wish to enter in any way upon hostilities, it considers that the best guarantee for the stability of the Ottoman rule in Asiatic Turkey would be "an engagement on the part of a Power strong enough to fulfil it that any further encroachments by Russia upon Turkish territory in Asia will be prevented by force of arms." This engagement England has undertaken upon two conditions, namely, that the Porte should give a formal assurance that the "necessary reforms will be introduced into the Government of the Christian and other subjects of the Porte in those regions," and that—in order that the British Government may efficiently execute their part of the convention—a British force should be enabled to occupy a position near the coast of Asia Minor and Syria—for instance, Cyprus. Accordingly, on the one side England engages—in the case of the Russian retention of Batoum, Ardahan, and Kars—that if Russia at any future time should attempt to seize any further portion of Asiatic territory, she will join the Sultan in resisting the aggression by force of arms, and on the other the Sultan agrees to execute certain reforms, and to assign the island of Cyprus to be "occupied and administered by England"—the island to be restored to Turkey if Russia at any time give up Kars, Batoum, and Ardahan.

The chief effect produced upon Europe by this Treaty has been one of astonishment, and there is a division of opinion in every country as to whether or no the step is likely to prove beneficial to peace. Considerable admiration has been expressed at the statesmanship of Lord Beaconsfield, and the step is universally designated as a masterstroke of diplomacy, but there are no lack of sarcastic remarks about the "unselfish policy of England," who has been so careful to secure her own share of the plunder, while France and Italy are by no means pleased at the Mediterranean being an English lake. From one point of view, the acquisition of Cyprus is certainly most valuable, as, being situated immediately opposite the mouth of the Suez Canal it will constitute a most convenient naval station. The Government is losing no time in taking possession of their new acquisition, as Mr. Baring is already on his way from Constantinople with the necessary firman, while orders have been given to the 42nd, 71st, and 101st regiments at Malta to embark for Cyprus without delay. Sir Garnet Wolseley will be the Governor and Commander-in-Chief, and his name is a guarantee that the island will be at least strongly fortified.

To return once more to the Congress affairs TURKEY has signified her consent to the Austrian occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina on condition that AUSTRIA should negotiate directly with the Porte, and 120,000 Austrian troops have now been assembled, under the command of Feldzeugmeister Baron Joseph Philippovitch, and are ready to march into the provinces. Opinion, however, is much divided respecting the advisability of the occupation, and in Hungary especially much opposition has been manifested. In RUSSIA great indignation has been expressed at the result of the Conference, and the "men of the pen" are declared to have undone what "brave soldiers had accomplished," as they do nothing but make concessions, and "are ready to accept any humiliation in order to obtain the approbation of Europe." GREECE is particularly indignant at having received no direct concession, and Athens and the Athenians are in a highly excited state, and are even urging the King to put himself at the head of his army, and declare war. ROUMANIA, however, is now accepting the inevitable, and is considering how her new territory and its ports can best be utilised.

FRANCE.——Yet another electoral victory for the Republicans who, at Sunday's elections, carried off fourteen fresh seats, in addition to two death vacancies, beating Bonapartist candidates at St. Girons and Cambrai, and a prominent Legitimist at Uzes. The Bonapartists, however, are triumphant in having carried three of the candidates whose elections had been annulled by the Assembly. Out of sixty elections which have been held since the meeting of the Assembly the Republicans have won fifty-one, and are now some 380 strong, having surpassed the magic figures of 373, and promising speedily to reach the 400 predicted by M. Gambetta before the last general election. There is little or no other political news, people being completely absorbed in the Anglo-Turkish Convention, with which the République Française, M. Gambetta's organ, is very angry, taunting England with assuming chivalric airs as the champion of Treaties and the Balance of Power, and then firing "a diplomatic pistol," which will not raise her reputation. The Temps is far more moderate; while the Débats, though acknowledging the advantage of the step to English interests, discovers that the whole scheme is given in "Tancred," where the whole world is to be regenerated by the co-operation of the Saxon and Semitic races. Most journals agree with the Moniteur that England has "taken her share of the cake," but the France in sarcastically remarking that "every national crow is carrying off a bit of Turkey," declares that France, by appropriating nothing, recovers what she had formerly lost—the respectful regard of her neighbours. "She has won something for the Greeks and emancipated the Jews." This, however, is no consolation to the majority of the anti-Republican papers, who seize the occasion to bountifully abuse the French plenipotentiaries, who, the Bonapartist Pays declares, have sanctioned a "host of iniquities." On the whole, however, the acquisition of Cyprus is regarded as a good stroke of policy on the part of England, who, to quote the Gazette de France, thus virtually "gets possession of Egypt and secures her route to India."

There is little social news even from the Exhibition, where the juries are busy at work, and where the international concerts in the Hall of the Trocadéro appear to be prospering. The last pavilion in the grounds has now been opened, as also the Pavillon de la Presse, and all Paris is looking forward to the inauguration of the gigantic captive balloon which is now nearly ready to begin its ascents. The innumerable Congresses of Civil Engineers, Psychological Doctors, Alpine Climbers, Hygienists, Demographists, Discharged Prisoners' Friends, and a host of other miscellaneous bodies, are being successively held, though they excite little attention beyond the immediate circles to which they belong; while the chess tournament continues, and promises to end in a victory for the Russian representative, M. Winaver. From Paris itself we hear of an "octave" repetition of the National Fête in some quarters, last Sunday, and of preparations for the fête to-morrow, in honour of Jean Jacques Rousseau, at which M. Louis Blanc, M. Marcou, and M. Ernest Hamel will speak, and of a proposed commemoration, with great pomp, of the first anniversary of the death of M. Thiers, M. Emile de Girardin, M. Thiers' electoral successor, being the prime mover of the proposition. In theatrical circles the chief event has been the successful production of an opera bouffe at the Théâtre Lyrique, by M. Emile Pessard, Le Capitaine Fracasse, the libretto being founded on Theophile Gautier's novel of that name, and written by M. Catulle Mendès. La Reine Indigo has been revived at the Bouffes; and a three-act comedy, Petite Correspondance (in allusion to the advertisement correspondence of the Figaro), by MM. Emile de Narjac and Alfred Hennequin, has been produced at the Gymnase, and is said to be fairly amusing.

To turn to the provinces. Marseilles is growing calmer, and even the Republican prints are blaming the Radical municipality for wishing to pull down the statue of good Bishop Belzunce, to whose heroic conduct during the great visitation of the plague in 1720 even Voltaire bears witness. At Boulogne the first stone of the new harbour is to be laid by M. de Freycinet, the Minister of Public Works, on September 2.

GERMANY.——The Emperor's wounds are now stated to have healed, he has been able to wear his uniform, and his strength continues gradually to increase. The would-be assassin, Dr. Nobiling, is also better, and being now able to speak, declares that he planned and carried out his crime alone, but that he communicated his intention to some of his acquaintances, whose names, however, he declines to divulge. No trace of any conspiracy has been discovered by the police, notwithstanding the most searching inquiries, but, according to the National Gazette of Berlin, the Austrian police have found ramifications connecting Nobiling's attempt with the Russian sect of Nihilists. Hödel, the journeyman tinsmith, who made the first attempt to assassinate the Emperor on the 11th of May, was tried before the High Court of State on Wednesday. He was found guilty, and was sentenced to be beheaded. He behaved with great levity throughout the proceedings and smiled when the sentence was pronounced.

SPAIN.—The funeral of the late Queen of Spain at the Escurial was to take place on Thursday. Representatives of all the Foreign Courts were to attend.—The express train from Tarragona to Barcelona was stopped last week by brigands, and the passengers, including an Englishman, Mr. J. Thompson, were robbed of all they possessed, even to their railway tickets.

INDIA.——Madras is threatened with another water famine, owing to the lightness of the monsoon, and prices are rising heavily. There is much fear of increased distress, and the Duke of Buckingham has recommended the institution of several large and important works, a recommendation which the Government has since adopted. In Bombay the rainfall has been very plentiful, more than forty inches falling in a fortnight—the heaviest rainfall on record. The relief of indebted agriculturalists from the money-lending harpies who prey upon the unfortunate peasant landholders, has been seriously discussed by the Indian Council. The extent of the evil may be imagined when we read that a peasant proprietor who had borrowed 10 rupees (1*l.*), at the end of ten years had paid on the same loan 110 rupees, and was still owing 220 rupees, having in this period accumulated thirty-three times the amount of the original. Another borrowed 17 rupees twenty years ago, and has since paid 567 rupees, and executed many bonds, two for 375 rupees still outstanding. A Bill is to be introduced for the purpose of remedying this disgraceful state of things.

UNITED STATES.——The Indian war continues and the troops are forcing the Indians gradually northward in Oregon to the Columbia River, which a strong force is endeavouring to cross. The Indians are said to be swarming over the entire mountain region, and skirmishes are very frequent, while great alarm exists throughout Washington Territory, and arms, ammunition, and volunteers are being sent to the front. On Saturday a band of fifty volunteers, under Captain Sperzy, fell into an ambuscade at Willow Springs, and all with the exception of seven were killed or wounded.—Independence Day was celebrated with all due enthusiasm, the elements themselves taking part in the proceedings at Pittsburg, where a tornado caused much damage, the lightning destroying the Vesta Oil Works and consuming 80,000 barrels of petroleum.

MISCELLANEOUS.——BELGIUM is preparing great fêtes to honour the silver wedding of the King and Queen, which will be celebrated on August 22.—In ITALY there has been an ineffectual attempt to launch the Dandolo, a vessel designed to carry two 100-ton guns, at Spezzia, in the presence of the King and Queen. The vessel slid half down the slip and then stuck fast, notwithstanding the efforts of two frigates to tow her off.—In CANADA there was much apprehension of disturbances at Montreal on the occasion of the projected Orange celebration yesterday (Friday); a proclamation had been issued by the Mayor prohibiting the assembling of crowds, and military preparations had been made for the preservation of order, some 2,000 troops being encamped in the Dominion Square.—From NEW ZEALAND it is reported that Sir George Grey has had a most satisfactory interview at Waitura with the Maori chief, Rewl, who gives his entire adherence to the Government. Another meeting will take place, in which the native King will also take part, in September, to arrange for the completion of the Government system of railroads through the North Island.—In SOUTH AFRICA a Times telegram of the 18th ult. states that the Kaffir rebellion has come to an end with the deaths of the chiefs Sandilli, Seyolo, and Anto, and the surrender of Obimba.

THE COURT

THE Queen and the Princess Beatrice were to leave Windsor for Osborne yesterday (Friday). On Saturday last Her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, came up to London and visited the Duchess of Cambridge at St. James's Palace, where Her Majesty also met the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duchess of Teck. The Queen subsequently returned to Windsor, and the Lord Chancellor and Mr. H. and Lady Florence Chaplin dined at the Royal table in the evening. On Sunday the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle, when the Rev. Capel Cure, rector of St. George's, Hanover Square, preached. On Monday the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz lunched with Her Majesty. The Queen also drove out with the Princess Beatrice, and afterwards received Mr. Theodore Martin, who dined with Her Majesty in the evening. On Tuesday the Princess Beatrice came up to town, and, together with the Duke of Connaught, went to see Aïda at the Royal Italian Opera.

The Prince and Princess of Wales returned to London last week from Peterborough. The Prince and Princess were visited on Friday by the Duke of Connaught and the Grand Duke of Hesse, the former of whom remained to lunch. The Prince was expected at Bristol yesterday (Friday), to visit the Royal Agricultural Show, where the most elaborate preparations have been made for his reception. To-day (Saturday) the Prince and Princess are to have a garden party at Marlborough House, the invitations stating "to meet the Queen." The Prince will lay the foundation stone of the new parish church at Southampton on August 13th, but wishes that no public reception will be accorded him.

The Duke of Connaught presided at the 80th annual festival of the Royal Masonic Institution for boys at the Alexandra Palace on Monday.—The Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Hesse are at Eastbourne, where the children of the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia are staying.—The Duke of Cambridge visited Aldershot on Monday, and witnessed a sham fight on the Fox Hills.—The ex-Empress Eugénie is at Ems, living in a villa, called "Petite Elysée."—Prince Louis Napoléon is now in Sweden, after staying four days at Copenhagen, where he was the constant guest of the King or Crown Prince of Denmark. The report that a marriage was arranged between Prince Louis Napoléon and the Princess Thyra has now been contradicted. —The marriage of Prince Henry of the Netherlands with Princess Mary of Prussia will be celebrated at Potsdam on the 27th of August.—The death of the Emperor of Morocco is not confirmed.—A son of the Khedive, by special permission of the Queen, is about to enter the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, as a cadet.

CHURCH NEWS

RITUALISM IN THE CHURCH.——The Guardian, commenting on Mr. Jenkins's motion on "Ritualism," says that it "had very little meaning in itself, and could derive very little authority from the position or the knowledge of the mover. In itself it was probably nothing but a move on the part of the Liberation Society: for it is difficult to believe that the issue of a Royal Commission could be seriously desired, or supposed to be of any possible use. The object, of course, was to give Mr. Jenkins opportunity for a speech, and perhaps to initiate a discussion out of which something could be made. This having been done, the motion was at once withdrawn, with a promise of re-introduction at some future time. Had anything serious been intended, the question could hardly have been left in the hands of Mr. Jenkins—not only a Nonconformist and Liberationist of an extreme type, but a man of little Parliamentary influence, and curiously ignorant of the whole history of the institution which he is so good as to desire to take in hand. Certainly, if the existence of a defect or evil is sufficient to justify the issue of a Royal Commission to examine into it, the ignorance of Mr. Jenkins and his friends is quite dense enough to make out a case for immediate official inquiry and information as to the actual history of the Church of England and its relation to the State."

Various.——No fewer than forty prelates preached in London on Sunday. Of that number thirty-one were foreign and Colonial Bishops, the entire number of home Bishops being nine—viz., the Bishops of Manchester, Ely, Hereford, and Carlisle, Edinburgh and Aberdeen, Derry and Ossory, and St. David's. The American Bishops numbered nineteen. The greater portion of the sermons were on behalf of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The Bishop of Hayti, who was to have preached at St. Augustine's, Kilburn, was prevented by a sudden and severe indisposition.—On Thursday Dr. Maclagan was enthroned in Lichfield Cathedral, and delivered an address. There was a public luncheon afterwards, when the Mayor and Corporation presented an address of welcome to the new Bishop. Several of the American and Colonial Bishops attended, and the afternoon sermon was preached by the Bishop of Nebraska.—The Ecclesiastical Art Review says that it is the intention of a few young men of good family to purchase a site in Armenia, in the neighbourhood of Erzeroum, to found a monastery in connection with the Church of England. It will occupy a similar position to the establishments of Fathers Ignatius and Nugee.—By the will of Miss Robertson, of Elgin, the sum of 30,000*l.* is bequeathed to religious and charitable purposes. Mr. Spurgeon's College and Orphanage, each receive 4,000*l.*; Schemes of the Free Church of Scotland, 2,000*l.*; the London Missionary Society, the London City Mission, and the Baptist Missionary Society, each 2,000*l.*; and the Bible Society, 3,000*l.*; Mr. Spurgeon is one of the trustees.—On Wednesday the funeral of the late Rev. Samuel Martin, who was for many years pastor of Westminster Chapel, which belongs to the Congregational body, was attended by a large number of representatives of the Church of England, as well as of Nonconformist communities. The Benediction was pronounced by the Dean of Westminster, who also officiated at the subsequent burial service in Abney Park Cemetery.—A requiem mass for the repose of the soul of the late Queen Mercédes was performed at the Spanish Chapel, Manchester Square, on Wednesday, and was attended by a large congregation, including several ambassadors.—The Metropolitan Hospital Sunday Fund had on Wednesday last increased to 19,000*l.*

Music

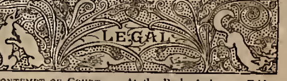
Royal Italian Opera.——The only "novelty" produced at this theatre since our last is an opera entitled Alma l'Incantatrice, by Flotow, the composer of Martha. To say more than a word or two about this work would be simply wasting time and space to little purpose. If Herr Flotow's Ombre was poor, Alma is still poorer—the shadow of an Ombre in fact, supposing that a shade can cast a shadow. Independently of this it is really no novelty at all. It first came forth at Paris, as a one-act opera, entitled L'Esclave de Camoëns, in 1843, ten years later at Berlin, as a three-act opera, called Indra, and a quarter of a century after that, in Paris, under its third name of Alma L'Enchanteresse. More than half of the music belonging to Indra is incorporated in this last version; but it remains almost as feeble as at its early birth. The libretto is built upon the old story of the "Lusiad," and the slave who supports him at Lisbon, after his escape from the Portuguese settlement of Goa, until he receives pardon from the King (Sebastian). To write another sentence about the book would be superfluous; although it deserved better music than Flotow has invented for it. The only claim to consideration that could be preferred on behalf of Alma is its admirable performance at Covent Garden. No pains have been spared to render it acceptable. Signor Vianesi has judiciously compressed the last two acts into one, besides writing some spirited ballet music for a kind of Carnival scene. He has well rehearsed the opera too, for both chorus and orchestra go well. The leading characters could not be more ably impersonated. Mdlle. Albani is an ideal Alma—a real "Enchantress," in fact, of whom not only a king and a poet, but any number of kings and poets, might feel desperately enamoured. Mdlle. Anna di Belocca is a clever and prepossessing representative of the sprightly coquette, Zingaretta, the torment of her husband and the delight of his customers; the Camoëns of M. Capoul is as poetical as melancholy sentiment can make him; and Signor Cotogni, if he occasionally moderated his enthusiasm, would be a more than acceptable Don Sebastian. Credit is due to Signor Tagliafico, acting manager, for the effective manner in which he has helped to place the opera upon the stage; but to assert that Alma is, or is every likely to be, a success, would be at least somewhat rash. The other performances at the Royal Italian Opera were repetitions. Madame Adelina Patti, having happily recovered from the indisposition which deprived the public of her invaluable services last week, appeared again in the Trovatore on Monday; and, for the first time in this country, played the Babylonian Queen in Rossini's gorgeous Semiramide, about which more in our next. Lohengrin was to be given last night, and the second performance of Alma is announced for this evening—the last of the season.

Her Majesty's Theatre.——The success of Carmen has gone on increasing, and Minnie Hauk's impersonation is now deservedly ranked as one of the most striking and original of modern operatic achievements. The Traviata (with Madame Gerster), and Fidelio (with Madame Pappenheim) have both been repeated. La Nozze di Figaro was announced for Thursday. The revival of Balfe's "posthumous" opera, Il Talismano, on Saturday last, created more than ordinary interest. About this work, both with reference to Mr. Arthur Matthison's excellent libretto, and the bright, spirited, genial music of our regretted composer, who, though a "merus Hibernicus" (as Captain Rock would say), like Sterndale Bennett in another way, contrived to find acceptance for English operatic music in all parts of the Continent, we have spoken on more than one occasion. To dwell again upon its merits in detail is unnecessary. To state, however, that it improves on more familiar acquaintance, and has every claim to rank among the best efforts of its composer, is by no means superfluous. The cast differs in one or two essential respects from that we remember when, through the influence of Madame Christine Nilsson, the opera was originally produced at Her Majesty's Opera, then directed by Mr. Mapleson, at Drury Lane. Instead of Christine Nilsson herself, as Edith Plantagenet, we have Madame Etelka Gerster; and, without drawing needless comparisons, an excellent Edith she makes. Instead of Marie Rôze as Queen Berengaria (a part subsequently assumed by Thérèse Tietjens) we have in Mdlle. Caroline Salla as prepossessing a Queen as Cœur de Lion himself could have desired; instead of Signor Rota, as King Richard, we have Signor Galassi; and instead of Signor Catalini, as the deformed and envious Nectabanus, Signor Puente. Despite all these changes the cast is a very strong one, and the performance generally, under the conductorship of Sir Michael Costa, so efficient that the opera may be said to have achieved a new success. It was applauded throughout by an evidently enthusiastic audience, to whom it was agreeable once more to hear the spontaneous melodies of one of the most melodious of our own composers. Il Talismano was to be repeated last night, Signor Fancelli, in lieu of Signor Campanini, the excellent original at Drury Lane, taking the part of Richard—as he is to take that of Don José to-night, in Carmen, a performance which brings the "regular" season to an end. When the "irregular" season is to begin will speedily be made known.

English Music at the French Exhibition.——Dr. Arthur Sullivan, who has made arrangements with Mr. Henry Leslie and his deservedly celebrated body of singers to represent English choral music in the Trocadéro, at the Paris International Exhibition, has also secured the co-operation of Madame Arabella Goddard, to represent the English school of pianoforte playing. The work selected by Dr. Sullivan for Madame Goddard is Sterndale Bennett's fourth concerto (in F minor). As no English orchestra is going to Paris, it may be presumed that the task of accompanying the lady will devolve upon French musicians. That they will take every pains to do justice to the work can hardly be doubted; and that their first acquaintance with the music of Bennett—not a note of which has hitherto been publicly heard in the French capital—may create a desire among them to hear more of it is by no means unlikely.

The late M. Bazin.——The sudden death, by apoplexy, of François Bazin, the well-known operatic composer, and Professor at the Conservatoire of Paris, has caused general regret. Though by no means a genius, Bazin was a hard and conscientious worker, and made the very best of the gifts with which nature had endowed him. His best known operas—or at least those which obtained most success—were La Trompette de Monsieur le Prince, and Maître Pathelin, neither of them masterpieces, though both possessing unquestionable claims to consideration. Born at Marseilles in September, 1816, Bazin was in his sixty-second year at his death. His obsequies were celebrated on the 7th inst. in the Church of Notre Dame de Lorette. He was buried in the Cemetery of Père la Chaise, and the customary funeral oration was pronounced over the bier by M. Ambroise Thomas, composer of Mignon and Hamlet, Principal of the Conservatoire, and, like Bazin, himself a member of the "Institute."

Waifs.——Richard Wagner has completed the music for his latest projected "stage-play," Parsifal, upon which he was busily engaged in 1876, during the memorable series of performances at Bayreuth.—Anton Rubinstein's long forthcoming opera, Nero, is to be produced next autumn both in Paris and Vienna; at least so it is reported, though, so far as we can judge, there is small chance of its being heard in the French capital till a much later period.—The Philharmonic Society of Florence has been dissolved, for reasons not at present stated.—The orchestra from Milan, under the direction of Signor Faccio, conductor at the Scala, has proved a genuine success at the Trocadéro, though we are informed by some well-known Parisian connoisseurs that the music selected for performance reflected but little credit on the modern Italian school. If the Trovatore may be credited, however, before returning to Milan Signor Faccio intends giving some concerts in London. It is to be hoped he may receive more liberal support than was awarded to M. Pasdeloup.—Mr. Arthur Sullivan is only to direct the "classical" performances at the Promenade Concerts which the Messrs. Gatti intend giving at Covent Garden Theatre, in August and September. M. Olivier Métra, from Paris, will take charge of all the rest.—The subsidy of 25,000 francs to the various "Popular Concerts" in Paris has been reduced by the French Government to 20,000.—The centenary of the Scala in Milan is about to be celebrated by a series of representations, at which the most successful operas and ballets brought out at that theatre during the period of its existence will be revived in a wholly exceptional manner.



LEGAL

Contempt of Court.——At the Bucks Assizes, on Friday last, two unfortunate jurymen incurred the displeasure of Mr. Justice Hawkins, and were fined for contempt of Court. The offence of the one was that when a verdict was delivered, and being at the time merely a listener in the gallery of the Court, he gave "a bit of a clap" in token of his approval. This conduct the judge characterised as gross contempt of Court, than which nothing could be more indecent. The delinquent was not, however, detained in custody, but was told that unless the fine (10*l.*) was paid a distress warrant would be issued. The other case was that of a man who had been summoned on the jury and had sent a telegram saying that he was too ill to attend. His lordship fined him 20*l.*, remarking that he ought to have sent a medical certificate, and some one to represent him. We hope it is not contempt of Court to say that we feel some sympathy for the poor fellow who was so carried away by his feelings as to applaud what he heard in Court; and still more for the other offender, who probably did what he thought to be his duty under the circumstances, and at all events was condemned unheard.

Miscellaneous.——The Bill for the Codification of the Criminal Law is not to be pressed forward this Session, but will be referred to a Royal Commission, consisting of Lord Blackburn, Mr. Justice Lush, and Sir James Stephen, the author and draughtsman of the measure, who will thoroughly revise it during the winter.—Mr. Charles Marvin, the Foreign Office writer, who is charged with stealing a copy of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, was again before the Bow Street magistrate on Tuesday, when a further remand was ordered, the bail being reduced to one surety of 50*l.* It was shown that Marvin had been a regular contributor to the Globe for some time, and the suggestion of the prosecuting counsel that any "conspiracy" had been entered into with him, or that he had been paid at an extra rate for the communication in question, were positively denied. The Globe, in a leading article on Wednesday, after premising that "continued reticence is no longer possible without danger of misconstruction," says that as the evidence showed "the information we published in an extra special edition, late at night, was absolutely written on the premises from memory; in the second, the full text of the Agreement reached us in MS. like other contributions. It is also in evidence that the Memorandum of Agreement was published by us so late at night in the belief that it would appear in our contemporaries next morning. As for the publication of the full text, our justification in that matter is fortunately complete. Lord Salisbury had taken upon himself to assert that the Memorandum to which we gave publicity was 'unauthentic' or 'unauthenticated,' and 'unworthy of confidence.' This statement directly charged us with the publication of false news, and the character of a respectable journal like The Globe being a matter of just as much importance to the conductors as the reputation of a Minister is to himself we took the earliest opportunity of vindicating ourselves from so grave a charge. Under similar circumstances we should follow the same course again, in the face of the risk of being charged with conspiracy, and we do not believe that a single respectable journal in these isles would remain silent under such aspersions."—Three Oxford Undergraduates have been fined 5*l.* and 10*l.* each for disorderly conduct during Commemoration week. They, and others who have not been detected, had seized the fire escape and ran away with it, dragging the attendant with it, and one of them had also assaulted a policeman. The Vice Chancellor, who heard the charge, said that if members of the University indulged in such conduct, it would be for the authorities to consider if it were right to permit them to stay up after term, or encourage festivities which terminated in such a manner.—Sir Capel Fitzgerald, Bart., has been committed for trial on a charge of stealing 400*l.* worth of jewellery, the property of a lady with whom he recently paid a visit to Paris.—A poor woman, resident at Haggerstone, has met her death in a singular and very shocking way. Being awakened on Tuesday night by an alarm of thieves, she got up and ran into the back-yard, and attempted to catch a man who was making off over a wall. Just at that moment her son, a lad of seventeen, who is a Volunteer, discharged his rifle at the thief, but the charge entered his mother's body, and she died shortly after. Perhaps some day it will be made penal for a Volunteer to load his rifle except at the command of his superior officer or when practising at the butts.—The Matrimonial Causes Act does not appear to have such a wide application as was at first supposed. The Hammersmith magistrate had before him the other day a case in which the wife, a steady hardworking woman, had been pulled out of bed and twice kicked by her idle drunken husband, whose presence in her little shop had the effect of driving away her customers. Mr. Paget, however, decided that it was not an "aggravated assault," and therefore sentenced the man to one month's hard labour only, and declined to grant a separation.—Another wife-beater at Sheffield has been sentenced to twelve months' hard labour, having been found guilty of "dragging his wife along the floor, emptying a bucket of water over her, jumping upon her, and kicking her in the face with his heavy clogs." He had arrived home late, and had been kept waiting at the door, and so the jury recommended him to mercy on the ground of "provocation."—The coroner's inquiry with regard to the poisonous violet powder case, about which there has been so much sensation, has resulted in a verdict of manslaughter against Mr. King, the wholesale chemist who supplied the powder to the various vendors.—A woman is in custody at Preston on suspicion of having poisoned her husband and three children for the sake of burial fees from an Assurance Company.

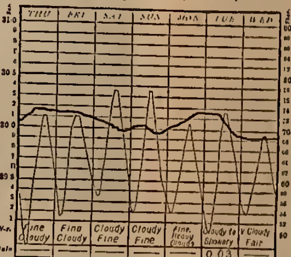
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

JULY 4TH TO JULY 10TH (INCLUSIVE)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.——The changes in the weather during this period have been slight and unimportant. The barometer rose briskly for a few hours on Thursday morning, the 4th instant; but fell very gradually during the next three days. On Sunday night, the 7th instant, however, a slow rise set in, and continued until eight o'clock on Tuesday, the 9th instant, at which time the mercury began to fall steadily. The fall did not last long, however, and pressure remained almost stationary during Wednesday, the 10th instant. The winds have been light from west or north-west during the whole week, and temperature has not varied much. The weather has been on the whole rather cool for the time of year: but on Saturday and Sunday, the 6th and 7th, the thermometer rose to 77°. The sky has been generally cloudy; but has cleared occasionally, especially towards the close of the day. On Tuesday, the 9th instant, some slight showers fell. The barometer was highest (30·16 inches) on Thursday, the 4th instant; lowest (29·92 inches) on Wednesday, the 10th instant: range, 0·24 inches. Temperature was highest (77°) on Saturday and Sunday, the 6th and 7th: lowest (48°) on Thursday morning, the 4th instant; range, 29°. Rain has fallen on one day only; amount, 0·03 inches.

The Assyrian Explorer, M. Hormuzd Rassam, the successor of the late Mr. George Smith, is on his way home from Nineveh with relics which he has secured for the British Museum. The British Museum has also received for inspection a fossil lobster-like crustacean from the Wenlock shale. The oldest fossil of this type previously known was from the carboniferous strata found at Mons.

MDLLE. MINNIE HAUK

THIS young lady, whose impersonation of Carmen in the opera of that name at Her Majesty's Theatre, is now one of the chief topics of conversation in musical circles, is a native of New York, and was born in November, 1853. At the age of eight her singing in the Cathedral Service attracted much attention; and some five years later, her talents having been in the meantime carefully cultivated, she made her first public appearance at a National benefit concert, given in the Opera House, New Orleans. On that occasion she sang "Casta diva" and a selection from Auber's Crown Diamonds, and her success was so great, that when her family returned to New York, she was placed under Signor Errani to complete her musical education. Her progress was rapid and remarkable, and after making several operatic essays at a private theatre belonging to Mr. Louis Jerome, of New York, she was engaged to appear in Italian opera at the Academy of Music, New York, where she made her début, in 1868, as Amina in La Sonnambula. She at once became a popular favourite; and when in the following year she appeared in that and other characters in London she was quite as successful, many of the musical critics prophesying for her a brilliant career. She was equally triumphant on the Continent, being enthusiastically received at Paris, Vienna, Berlin, and Moscow. She returned to England in May last, appearing at Her Majesty's Opera as Violetta in La Traviata with great and genuine success; and subsequently as Rosina in Il Barbiere di Siviglia, Margherita in Gounod's Faust, and Zerlina in Don Giovanni.

Of the manner in which she sustains the title rôle in Bizet's Carmen we spoke at some length in our "music" column for June 29th, immediately after the production of the opera. She not only possesses a fine and highly-trained voice, but dramatic talent of a high order, a combination which cannot fail to place her in the foremost rank of operatic performers.

THE NOTTINGHAM MUSEUM

THE Midland Counties Art Museum at Nottingham Castle, which was last week opened by the Prince and Princess of Wales, owed its origin in a great measure to the generosity and public spirit of the late Mr. William Geo. Ward, Mayor of Nottingham, who died only a few weeks ago from injuries he sustained in consequence of a fall from his horse.

So long ago as 1872 the success achieved by the students of the Nottingham School of Art induced the authorities of the Science and Art Department at South Kensington to suggest to the Town Council the establishment of an Exhibition of pictures and other art-work. The idea was at once adopted, a Committee was formed, an annual grant of money voted, and an Art Exhibition was soon opened in the Exchange Rooms. This became so popular, that the late Mayor and Town Council resolved on establishing a permanent Museum of Art, and the Castle was at once suggested as an appropriate site for it. Mr. Gladstone and Lord de Tabley, as trustees of the Duke of Newcastle, to whom the Castle belongs, were applied to for a lease, and they granted one for five hundred years; the Town Council undertaking to spend 20,000*l*. upon the "restoration" or rather alteration of the building, and to "use and maintain it as a public Museum and Art Gallery." Great interest has been taken in the work during its progress by Mr. Gladstone, the Bishop of Lincoln, the Duke of St. Alban's, the High Sheriff of the town and county and the town of Nottingham, Lord Belper (Lord Lieutenant of the county), Lord Manvers, Lord Carnarvon, Mr. Samuel Morley, Mr. Mundella, and many other gentlemen connected with the county. The Castle stands on an eminence close to the town, and is surrounded by extensive grounds which have been very tastefully laid out. The building which has just been restored is of course not the old Norman structure of history. That was dismantled during the Civil War, and was subsequently bought by William Cavendish, first Duke of Newcastle, who planned and commenced the present Castle, which, it will be recollected, was sacked and burnt by a mob during the riots which preceded the Reform Bill of 1832; the Duke of Newcastle of that day having made himself unpopular by saying that he "would do what he liked with his own." For many years the Castle Rock remained a scene of desolation, save at Easter and Whitsuntide, when the magnificent site was utilised for galas, and latterly the building has been the head-quarters of the Robin Hood Rifles until the work of adapting it for its new purpose began. The Museum, as it now stands, consists of two storeys, the lower one containing seven spacious rooms, whilst in the upper, which is reached by two staircases of stone, there are six magnificent galleries. The outer walls are of enormous thickness, and the internal arrangements are of special fire-proof construction. The Director and Curator is Mr. G. H. Wallis, lately of South Kensington Museum; and it is the intention of the Council to carry out the system of administration and custody of objects of art lent to the Museum which has been so successful at South Kensington. The contents of the Exhibition are of course of a very varied character. Paintings, both old and modern, by British and foreign artists, in oil and water colours. Lace, old and new, hand-made (this is the staple industry of the town of Nottingham). Tapestry, needlework, embroideries, pottery, porcelain and glass; armour and ironwork; specimens of carving in wood, ivory, and other materials; architectural and archæological relics, sculpture, bronzes, and jewellery.

One room is entirely devoted to pictures painted by Mr. Henry Dawson, who was himself present at the opening, and who, though not a native of Nottingham, was taken thither when quite an infant, and in his early life worked as a "twist hand" in one of the lace factories.

The weather on the opening day was brilliantly fine, although rain fell copiously enough during the early morning. The Prince and Princess of Wales, who had arrived at Bestwood, the Duke of St. Alban's seat, on the previous day, drove thence in an open carriage, and were met at the entrance of the town by the Mayor and Corporation and a number of other notabilities who were interested in the ceremony, and who came in procession from the Nottingham School of Art. The whole town of course made holiday, and turned out to enjoy the show. The streets through which the procession passed were draped with many-coloured flags, and lined on either side with Venetian masts. One street was transformed into a continuous triumphal arch by being covered in with a species of curved basket-work; and in many places a novel and dazzling effect was produced by the lavish use of beautiful lace hangings. In the market-place the scene was most imposing. The market-place is one of the most spacious in the kingdom, covering an area of nearly six acres, and its appearance is rendered quaint and picturesque by the colonnade which, formed by the projecting fronts of the upper storeys of the houses, surrounds it. The houses on all sides were hung with scarlet cloth and festoons of flowers, trophies of flags being fixed between the upper windows. The square was surrounded by Venetian masts, and from top to top of these masts were suspended strings of countless small banners. Every window, and even the tops of the houses, were thronged with spectators, and in the market-place itself there was an immense crowd. It was here that the procession halted while the Sunday-school children sang a verse of "God Bless the Prince of Wales." The line of route was kept by the 80th Regiment from Sheffield, and squadrons both of Lancers and the North Notts Yeomanry, whilst on the "Castle Green" were posted the "Robin Hoods," a famous rifle corps, which numbers nearly 1,000 strong. As the cortège passed through the grounds the band of the Royal Artillery performed a selection of music composed for the occasion by Mr. J. Farmer to words written by Mr. Bailey (the author of "Festus" both of whom are natives of Nottingham.

At the entrance to the Castle the Mayor, Mr. James Oldknow, received from the architect, Mr. T. C. Hine, a handsomely-chased key, which he immediately presented to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, who, amid loud cheers, proceeded to open the door of the Museum. Then came the inspection of the building and its contents; after which the Royal party partook of luncheon and then returned to the lawn, where, under a pavilion, the Prince received an address from the Corporation, and made a suitable reply, in which he alluded in feeling terms to the sad accident which had caused the death of the late Mayor. The Prince having declared the Museum and grounds open, the Royal party returned to Bestwood, taking a different route through the town, and being enthusiastically cheered, as they had been on their way to the Castle.

The Mayor and members of the Corporation lunched together at the Exchange in celebration of the event; and in the evening many parts of the town were illuminated, and there was a display of fireworks in the Forest.

AMONGST ALIENS

By FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE

AUTHOR OF "A CHARMING FELLOW," "AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE," "BLACK SPIRITS AND WHITE," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

The Princess drove a hard bargain. I think we should not have come to terms at all, but for my desire to frequent that uninviting schoolroom in the Palazzo Corleoni and see for myself how things went there. But when the Princess said it was one of the conditions of the arrangement that I should come and work in her house, and not carry away any of the objects which were to be painted, the temptation was too strong for me, and I accepted very miserable pay rather than give the thing up. I could think of no better course of conduct to pursue than quietly and carefully to watch over Lucy, and endeavour to judge of her feeling towards Don Vittorio, without yielding to any rash impulse of anger or suspicion.

For suspicion, in truth, I had no tangible grounds; nothing that I could have told to a third person without the risk of my words either being disregarded, or having an exaggerated importance attached to them. And this latter was a result which I should most earnestly endeavour to avoid. The only person in whom I could confide any trouble or perplexity which assailed me,—the only friend, indeed, I had in Rome,—was my master, Alessandro Santi; and I would have trusted his judgment on most subjects, as fully as I trusted the goodness of his intentions towards my sister and myself. But on this subject,—no! I knew enough of Italian modes of thought to be sure that Signor Sandro would put but one interpretation on Don Vittorio's visits to the schoolroom; but this was not all: Signor Sandro would infallibly assume that those visits implied to Lucy's mind all,—or nearly all,—that they implied to his own. My shrewd old master much approved of the superior freedom granted to English girls, as compared with the restraints placed upon Italian girls, although his notions about it were very imperfect; but he drew several erroneous inferences from that which he did know. One of these inferences was that an English girl, accustomed to mingle freely in society instead of being shut up in a convent, and brought out thence to be married, must necessarily have a copious knowledge of the world;—a phrase which I have generally found to be a euphemism for "knowledge of the evil things in the world." The mixture of simplicity, fearlessness, and romance in a character like Lucy's was beyond his comprehension. He could have conceived a nun-taught Roman school-girl falling an innocent victim to Don Vittorio's fascinations; but not a bright, capable, English girl who trotted about the streets of Rome unattended, and read the newspapers; whereas the convent-bred imagination would in all probability have taken the alarm first. To it, men in general were wolves, and young girls only to be saved from them by implicit obedience to their experienced pastors, spiritual and temporal. How could a mind so taught weave a web of romantic fancies about such a one as Don Vittorio Alfoaso de Principi Corleoni?—a gossamer, fairy-like, moonlit tissue of girlish dreams and vague tenderness, no more like conscious passion than the cool glitter of Hesperus is like the fires of Etna!

Yet some such dream it was that I feared for Lucy. Or rather I feared the awakening from it that must come. The worship of "some bright particular star" is often a not unsweet prelude in a young girl's heart to the deeper music of real love. But suddenly to find that your star is but a coarse flame fed by foul tallow, to feel the wings of your spirit scorched and withered in its glare and stench,—that is a hideous experience which I was resolved to spare my Lucy at almost any cost, and by almost any effort.

But then, after all, it might be that I was mistaken and over-anxious. I kept this alternative before my mind as a possibility, and for a while all my observations seemed to tend towards raising it to a probability.

I went daily to the Palazzo Corleoni to work for Donna Laura and to help her in her work. I found that we were not to paint in the schoolroom, but in a small cabinet near to the Princess's boudoir, so that she could easily come in and inspect our progress, which she did very often. But although I was thus not constantly with Lucy, I was within reach of her, and frequently had an opportunity of going into the schoolroom; for the two younger girls had undertaken, as their contribution to the bazaar, to colour and gild some initial letters on cardboard, copied from an old illuminated missal, and this performance I was asked to superintend. This had not been in the bond when the Princess engaged me, but I was only too willing to make frequent visits to the schoolroom where the little girls were at work, so long as Lucy was there also. My presence there was never unwelcome, because, as Donna Laura candidly observed, the children improved in talking English at the same time that they worked at their illuminations, both Lucy and I being strictly enjoined never to converse with them but in our own language.

During all this time I never once found Don Vittorio in the schoolroom. But I saw him occasionally, nevertheless. He would lounge in of a morning to look at our drawings, and to criticise his sister's with fraternal severity. About mine he said nothing, and appeared scarcely to see them. Only once, in an access, as it seemed, of ill temper, he remarked to Donna Laura that she was a fool to allow her performances to be exhibited in juxtaposition with mine. Donna Laura answered very good humouredly that she had no pretensions to be an artist like Meess Wilson, who was a favourite pupil of Professor Santi.

The Princess chanced to overhear these two speeches as she was coming into the painting-room. She chanced to overhear a great many of the speeches made in her house; and I was often struck by the familiar knowledge she displayed of things said and done out of her presence. On this occasion she gave Don Vittorio a little lecture; saying that Laum had no need to be ashamed of her work, no matter how poor it might be in an artistic point of view, for that her pious motive in doing it rendered it worth something in the eyes of all good persons; and that, moreover, since the Holy Father himself expressly approved the object of the bazaar, she thought it would be becoming in everybody to avoid all spirit of levity in thinking or speaking of it.

The Princess's manner was very smooth, but I thought I detected a steely hardness underneath the velvet. The expression of her haughty features and dark stern eyes was not in harmony with the pious humility of her words. In short, she seemed to me to be like an able actress determined on playing a part for which Nature had not fitted her. In observing her, Signor Sandro's words recurred to me: "They tell me she has taken to devotion in these days." Her devotion, however, did not interfere with her mundane affairs. She governed her household with a strict rule and the most minute knowledge of details. I do not believe that her cook or her steward could have succeeded in cheating her out of a farthing. If they did peculate, after the manner of their kind, she knew it, and knew the precise extent of their peculations. But if it suited her to appear blind to them, she would shut her eyes at the proper moment without the smallest scruple; and with as little compunction would she accuse and expose the culprit the moment his misdeeds went beyond the limit she had mentally assigned to them as tolerable. I think she carried out this method in dealing with her children. For example, Don Vittorio (who was her favourite) had a great deal of apparent freedom and independence; but I was persuaded from the first that the Princess kept a certain power in her own hands, and that however long her son's tether might be, still he was tethered. As to the Prince Bastiani-Corleoni, he was, for me, as invisible a potentate as the Mikado of Japan. I heard from others that he was a mild-mannered gentleman of handsome presence and orthodox principles, whose chief occupation in life was to audit and pass the accounts prepared for him by his wife in her vigilant management of their estate, and whose chief pastime was shooting over a domain he possessed in a distant part of the Maremma, where the wild birds throve, and the peasants languished in the malaria.

After the little reproof to Don Vittorio which I have mentioned, the Princess turned to me and said, "Ah, you are a pupil of Sandro Santi?" (She had known this fact perfectly, long ago.) "He is a very clever painter, and, I am told, even a better master."

"He is a rabid 'Red,'" observed Don Vittorio in a tone of cold contempt. "When we had a government he was banished as dangerous. I suppose now he is considered a shining light; or at least no worse than the rest."

I took no more heed of this speech than if I had been stone deaf, but went on painting steadily, conscious all the time that the Princess was watching me as steadily. She made a pause before speaking as though she thought it possible that I might take up the glove thus openly thrown down by her son; but when she finally spoke she did so in the tone of one answering on an instant impulse. "Oh, my son," she said, "do not let us forget Christian charity in our judgment even of those who are misguided enough to rebel against their sovereign and father. What you speak of happened long ago. Perhaps years have brought better counsel to Santi. He is getting old now, and very likely repents the errors of his youth. Let us hope so."

I had an instinctive feeling that she expected this speech to call forth some reply from me. But I took no more heed of it than of Don Vittorio's; painting on steadily, with the Princess watching me steadily, as before.

For the first week she did not talk much to me during her visits to the painting-room. I think she was observing me, and trying to read my character. After a while she began to converse with me, always putting direct questions, and not betraying any annoyance (although I think she felt some) at the laconic brevity of my answers. In this fashion, and by a methodically regular process, she catechised me about my history, and learned the little there was to know: as, for instance, that I had studied drawing in England before my father's death; that my father had been an architect; that I had a small yearly income between me and destitution; that Lucy inherited a sum of two thousand pounds from her mother; that I hoped to follow the profession of a painter, and had come to Rome with the view of qualifying myself to do so; and that I had had an introduction to Santi from my old Italian teacher who knew him years ago. I was amused to find afterwards that she had previously cross-questioned Lucy in precisely the same manner, and had evidently examined me with the intention of comparing and sifting our statements.

The effect produced on Lucy by this sort of catechism was very different from that which it made on me. She accepted the Princess's questioning as a proof of kindly interest in us. And it was true that that haughty dame treated Lucy with much more sweetness of manner than she thought it worth while to bestow on me. She had managed to soothe Lucy's natural timidity, and to conquer her shyness; and that once done, it was not difficult to win some affection from her. There never was a nature which responded more immediately to the least show of kindness than my sister's. And the facility with which she fell under the influence of those around her was a weakness in her character which I was sure the Princess Corleoni had not failed to perceive. And then the query presented itself to my mind, What motive could the Princess have for influencing and attracting Lucy?

I puzzled over this riddle, turning and twisting it this way and that, and never coming to a satisfactory solution. A year or two ago I should simply have accepted the Princess's kind, caressing manner to my sister as the most natural thing in the world, which needed no explanation. Lucy was used to be petted and spoken softly to from a little child. But my year's residence in Rome had made me suspicious of such behaviour on the part of such a woman as the haughty Princess Olympia. Sometimes, however, I went back to my old simple way of looking at things. Why should not the Princess be kind to Lucy solely because she liked the girl's soft ways and sweet looks? Then again I rejected this idea, and told myself that a thousand minute circumstances tended to show that the Princess was carrying out a line of conduct dictated by calculation rather than feeling. Once or twice the wild notion darted into my mind that the Princess perceived Don Vittorio's admiration for Lucy, and was inclined to yield to her son's wishes in the matter; she harped a good deal on Lucy's little fortune, and one day used the phrase, "a nice dot," or dowry, in speaking of it. But of course such a notion was wild, and not to be entertained in sober seriousness. Poor Lucy's money could not possibly offer any temptations to such people as the Corleonis; the interest of it would not pay Don Vittorio's tailor for half a year. Besides, she was a girl of no family, giving lessons for pay, a foreigner, and—worse than all—a heretic! No, no; the thing was too outrageously absurd and improbable, and could only have flitted into a brain weary and perplexed with unavailing ponderings on one subject.

Before the day of the great bazaar arrived, however, I had got hold of a clue to the enigma.

CHAPTER IV.

WHEN I look back on that period of my employment in the Palazzo Corleoni, it seems to have extended over a long time; and yet the dates in a little diary or memorandum-book which I kept then show that barely three weeks elapsed from the first day to the last of my engagement. But the time seemed long to me then, and seems long in the restrospect, because several incidents of great interest in my life were crowded into it.

I did not neglect the object which had chiefly induced me at first to go to the Palazzo Corleoni; namely, to see for myself what terms Don Vittorio was on with my sister, whether he visited the school-room daily, and to watch his behaviour towards Lucy with jealous scrutiny. But it was not possible, of course, that I should devote myself wholly to that object. Having undertaken to make certain drawings, I was bound to execute them to the best of my ability, and honestly to fulfil my part of the bargain by helping and counselling Donna Laura. And besides, as I have said, I was not free to be in my sister's company whensoever it pleased me to seek it. Still I flattered myself that my opportunities for observation were sufficient to assure me that Don Vittorio took no special pains to see Lucy. And I began to think that I had altogether over-estimated the danger to her peace of mind from the attention bestowed on her by those handsome, inscrutable, sapphire-tinted eyes. I had refrained from hinting my fears and surmises to Lucy. If she were fancy free it was not for me to trouble the innocent serenity of her mind. If she were indulging in any girlish romance, open interference and opposition might put her into an attitude of antagonism towards me, which would weaken my influence over her, and diminish my means of standing between her and sorrow.

She talked to me freely enough, when we were at home of an evening, about the Corleonis; about the Princess especially, whose virtues and piety she descanted on at length. And sometimes she would use a phraseology in speaking of them which instantly struck on my ear as being foreign to Lucy's usual way of talking, and which I was convinced she had caught and unconsciously imitated from somebody. Possibly it was from the Princess herself, I thought, who habitually used a certain pietistic jargon peculiar to her Church. Every Church has its own, I suppose. At least I knew that such was the case with more than one Dissenting sect in my native town, and now I found that the orthodox and strictly Catholic Romans had plenty of sentences and turns of speech ready cut and dried for use in discoursing on religious matters. Some of these were almost as purely technical as Signor Sandro's studio talk, and always suggested to my mind something unpleasantly mechanical and prosaic. Lucy, however, did not feel them to be so. She was less critical—perhaps less hard—than I. Then, too, the Princess's partiality flattered her,—simple-hearted child that she was! And certainly that partiality seemed to increase daily. Lucy was frequently invited to sit with the Princess in her boudoir whilst Donna Laura and I were painting, and she generally was bidden to remain there even during the visits of certain exalted personages who were amongst the Princess Olympia's most intimate and valued guests. Such a degree of favour was never extended to me—to my inward thankfulness! And why,—why, I wondered more and more day by day, was it bestowed on Lucy?

One afternoon the Princess entered the painting-room, where her daughter and I were at work, and said with an impressive air, "Laura, his Eminence would like to see some of your drawings. He is very much interested and pleased to hear that you are working so well for our bazaar. Bring them in to the boudoir. Madame de Clavigny is there, too."

Donna Laura prepared to obey, and began to divest herself of the holland blouse which she wore whilst painting. The Princess turned back to me as if struck by an afterthought, and said, "Would you like to bring some of your drawings also, Meess Wilson?"

"If you will excuse me, madam, I would rather go on with my work. The daylight hours are few and precious."

I thought the Princess looked by no means displeased at my refusal. "As you please, as you please," she said, with a gracious bend of the head. But Donna Laura, with a good honest impulse, insisted that I should come, too, and display a pair of hand screens of my painting, which she thought particularly well-executed. "You know," said she, "Madame de Clavigny is very rich and very fond of buying pretty things, and who knows but she may give you an order for a picture? You always say you want to earn money. Don't throw away a chance. I shall tell her that you have done the best things, and helped me with mine."

With all her bluntness and absence of suavity, I had long ago discovered that Donna Laura had some kindness of heart; and her character impressed me as being incomparably more loveable than that of any other member of the family with whom I was acquainted.

"It is kind of you to consider my interests, Donna Laura," said I, hesitatingly. At that moment I caught a look of annoyance on the Princess's face which determined my decision. I am ashamed to own that a sentiment of rebellion against the Princess's velvet-gloved iron will was a stronger motive for displaying my work in the boudoir than any hope of selling a picture to Madame de Clavigny! It was childish, perhaps, but I could not help saying to myself, "You shan't have your own way this time! I'll take you at your word." So I finished my answer to Donna Laura thus: "And as you say, it would be foolish to throw away a chance. I will work an extra half-hour for you to-morrow, if I lose a little daylight now."

I think that if Donna Laura had been looking at her lady mother's face at that moment she would have repented her rash insistance; for a cloud on that dark brow was a formidable sight to all who lived under the rule of Olympia Corleoni. But the girl was happily unconscious of the cloud on this occasion, and in an instant it had passed away, and the Princess looked her usual composed, and slightly sanctimonious, self.

In the boudoir—an eye-afflicting apartment hung with damask of the colour of the yolk of an egg, on which about a dozen vilely-executed copies of well-known pictures by old masters glared from out massive gilt frames,—the distinguished company was seated after the fashion of distinguished companies in thoroughly Italian houses. That is to say, the chairs were all ranged in a formal semi-circle, as if some one were presently expected to "address the meeting." The company on this occasion was very distinguished,—all but one member of it. The undistinguished member was my little Lucy. I caught sight of her curly head directly I went in, just visible behind and above the black velvet and sables which covered the portly person of Madame de Clavigny. This lady was the wife of a diplomat accredited to the Vatican, and was a leading personage in the orthodox and aristocratic circles of Roman society. Next to her, enthroned in the most comfortable armchair in the room, sat a tall, thin, hatchet-faced old gentleman in black ecclesiastical garb. His lean old hands, partly encasen in knitted woollen mittens, were crossed on his knee, and his lean old legs in scarlet stockings were crossed over one another, and his watery blue eyes looked very mild, and not a little stupid. And this was his Eminence the Cardinal Zampini, Archbishop of Borgofosco, and a reverend pillar of the Church. Near to him, just the least trifle behind him, and within easy reach of his Eminence's ear, sat one who looked neither mild nor stupid, a certain Monsignor Chiappaforti, well known in more than one social sphere of the Eternal City. Monsignore was at present in attendance on the Cardinal,—told off, as it were, to be aide-de-camp to that aged major-general of the Church Militant during the latter's stay in Rome; for his Eminence did not reside in the capital, but had temporarily deprived his flock at Borgofosco of the light of his countenance, having some business to transact at the Vatican. Chiappaforti's round, smooth-shaven, good-humoured face was very attractive at first sight to many persons. The quality I have most frequently heard attributed to him was bonhomie. "Monsignor Chiappaforti's manners have such a delightful bonhomie about them!" And he was undoubtedly quick-witted, and well-educated. He laughed a great deal,—a low, musical, seemingly spontaneous laugh. I say "seemingly spontaneous," because I am persuaded that he was a great deal too clever and sarcastic to be really ingenuously amused and delighted by half the things he laughed at with that air of almost infantine heartiness.

The conversation was being carried on in French in honour of Madame de Clavigny, who could speak nothing else. His Eminence did not shine particularly in the linguistic line, albeit we were told that he had passed many years in Belgium. But Monsignore spoke French very fluently, and English, and—I was told—German also; and he helped out the old Cardinal whenever he boggled for a word. In fact he helped out every one who showed any tendency to boggle, and altogether drove his heterogeneous team into whatsoever conversational highways or bye-ways it pleased him to follow, with the ease and skill of an accomplished whip. It must have been a hard-mouthed brute, indeed, that he could not manage, or at least one very resolutely and earnestly bent on going in a direction opposite to that in which Monsignore would fain guide him!

On the present occasion every one was willing to talk about the same topic: the forthcoming bazaar, namely. I, as a mere supernumerary figure in the scene, was able to observe it all at my ease. Donna Laura, after having kissed his Eminence's hand—an action which, from a girl of her age to a white-haired pastor of her Church, seemed to me graceful and pretty—proceeded to display her screens and fans and cardboard boxes before his reverend countenance whilst he sat still in his chair. Poor old gentleman, he did his best to seem pleased, but a more lack-lustre eye than that with which he contemplated the various objects held up before him one after the other it never was my lot to see. "Very pretty, very pretty. Ah! you are very clever; yes, yes. Very clever, indeed!" These phrases he repeated over and over again in his mild, quavering old voice. And on the whole I don't know that he could have said anything better. But Monsignore was a different sort of critic. His bravas were also profuse, but not so absolutely indiscriminating as those of his Eminence, and he interspersed them with neat little appreciative remarks on the various subjects portrayed, which somehow half-persuaded even me that he took a lively interest in the whole affair.

After a while it came to the turn of my drawings to be exhibited. True to her word, Donna Laura specially called Madame de Clavigny's attention to them, and ungrudgingly gave me full credit for all I had done to help her. My pictures had also the honour to be submitted to the gaze of the Cardinal. I was sorry for him, so evidently was he bored and bewildered by this second tax on his complaisance and patience. But here again Monsignore came nobly to the rescue. He was pleased to praise my drawings in the most flattering terms. And after one very flowery eulogium he surprised me greatly by saying, "I am all the more delighted that this good work should have been done by the sister of our dear Signorina Lucia." And at the same time Lucy gave him a look of the most beaming gratitude. Nothing delighted her more than to hear me praised. It was a sure way to her favour. Her pleased look, therefore, was not surprising, but it was to me both surprising and puzzling to find her accepting the epithet of "our dear Signorina Lucia" from Monsignor Chiappaforti, as a natural and accustomed form of speech. So absorbed was she in gazing on Monsignore with her trusting, innocent, grateful blue eyes, that she did not observe my astonishment. Monsignore, however, observed it. And he at once repeated the words, "our dear Signorina Lucia," looking amiably across at me. Then he bent a little closer to the Cardinal's ear, and whispered a few sentences into it; of which sentences the sibilant words, "Sandro Santi" were all that I caught. Monsignore's eyes were inscrutably cast down whilst he whispered, but his Eminence instantly honoured me with an attentive, and not particularly benevolent, stare.

When Lucy and I were at home that evening, I said to her that I had been surprised to hear Monsignor Chiappaforti speak of her and to her in so familiar and affectionate a strain; to which she answered that he was the most kind and amiable of beings, and treated her rather as if she were a daughter of the house of Corleoni than as a poor teacher who worked there for pay; and that in all his ways and words he presented an edifying and touching example of Christian charity. And the Cardinal—was he not a dear venerable old man? Would I not admit that he was? I replied that as to the Cardinal I did not know enough of him to say whether he were "dear" or "venerable," but that for the moment I was not concerned to discuss that Prince of the Church. Lucy, however, still harped on his Eminence's venerable looks. "And I noticed," said she, "that you curtsied to him very reverently when you left the room, Catherine. I was so glad to see it!"

"To have done otherwise would have been gross ill-manners, Lucy mine; but I assure you that my curtsey was not intended as a tribute to Cardinal Zampini's moral worth—about which I know absolutely nothing. I should have treated a Mandarin with just the same respect, if I had been presented to him in a Pekin drawing-room by a Princess of the Celestial Empire!"

"Oh, Catherine!"

"Oh, Lucy!"

"I wish you wouldn't talk so, Catty dear."

"How is it that you have scarcely ever mentioned Monsignor Chiappaforti's name to me, and yet have become quite a dear friend of his, as it seems?"

"I fancied—it seemed to me as if you—you disliked all the Princess's friends, whenever I did mention them. And I think,—I do think you are prejudiced against the Catholic clergy, Catherine. Perhaps, Signor Santi puts it into your head. He is a Republican, I know; and I am afraid he has no religion."

This speech made me very grave. It was something new that Lucy should purposely avoid any topic to me. We differed by temperament, and the very constitution of our minds, on a hundred subjects; but we had hitherto discussed together whatever came into our heads with the freest confidence. For some time past I had felt the presence of a kind of veil between my young sister's mind and my own, although she was as gentle and affectionate towards me as ever. And a few days later, I had another proof of it. I chanced to see in Lucy's bedroom—we occupied two tiny sleeping chambers, little more than closets, one on each side of the sitting-room—a large photograph of one of the well-known Madonnas of Giovanni Bellini. It was placed upright on the chest of drawers, and caught my eye at once. "That is a charming picture," said I. "Where did you get it, Lucy?"

"The Princess gave it to me."

"The Princess Corleoni? You must be in favour! I never heard of her giving anything to anybody. Why didn't you show it to me?"

Lucy coloured and hesitated, but she answered at length plainly enough that she was afraid I might say something sarcastic, or might turn her picture into ridicule.

"I turn Giovanni Bellini into ridicule——!"

"No; not Giovanni Bellini, Catherine, but the Madonna."

All at once a light flashed in on me at those words, which made everything clear in a moment. They were trying to convert her! But why?—why?"

Signor Sandro found an instant solution to this question when I hinted to him my suspicion (it was, indeed, far more than a suspicion), and told him how unhappy it made me. "Ah, già!" he said, very quietly. "Lucia has fifty thousand lire of her own. A very nice little dowry to enter a religious house with."

I lay awake for hours that night with an aching heart.

A NOVEL LIFE-SAVING APPARATUS

THE accompanying engraving is from a sketch sent to us hy the Rev. Bernard East, Vicar of St. Andrew's, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, who recently saw the apparatus in use at Scheveningen in Holland. It consists of a long spar about fifteen to twenty feet in length, and five inches in diameter at one end and three at the other; a hole about an inch in diameter is bored through the thick end and a stout rope ten feet in length passed through, knotted on both sides of the spar, to prevent it slipping through. At each end of this rope is fastened a strong handle two feet in length, while at the other extremity of the pole is a strong rope about thirty or forty feet long, to which is attached a small anchor, which is fixed firmly in the sand. The advantages of such a simple contrivance are obvious. In most cases of drowning which occur at seaside places of resort the peril is sudden, either from a boat overturning or a bather getting out of his depth, and the loss of time involved in launching a boat too frequently means the loss of life also. With this apparatus, however, the nearest bystander, whether capable of swimming or not, may confidently rush into the water to render aid, knowing that the land end is firmly fixed to the shore, and that should he become exhausted he can quickly be hauled back into safety. Having carried the spar out as far as the rope will permit, he thrusts the pole forward to the drowning persons, who can either grasp the pole itself or one of the ropes or handles attached to its end, and their rescue is then a matter of certainty. Such an appliance has everything in its favour. It would be always close at hand, and, being very light, could easily be moved to the exact spot required; it could be used by a landsman quite as efficiently as by a sailor or boatman, and its cost would be so small as compared to that of a boat, that we should imagine it will ere long be very widely adopted at most of the watering-places on our coasts.

THE COMMONS AT COMMONS

CURIOUS are the by-ways and minor organisations of the House of Commons—such as the arrangements for supplying honourable and right honourable gentlemen, at reasonable prices, with refreshments to support exhausted nature during legislative labours. When a "count-out" occurs on an evening expected to be marked by a full assemblage and a lengthened sitting, the caterer is perplexed in a way little imagined by the general public. Few of us can see what connection there is between the Palace of Parliament and a restaurant, between second readings and roast joints, between Select Committees and mulligatawny, between divisions or majorities and chops or steaks; and yet there is a connection.

It arose thus. When the fashion for late dinners had established itself, the dining hour was long after the meeting hour of the Commons, four o'clock; members could dine if they liked at any time (say) from six till nine, but only by interrupting their Parliamentary attendances. Under these circumstances Mr. Bellamy, a wine merchant in the neighbourhood, was permitted to open a refreshment room within the legislative precincts. Cold meat and salad, hot chops and steaks, such were the viands—not set dinners; and the number of partakers was always small.

When the old Houses of Parliament were destroyed by fire, Sir Charles Barry included a regular dining-room as part of the new structure. But then arose a difficulty—who was to manage it, and how? Mr. Bellamy died, and it was found that pastry-cooks and tavern-keepers showed no great inclination to succeed him; a few made the attempt, but lost money by it. At length a Select Committee, aided by the officials of the House, elaborated a plan. The lessee or caterer was to be provided by the House with plate, linen, glass, crockery, gas and candles, dish-covers, wine-coolers, pots and kettles, pans and saucepans, carpeting, matting, brooms, brushes, rubbers, dusters, meat-stands, dripping-stands, knife-cleaners, towel-rollers, &c.; he was to provide, cook, and serve all the creature-comforts; his charges were to be regulated according to a tariff approved by the House; and he was to receive from the House an annual payment to assist in defraying the wages of servants and waiters. One lessee after another tried his fortune, and one after another came (figuratively speaking) with tears in his eyes to assure the honourable House that he could realise no profit out of his contract.

The difficulty was such as an hotel-keeper would feel keenly. At eight o'clock (say) on a particular evening there may be four hundred, two hundred, one hundred members present in the House; an expected stormy debate may suddenly subside, or an adjournment may empty the House at once. What is the result? The unhappy caterer can neither foresee nor control such exigencies, which may very likely upset his entire plans for that day. If he has calculated on a full night and a rush of members into the dining-room at eight o'clock or so, he prepares his resources accordingly; so many joints, so much poultry, so many of the prime pieces which yield chops and steaks, so much vegetables and pastry. If the members come, and he has not enough for them, he is voted a nuisance; if they do not come when he is provided, a serious loss presses on him—as any cook or housewife will easily understand. Some sessions ago it was found on examination that only twenty dinners had been partaken of by honourable members in the dining-room of the House in one week; whereas in another, the fullest week of the Session, the number was five hundred and sixty—more than a hundred per day for five days in the week (Saturday being a dies non). But woe betide the successor to Bellamy if he expects equal numbers on the five days of such a week; there may be two hundred on one day and only fifty the next. How is he to know beforehand; and how to prevent grumbling on the one hand or loss on the other?

Some of the moanings of the successive caterers have been almost amusing—except to those who moan. There is a sort of Permanent Committee on the Kitchen and Refreshment Room, the members of which are the more immediate masters of the caterer, and annually present a report to the House on these culinary and gustatory matters. On one occasion the caterer stated to the Committee that in a certain number of months he had expended 3,608*l.* and received 3,268*l.*—a bad bargain surely! On other occasions, and by this or that caterer, grievances have been brought forward:—that by the rule adjourning the House from seven to nine on Tuesdays and Thursdays, honourable members are tempted to go and dine at home or at their clubs, instead of dining with him; that he wanted gas plate-warmers to be added to the fireplaces in the dining-room during the summer months; that on one occasion he provided a good dinner for a hundred and fifty, but that (owing to a "count out") less than twenty partook of it; and that, unless members notify beforehand that they certainly will dine with him at a certain hour, they may perchance all come rushing down to the dining-room at once (say at the conclusion of a brilliant ~~speech by Mr. Gladstone~~ or a masculine speech by Mr. Bright), driving the chef and his servants to their wits' end.

On the other hand, honourable members sometimes complain of the caterer for this or that instance of shortcoming. On one occasion a member complained that he had been charged fifteen pence for tea; whereas the proper charge, cream with bread-and-butter included, is only one shilling. To this we will only say, that if Mr. Caterer really supplies a "set" tea for a shilling, plenty of it, and well served, honourable members are really not badly off in the matter. On another occasion one of the members complained of the venison and the dinner-ale; the Committee sat thereupon, and summoned the caterer to answer the charges brought against him. Not unfrequently it happens that, when some improvement is requested, either by Mr. Caterer or by one of his guests, a whimsical amount of circumlocution presents itself, owing to the way in which authority is divided. The Committee had one year to report to Parliament that the Sergeant-at-Arms had been requested by them to send a requisition to the Board of Works for some new addition to the pots and pans in the kitchen. In other words, the successor to Bellamy asked the Committee to ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to ask the Board of Works to send in the required supply; and we sincerely hope he got it.

The caterer, for his own immediate interest, must make himself acquainted with any alteration in the hours of meeting. What are called "morning sittings," from twelve till four, are held whenever the House decides on so doing; members who have been present during that sitting are less inclined to be there again in the evening, e.g., they will not dine with Mr. Caterer. Again, the House sometimes meets at two and sits till seven, reassembles at nine and sits till any number of small hours next morning. This is another variation which greatly disturbs all calculations as to the number of diners at any one hour or any one day. The Committee, during a Session a few years ago, discussed whether the dining-room might be made to exhibit, in some conspicuous place, the name of the member who is addressing the House at any particular moment; if he is a star, the diners will bolt their dinners and rush off to hear him; if he is a bore or a nobody, they may finish their meal in quietude. A little consideration will render clear the interest Mr. Caterer has in all such rules. The latest report issued by the Gustatory or Culinary Committee (if we may venture to use such a term) gravely informs the House that "Your Committee desire to call attention to the inefficient state of the ventilation of the large Dining Room, which they believe could be remedied by a ventilating shaft over the Serving Room, so as to carry off the hot air and smells from the kitchen, which have no other exit save through the Dining Room."

As one of the side-lights of the world-renowned British House of Commons, this dining-room system is not a little curious.

"THE HAZARD OF THE DIE, by Mrs. Alfred W. Hunt, author of "Thornicroft's Model," &c. (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—Criticism of the title of a novel is never a very profitable task, and, just at present, is almost unfair besides, as the selection of a title not already appropriated must be a work needing pretty well as much pains and ingenuity as the composition of the story itself. Nevertheless, we cannot help remarking of the name Mrs. Hunt has chosen for her book, that it refers to only one episode in it, and that that episode—the abduction of the heroine by her far away cousin, with the object of half-coaxing, half-forcing her into matrimony with him,—though it is by far the most stirring portion of the whole tale, occupies only about a hundred pages, and has hardly any effect on the general issue. "The Hazard of the Die" is a story of which the period is the opening years of the present century; and the scene, for the most part, the village of Ainderby, in the extreme north of Yorkshire, on the borders of Durham, or "the Bishopric," or "Bishopsrigg," as we are told that county was then styled. Its author being who she is, it is hardly necessary to say that it stands much above the average run of novels, though we cannot regard it as a whole as equal to such former efforts of hers as "Thornicroft's Model," or "Under Seal of Confession." The chapters which form what we may call the prologue are far too much spun out; and even when we are fairly launched into the action there is, save in such episodes as the one we have already mentioned, and that of Lady Lethbridge's clandestine visit to London, with its fatal consequences, a tendency to "drag," which is continually making itself visible. It seems to us that Mrs. Hunt's novel has suffered somewhat from her determination to fill the orthodox three volumes—a determination which has suggested expansion wherever possible rather than the compression which so greatly adds to force, and has led her to crowd her pages with "bits" from the rural life of the time—some of them, indeed, excellent, but others too obviously excrescences, and of faint interest. As for the story, there is so little of it that we might almost state it in a couple of dozen words; but such a brief outline would give an imperfect and misleading idea of it, and we had therefore better leave readers who may be so minded to learn it for themselves. Likeable and winning as the heroine, Alice Lethbridge, otherwise "our Ailie," is, she can hardly be called an original conception; but the position in which we find her is original, and Mrs. Hunt has made skilful use of the opportunities it afforded her. Well contrasted, too, with Alice is her foster-sister, Cordy, the genuine peasant girl who makes so effective a foil to the lady whose lowly lot is but the result of accident. "The Hazard of the Die" is worthy of attention, though we cannot say that we can consider its author as showing herself throughout it in her accustomed "form."

"At the Altar," translated from the German of E. Werner, by Mrs. Parker (2 vols.: Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.); and "Sacred Views," by E. Werner, translated by Bertha Ness (3 vols.: Remington and Co.).—Both these works are translations of Werner's "Am Altar," and in a prefatory note Messrs. Remington and Co. seem to make it a cause of complaint that after they had announced that they had a translation in the press, Messrs. Low and Marston should have brought out their version. With this matter, however, we have nothing to do. As far as the translations are concerned the renderings of Werner's story accomplished by Mrs. Parker and Miss Ness seem to stand on much the same level. Neither is perfect, and neither conspicuously faulty, and the palm rests sometimes with the one, sometimes with the other, though, perhaps, on the whole, as far as we have compared the two together, that of Miss Ness has slightly the advantage. As for the story itself internal evidence would point decidedly to its having been an early composition of its author's; and though it is in parts strong and interesting, as hardly any work of his could fail to be, we should feel not a little hesitation in pronouncing it worth translation. We can hardly regard the theme on which the interest mainly turns as altogether an agreeable one. Father Benedict, a young Benedictine monk of much zeal and promise, falls in love at first sight with a beautiful Protestant maiden, and the feelings thus roused in him lead him to look upon the vows of celibacy he has taken upon himself, first as hateful and unbearable, and then as an unreal and unnatural burden. And, of course, as Herr Werner intends us to sympathise with his hero, the cloister and its inmates have to be presented in the most odious light, and we get a view of monasticism which might delight the soul of Mr. Whalley. The book is, in fact, open to the many objections we always feel to the controversial novel, though the element of religious controversy is conspicuous by its absence; as it is simply as a man, and not at all as a theologian, that young Benedict, or Bruno, comes to regard the yoke of his vows and of his creed as one that he cannot and ought not to bear. The tale is told with ability, and contains some powerfully-drawn characters.

"Salthurst," by Mrs. Arthur Lewis, author of "The Master of Riverswood" (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley).—This is an unequal book, but it is, in the main, remarkably well written, and we come across many scenes of real power. The account of the heroine's childhood is charming, and we can only regret that the author should have been in such a hurry to make her grow up, as with mature years she somewhat loses her hold on our regard. The shipwreck, again, in the third volume, is a very vivid scene, and all the more effective from the skill with which it is worked in and led up to. "Salthurst" may not be distinctly a book of mark, but it is well worth reading, and very much better fare than the novel-reader ordinarily gets set before him.

"Bonnie Lesley," by Mrs. Herbert Martin, author of "Cast Adrift," &c. (Griffith and Farran).—We should imagine this was a tale written principally for young ladies, and a very fascinating one of its kind it is. "Bonnie Lesley" is a delightfully fresh, tender, and sparkling heroine, with just enough spice in the way of petulance and self-will to give her a zest, and save her from "goody-goodiness;" and the history of the love that springs up between her and the blind savant—he is a handsome man still on the right side of fifty, be it understood—whose amanuensis and reader she becomes, is very pleasantly and naturally told. The tale is, indeed, one to be enjoyed a great deal more thoroughly than many with far higher pretensions.

TRIOLETS FOR TRAVELLERS

I.—AT BAVENO

YOU remember the day,
At the Isola Bella!
When we dreamed in the bay,
How the time sped away!
And pray what did you say,
'Neath the snowy umbrella?
You remember the day,
At the Isola Bella!

II.—PASSING BACHARACH

When the Rhine they were on,
They had only one Murray.
'Twasn't Lindley, but John,
They so doted upon;
How his red book they'd con!
And ne'er deem it a worry—
When the Rhine they were on,
They had only one Murray.

III.—ON THE WAY TO THE MONTANVERT

When I last saw sweet Nell,
At the spring by the mountain!
Her small hand—I must tell—
Like a pretty pink shell,
As a cup did so well,
I drank deep from the fountain.
When I last saw sweet Nell,
At the spring by the mountain!

IV.—ON FILEY SANDS

Down by the summer sea,
Amid the sand and shingle;
Small foot-prints (Is it she?)—
I follow them with glee,
But large ones—woe is me!—
With little ones commingle.
Down by the summer sea,
Amid the sand and shingle!

REFORM IN THE GORGEOUS DRESS OF EASTERN MONARCHS is being introduced by the King of Burmah, who, finding his treasury low, has taken to wearing paper hats, as less expensive than ordinary headgear.

A CLUB TO PROMOTE THE KNOWLEDGE OF ENGLISH AMONG GERMANS has been formed in Frankfort, according to the Frankfurter Presse. Most of the members are gentlemen who have lived in England, Australia, and America, who meet to keep up their acquaintance with the English language and introduce it among their friends, while English newspapers and periodicals are freely circulated, and weekly meetings are held at which lectures and readings are given in English.

AN ATTEMPT TO MODERATE EXCESSIVE DRINKING across the Atlantic has been made in Virginia, where, in the various city bars and saloons, a small tax—to be paid by the consumer—is levied on each separate "drink" served out. The number of drinks is registered by means of a bell-punch—a combination of the gas-meter and a gong struck by a spring with a hammer attached—and a revenue commissioner comes at certain intervals to take the state of the register. The experiment has not worked very well hitherto, as the bar-keepers dislike the exciseman's visit, and the customers find it cheaper to drink at home.

I.

We have in the Nineteenth Century for July a very noticeable fragment from Mr. W. J. Thoms, concerning the alleged Will of Peter the Great, a document containing the famous injunction from that monarch to his successors, "Approach as near as possible to Constantinople and towards the Indies. He who reigns at Constantinople will be the real sovereign of the world." This Will, it is well known, has been very generally believed to be apocryphal, and the theory more or less accepted that it was an invention of Napoleon the First, and first published in a book compiled at his order by one Lesur in 1812, when it was his interest to represent Russian greed of territory as insatiable. But though Mr. Thoms admits that Lesur's book was inspired by Napoleon, and thinks it probable that the editio princeps of the so-called Will first appeared in this book, it does not follow, he reminds us, that the Will was a forgery, and he proceeds to set forth many weighty reasons for supposing that such a legacy was actually left by the great Czar to his successors. His case, as he states it, is undoubtedly a strong one; on the other hand there is the fact that the existence of such a document has been absolutely denied both by the Emperor Alexander I., and by the present Emperor, of whose denial Mr. Thoms says that there cannot be the slightest doubt that his Majesty only said what he conscientiously believed to be the truth. Could, then, such a document exist without the knowledge of the Czars? Mr. Thoms thinks this hypothesis admissible; to us, we own, it seems beset with difficulties.—The "Modern Symposium" on the question, "Is the Popular Judgment in Politics more just than that of the Higher Orders?" is continued and concluded by Mr. W. R. Greg, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Gladstone, and Lord A. Russell. By far the most racy utterance on the subject is that which we have from Mr. Lowe. The question, he says, really amounts to this, Which will be likely to give you a right answer on a point of politics, "the man who has had some kind of education, or the man who has not passed beyond a very moderate acquaintance with reading and writing, probably somewhat the worse for wear?" "Was ever paradox so strange as to maintain that a man with all the causes of error incident to the wisest, and several more peculiarly his own, is less liable to error than they?" The Member for London University, it is clear, feels towards Lord Arthur Russell and his unfortunate question much as Dr. Johnson did towards the young gentleman who inquired of him whether eels were to be considered viviparous or oviparous animals. "Sir," said the Doctor, "you should read the common books of natural history, and not come to a man of a certain age and some attainments with such a question as whether the cat lays eggs."—Mr. George Howell furnishes an instructive paper on the History of the International Association, an association which, he says, never was in any sense a secret society; on the contrary, one of the standing complaints of its Council used to be that the Press ignored them, and they could not obtain sufficient publicity. The vague ideas afloat as to the powers and organisation of this dreaded society Mr. Howell asserts to be mere dreams.—We have a very excellent article—to be followed apparently by others—on "Music and Musical Criticism," by Mr. Edmund Gurney, the drift of which is to urge "the independent and isolated position of the emotions caused by music." It is too much the practice, Mr. Gurney says in effect, with a certain school to express, so to say, music in terms of poetry, and talk about the "poetical conceptions" to be found, for instance, in a sonata of Beethoven's. Fancies have even run so wild in this direction that the writer tells us he has heard of a dispute between a master and pupil as to whether a particular modulation in a sonata of Mozart's meant "but" or "if." But it is not the meaning of the modulation or the melody, but the modulation or melody itself that was in the thoughts of the composer, and gives the true artistic musical pleasure to the hearers. —Dr. Vance Smith's argument against sacerdotalism in all its varieties—that as the Apostles and first generation of Christians lived in almost daily expectation of the Second Advent of the Lord and the end of the world, it is inconceivable that they should have consciously sought to lay the foundations of a vast ecclesiastical fabric to stand for centuries after their time, and that therefore "the Church" must be regarded as having come about as an afterthought, and as being of essentially human, not Divine construction,—is powerfully urged, but it will probably be objected by those disinclined to acquiesce in his conclusions that he looks on Christianity altogether as too merely human an institution.—Among the other contents of the number Colonel Brackenbury's paper, the object of which is to show that field artillery could easily and with the greatest advantage be protected from the infantry fire and shrapnel of the enemy by the employment of moveable iron shields, deserves special mention.

In the Contemporary Review, under the heading of "Contemporary Life and Thought in Germany," we have from Professor von Schulte a singularly able outline of the conflict which has now been going on for at least six years between the German Government and Catholicism. The Professor is no friend to Ultramontanism or the Infallibility dogma; but he thinks the German Government went on an entirely wrong tack in meeting the danger by the enactment of the Falk Laws,—laws just sufficiently vexatious and oppressive to be felt as persecution, without being of a severity likely really to overawe and compel submission. That any action on the part of the Government could have hindered German Catholics from accepting the decree of the Vatican Council we must, however, take the liberty of doubting. As was pointed out long ago, the necessary materials for a schism were altogether wanting. —We have a curious paper on "Æonian Metempsychosis," by Mr. Francis Peek, who suggests, àpropos of a recent discussion in the Review, that possibly the "intermediary state" may have an earthly location, and that "those who have failed in past lives" may, "not in another sphere, not as spirits only, but by re-incarnation in this very world, again and again, if need be, return to undergo æonian punishment on earth till the Gospel reaches their hearts and sets them free for ever." We cannot say that such a theory strikes us as having much in its favour; but it is perhaps a little odd that Mr. Peek should seemingly be quite unaware that what he is advocating is the favourite dogma of the Spiritualists, or "Spiritists," as they like to be called. —We cannot at all agree with the view put forward by Mr. W. Cyples in a paper, entitled "Johnson without Boswell," that Johnson would stand higher in popular estimation, if it were not for the picture we have of him in Boswell's "Life," and if we only knew him by his writings. "In Dr. Johnson's works," says Mr. Cyples, "looking at them in the bulk, there is no oddity, nothing unsound." But, "between Johnson's own personal grotesqueness, his odd social eccentricities, and its being made nearly impossible for anybody now ever to think of him except in conjunction with a simpleton, his effect upon us is considerably trivialised." Mr. Cyples, we think, is tilting against windmills, but his paper is worth reading; as is also that by Dr. James Donaldson on "The Position and Influence of Women in Ancient Greece;" and that by the Hon. and Rev. W. H. Freemantle on "The Future of Judaism."

Macmillan takes high rank amongst the magazines of this month on the strength of "A College Breakfast Party," a blank-verse poem, by George Eliot, which often rises to a very high pitch of poetical fire and beauty, though we must say, at the same time, that there are lines in it here and there which almost rival the darkest places of Mr. Browning for obscurity. The piece has been admirably characterised in the Spectator as "a striking picture of the profound intellectual chaos of the time." On the youthful interlocutors in this poetical symposium George Eliot has bestowed the names of Hamlet's circle at Wittenberg. We have Hamlet himself and Horatio, Osric and Laertes, "discursive Rosencranz" and "grave Guildenstern;" and it is easy, if we please, to fancy that these stand for well-known leaders of thought and opinion among us. The debate turns on the questions whether there is any absolute supreme good for man, and any rule of life and conduct absolutely binding upon him, and we may note that all the disputants assume, though neither of them asserts, the non-existence of any guiding and controlling Power above and outside of the natural and human order. Of course, it is impossible for us to attempt here any outline of the arguments brought forward, but we confess that Rosencranz and Osric, who answer the above stated questions in the negative, seem to us to have logically very much the better of "grave Guildenstern," who, perhaps, most nearly expresses George Eliot's own convictions, and who would find a supreme good and a binding rule in some "Outward" rather vaguely described as > the tide

> Of needs reciprocal, toil, trust, and love—
> The surging multitude of human claims
> Which make "a presence not to be put by"
> Above the horizon of the general soul.

We have besides in the magazine, under the title of "Cheap Literature for Village Children," a very vigorous protest against the tame and silly, and often mawkish and absolutely unwholesome trash which squires and parsons and their ladies are apt to think good enough for the entertainment and instruction of village children, though they would never dream of setting such sorry fare before their own offspring.—Mr. J. C. Morison's review of M. Taine's "La Révolution" is also very well worth attention.

"The Memoir of a Wicked Nobleman" in Temple Bar gives us some account of the career of Lawrence, fourth Earl Ferrers, "a truculent personage," as he is well described, of the last century, who in 1760 murdered his steward, and was subsequently hanged for the murder at Tyburn.—The gem of the number is Mr. Frederick Wedmore's brief essay on "Some Tendencies in Recent Painting," containing a singularly just and delicate critical estimate of Mr. Burne Jones's artistic achievements and tendencies, which we heartily recommend to the notice both of that gentleman's over ardent admirers and too unsympathetic detractors. Mr. Wedmore preaches from the text of Mr. Burne Jones's pictures now to be seen in the Grosvenor Gallery, and it seems to us that he has said the absolutely right and fitting words about them.—We have besides in the paper devoted to Mrs. Thrale-Piozzi another of those sketches of departed celebrities or quasi-celebrities which seem becoming a speciality of the magazine.

London Society is, as usual, brim-full of stories, long and short, and contains further instalments of "The Adventures of a Field Cricket," and "Switzerland, by Pen and Pencil," papers of which we have more than once already spoken in terms of praise.—We have also some "Shooting Notes at Wimbledon," which are, at any rate, well-timed, and contain one very tolerably good story; and an account of a fortnight recently spent in Paris in paying a visit to the Exhibition, with a description of a descent made by the writer into the Paris catacombs, so that, on the whole, the number may be considered one of at least average merit.

III.

Prison work tells dreadfully upon the matrons. Many break down before the ten years of service which entitle them to a pension. The anxiety instead of becoming lighter through custom seems to intensify. "Prison on the brain," may be described as the state of the authorities. The nervous watchfulness seems to prey upon the mind. "The Deputy-Superintendents wear out first, for their holidays are fewer, their responsibility almost as great, and their hours of duty approximate more to the matron's than the principal's." The average amount of holidays is, we believe, eleven days, which is not enough for such peculiarly wearing and anxious work. It is a gratifying circumstance that no such complaints have been made against the matrons of convict prisons as unhappily have been common enough against the warders of the male prisons. Another obvious improvement would be that there should be a greater number of superintendents, and that these superintendents should be entrusted to hold a larger amount of friendly intercourse with such convicts as have come to be regarded as "exemplary" prisoners. The late Mary Carpenter strongly advocated that the system which had worked so well in Ireland under the supervision of Sir Walter Crofton should be applied to England. Ladies of approved position and character were permitted to visit the prisons, each lady confining her ministrations to members of the same religious body to which she herself belonged. Of the religious agencies in the female prisons we have a very gratifying account. The chaplain's mission is felt by these poor women to be a sincere and beneficent one. "He'd do us good if he could," one was heard to say, "and he believes what he says, but it's all nonsense." "I never can understand him," says another, "I never heard anything like it afore." Of course there are an immense number of spasmodic emotional women whose repentance is worthless, but while there continue to be, as is happily the case, many authentic instances of moral reformation, these efforts will not be relaxed. The Scripture-readers do a great deal of good, and the worst women will treat a good woman with respect. They will probably receive a greater degree of confidence than the chaplain. They are of some practical use in advising women how they may find a home and get into honest work after their discharge from prison. The "Prison Matron" thinks that the Scripture-readers rather "over-do" their religious duties. She thinks that if instead of so much religious instruction employment was made less sedentary, something done in the way of lectures, readings, and class singing, and more cheerfulness and fibre imparted to their existence, the result would be happier. "Prisoners object," says the matron, "to constant lecturing and to being prayed for constantly; they are rather afraid of the ladies, and will very frequently do their best to evade them." Letters have often been received from poor women who have happily been enabled to escape the meshes of the net in which they have been entangled, and have written gratefully to the prison authorities to avow how much they owe them. Their first lessons in goodness have been learned in the rough teachings of a Convict Prison. No instrumentality has been more useful this way than the various Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies, whose work has a larger claim than is acknowledged on public benevolence, and a good claim also to be supplemented by the assistance of the State.

The question is, How will they be able to build up the moral stamina which will enable them to resist temptation? Sometimes women struggle on bravely for years, and then succumb to their temptations and trials, and sink once more into the abysmal ocean of crime. But, as a rule, they are full of good intentions when they leave prison. They are quite sure that they will never come there again. When they go away the Government treats them with more consideration than is the case with the male prisoners. If they go to London a matron accompanies them home, and leaves them there with words of kindness and encouragement. In one of Mr. Gilbert's clever works, "Them Boots," we have the account of the resolute attempt of some poor woman to reform. Sometimes these prisoners have sent useful presents to be given to old friends on their discharge, with best love. Sometimes they form passionate attachments towards fellow prisoners, or even the officials. No effort that is helpful in softening and humanising woman's nature can really be thrown away upon them. It is to be hoped that the long discipline of years is not thrown away, and that both the direct and indirect training they receive are for good. The documentary evidence laid by Government before Parliament is certainly all this way. The schoolmistresses praise the women. The chaplains praise them still more. They say that for Bible reading and attention to religious duties they are quite up to the average parish, and even beyond it. This may be seen by reference to the annual reports presented to Parliament by the Directors of Prisons. The Governors and Lady Superintendents are perhaps a shade less amiable and sympathetic in their reports than the clergy. The chief difficulty in dealing with female prisoners arises from ill-temper. It is indeed bad temper often that originally drove them into crime, and lunacy doctors have said that some forms of insanity are simply exaggerated bad temper. Every year there is a small number of attempts at suicide, but these attempts are almost invariably feigned, just as there are cases of simulated sickness. It is another unfavourable circumstance that a considerable number of prisoners after their release find their way back again to prison. But, after all deductions, no one can examine the reports, and verify them by careful inspection, without perceiving that a really good work is achieved with results that would at one time have seemed impossible.

STYLE IN LITERATURE

"Style," said Wordsworth, "is in poetry of incalculable importance," and he might have said also that it was of infinite value in prose. We use words, no doubt, for the sake of expressing thought, and as a soul is more precious than the body which forms its temporary home, so are a man's thoughts more valuable than the dress in which he sees fit to clothe them. But just as beautiful thoughts are tenfold more welcome when uttered from lovely lips, and the soul expresses its emotion and meaning most readily through lovely eyes, so do all noble ideas depend for their vitality and for the sympathy they call forth upon the style in which they are brought before the world. It is style quite as much as wealth of imagination or of intellect which has preserved the masterpieces of Greece and Rome, and it is style on which many of the great works of modern literature depend for their chance of immortality.

Style, be it remarked, is something more than the exact and exquisite arrangement of words. The man who thinks clearly can generally express himself clearly; clumsiness of expression arises but too often from looseness and incoherence of thought. An ill-educated person, in relating the simplest incidents, will repeat himself or contradict himself; he will dwell upon what is trivial and lose sight of what is important. He has a dim perception of what he wishes to say, but does not know how to say it. On the other hand, the master of style is he who possesses the sense of proportion, who sees in all its bearings the subject upon which he writes, and who has an ear for the rhythmical harmony of words. And it must be a delicate ear. There is a rhetorical flashiness of style which is mistaken for eloquence, a bumptiousness of style which is mistaken for power, an insipidity of style which is mistaken for simplicity. How, then, is the reader to know the false from the true, how best shall he separate pinchbeck from pure metal? Rules of composition, and illustrations of careless grammar and false imagery, though of little service, are not wholly without value; but the one sure method of gauging accurately the value of literary style is by the study of the best masters. A great English writer is not, indeed, always remarkable for a fine style. Milton's Latinised form of sentences, his foul speaking, his coarse invective, are faults to be shunned, not beauties to be imitated; but Milton at his best, whether in prose or verse, is a king among men, and there is that in his words which, to quote his own expression, men "will not willingly let die." Burns's style as a poet, when he sings in his native Doric, is excellent; but his prose—take, for instance, the letters to Clarinda—is inflated and affected. Cowper, again, in the series of poems which preceded "The Task," writes often in a slovenly and careless fashion; but in the finest portions of "The Task" itself, words and thoughts attain a noble harmony, and the graceful charm of his "Letters" is, we think, unequalled by any English letter-writer. There is nothing remarkable in the style of Fanny Burney's delightful story, "Evelina,"—nothing remarkable, but something perfectly satisfactory, for there is no effort or pretension; no display of the egregiously fine writing which ruined some of her later works. It sometimes happens that an author is great, in spite of an utterly loose and slipshod style—Samuel Richardson, for example. Read his men's letters, and you will see that he writes twaddle; the language of his novels, too, is without sinewy strength, without sweetness, without any appreciation of point or of poetical beauty. It is the sort of style that would be adopted by an old maid devoted to tea and scandal, and yet no critic worth his salt would deny that "Clarissa Harlowe," despite its prolixity, and a thousand faults besides, is one of the greatest works of fiction our literature has produced. Clarissa Harlowe and Sir Charles Grandison are great, in spite of Richardson's inability to use his mother tongue; but it is due chiefly to this defect that they are now so seldom read. On the other hand, how much does Goldmith's exquisite story, "The Vicar of Wakefield," owe to the inimitable language in which it is told, so that after upwards of a century it remains a model of pure and graceful English? So do many of Addison's Essays. Dr. Johnson's praise of Addison's style as "familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious," is by no means unmerited. What it lacks is force and fire; Addison's words never stir the blood; they do but charm the fancy and fall gratefully on the ear. Not one of the Queen Anne men, if we remember rightly, wrote in a rich, melodious style; for that we must look to an earlier age, and also to a later—to the best of the Elizabethan authors, and to such authors in our own century as Charles Lamb and De Quincey, Walter Savage Landor and Mr. Ruskin. Some comparatively early English remains unsurpassed to this day—witness our Bible and our Book of Common Prayer. A literature possessing such models is not likely to degenerate utterly; but, unfortunately, several of the most popular of modern authors are deserving of little praise as masters of style, while some who, years ago, might have been pointed out as models have degenerated in their later works. In George Eliot's "Scenes of Clerical Life," in her "Adam Bede," and "Silas Marner," for example, the flexibility, the purity, the simplicity of the English tongue are exhibited in every page; but who will venture to say the same of "Daniel Deronda"? Mr. Carlyle, again, who has probably done more for literature than any man of the last half century, has a way of expressing himself which, although we can tolerate, and we may even say enjoy it, in a writer of such genius, affords a bad example to ordinary men. It may lead them to mistake peculiarity of expression for richness and suggestiveness of thought. Truly has it been said by Warton, that "after a certain period, in every country and in every language, men grow weary of the natural and search after the singular."

The student of style, it is evident, must not imagine that a great writer's language is always pure and idiomatic, but it is, perhaps, always worthy of study, and it is by large comparison, by wide reading, that he will learn which style to prefer. The man of catholic tastes will confine himself to no narrow groove. He will appreciate the majestic strength of Hooker, the exuberant fancy of Jeremy Taylor, the familiar ease of Swift, the ornate and sonorous periods of Gibbon, the glowing invective of Junius, the carefully exact and yet generous eloquence of Robert Hall. He will learn even to prefer the faults of a splendid mannerist like Lord Macaulay to the colourless accuracy of some of his critics; and if he cannot accept the subtle arguments of Dr. Newman, he will listen with delight to the persuasive music of sweet words in which his thoughts are clothed.

After all, the chief masters of style are the poets, and the best orators and prose writers have been always loving students of poetry. Spenser, Shakespeare, Shelley, and Tennyson show us better than the grammarians can how to use words, and they show us also how unfathomable are the depths, how inaccessible the heights of our noble English tongue to all save inspired singers. SOME PIECES OF CHINA

MANY of the customs of the Chinese are exactly the opposite of our own, while others appear almost revolting to us. Something may be said in favour of having soup at the conclusion of a dinner, instead of at the commencement, because that is a convenient way of filling up the interstices, though the practice of taking sweetmeats first is more doubtful, inasmuch as they are quite as likely to clog the stomach as to create an appetite. The custom of shaking one's own hands instead of those of our friend has its advantages in a country where skin diseases abound, and there can be no question as to the logicality and practicality of beginning the address of a letter with the country to which it is sent, and so working downwards through the province and town and family name of the intended recipient to his Christian, or rather, so far as China is concerned, to his individual, name. There are other differences between the Chinese and ourselves which may be said to be matters of indifference. It is difficult to say that there is any more reason in speaking of "East-north" than of "North-east," because though in the latter case we start from the pole of our hemisphere, the Chinese may claim the convenience of taking the rising of the sun as their starting-point. Neither can we say, without descending into a most vulgar Oriental reason which has no application among civilised races, that there is any cause for placing an honoured guest on our right hand rather than on our left, as the Celestials do; nor is there anything in the eternal fitness of things why shoes should be blackened rather than whitened.

There are, however, customs in the Flowery Land which must be condemned on principles applicable to all climes. Such is the practice of compressing the feet of the women of the better classes, which is decidedly "a rum 'un," and must have given rise to a prodigious aggregate of feminine inconvenience and misery. We may say also that when gastronomy comes down to the canine and feline species it ceases to be a reputable art. We are entitled to object to—

> Mandarins in yellow buttons, handing us conserves of snails;
> Smart young men about Canton, in Nanking tights and peacock's tails;
> With many rare and dreadful dainties, kitten cutlets, puppy pies;
> Bird's-nest soup which (so convenient), every bush around supplies.

As a matter of fact, gelatinous birds'-nests suitable for making soup are not so easily attainable, and are not to be found on the bushes of China; snails have been long recommended in this country as a diet for consumption; and a single peacock's feather in the hat of a mandarin is surely somewhat less ridiculous than a heavy load of horse's hair on the head of an English judge. It is no wonder that the Chinese Minister to England remarked in one of his recent speeches that, much as he had found to admire in England, he was not sure, when he came to know that foreign country well, that it was so much more rational than his own. Still, when we come to kitten cutlets and puppy pies, we fail to admire the Celestial wisdom of arrangements—always, of course, excepting the admirable hams of Shan-tung, made from the hind-quarters of dogs fed upon grain, of which we have partaken with zest. We have hitherto lain under the impression that there was a good deal of exaggeration in regard to the fondness of the natives of the Flowery Land for dogs, cats, rats, and similar delicacies, having failed to meet with them after a very extended acquaintance with Chinese cookery in the interior of the country, where no other cookery is to be had, but in so large and populous a country it is very unsafe to conclude from one's own necessarily limited experience as to what it is not. The Most Venerable Archdeacon Gray, in his recently published work on China, offers evidence on this point, and states that in Canton and some other cities there is a rather low class of restaurant to be found called "Kow-Yuk Poo," in which visitors are served with dog's and cat's flesh, and he even gives us the following interesting translation of one of their bills of fare:—

"Cat's flesh, one basin	10 cents.
Black cat's flesh, one small basin . .	5 "
Wine, one bottle	3 "
Wine, one small bottle	1½ "
Black dog's grease, one tael . . .	4 "
Black cat's eyes, one pair	4 "

"All guests dining at this restaurant are requested to be punctual in their payments."

Dr. Gray states incidentally that he has seen people dining at these restaurants; and so we must accept his authority as conclusive, though it is to be regretted that he has not been more explicit as to how far he writes from his personal experience. The Chinese have a singular pleasure in administering to the appetite of a gobemouche, even when the joke may turn against themselves. Dr. Gray himself refers to a notable incident of this kind, that in which Sir John Barrow was introduced by the Imperial Commissioner to some singing girls as the wives of the Governor-General, the Governor, and the Treasurer of the province of Kwang-tung. There are not many foreigners who get behind the impassive yellow mask of a Chinaman's face, and perceive the sometimes malignant, but as often amused, air with which they are being keenly watched. We should like to be quite sure as to where Dr. Gray got his bill of fare, and as to the precise meaning, in Canton Chinese, of such phrases as "black cat's eyes." A Chinese philosopher might comment unfavourably on our curious fondness for "Welsh rabbits," though the rabbits of Wales are no better than other rabbits; and he might expatiate feelingly on the loathsomeness of such a dish as "toad in the hole," made from creatures which even the poorest Celestials would refuse to eat. Even in French and German cookery he would not fail to find dishes of a surprising and revolting character, if he judged from the literal meaning of tha names affixed to them. We do not say that such misunderstanding affords a clue to the actual meaning of the venerable Archdeacon's bill of fare—probably it does not; but it at least illustrates the advisability of writers on China, as well as on other countries, clearly stating stating how much of the information they give is actually drawn from their own experience. In China, misunderstandings are peculiarly liable to arise from the sources of information, which are often the only sources available at the moment. For instance, we know of a case in which the lieutenant commanding a gun-boat observed three junks, in a bay on the coast, firing furiously, apparently at one another, and asked his Chinese servants what sort of vessels these were. The "boy," with no doubt a regard to possible loot, but with a twinkle in his eye which betrayed some sense of humour, gravely scanned the junks, and promptly replied, "He belong Pilong;" on which the lieutenant commanding immediately ordered his long gun to be run out and prepared his formidable vessel for action; and was only prevented from "prompt measures" by the suggestion of a more experienced Englishman, to whom he was giving a passage, that as the day was sacred to the Queen of Heaven, it was not impossible, as turned out to be the case, that the junks were firing cannon and exploding crackers, not at each other, but in her honour. THE READER

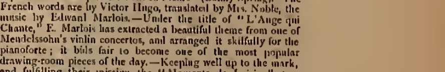
"DIDEROT," by John Morley (2 vols.: Chapman and Hall). These able volumes—worthy companions to the "Voltaire" and "Rousseau"—complete the series of studies of the three foremost chiefs among the literary precursors of the Republic of 1789. Less brilliant as a man of letters than Voltaire, less interesting as a psychical study than Rousseau, superior to both in grasp and range of philosophic thought, Diderot, as a living influence in his age, falls little behind these other two—a thinker of whom Danton is the direct heir, as Robespierre is of Rousseau. Yet of the thousands who know the story of Rousseau, or have dipped at least into the writings of Voltaire, few only have heard much besides the name of the once famous son of the worthy cutler of Langres, the informing spirit of the "Encyclopædia." The fault, it is true, is in some respects his own. Laborious, versatile, energetic in the extreme, Diderot was sadly careless of his fame. He wrote not to bequeath a monument to all time, but to supply the necessities of the hour or influence the movements of his age. The light of the new revolt against the dogmatic teachings of the Church, against the hardness and the cruelties of the secular power, broke on him to be refracted in a thousand rays, and so spent. Some of his most interesting work, from a literary point of view—the "Neveu de Rameau," the Letters to Madame Voland—only found its way into print years after his death, and, as it seemed, by merest accident. His business life was in great measure a continued battle with the booksellers and the authorities—with trickery, attempted oppression, and espionage. Yet there are few careers of similar struggle for the light with which one is less tempted to associate the martyr's aureole, nor many—even though we must incur the censure of Goethe on "the Philistines who hold Diderot cheaply"—that yield fewer pleasant spots on which to linger. Neither in truth in Diderot's works nor in Diderot's every-day life is there much, we think, that is alluring to nineteenth century taste. The philosophy that charmed men then seems crude, declamatory, unsatisfactory now; the life itself untidy, unattractive, a veritable life of moral deshabille, of a period when sensibility was equivalent to virtue and the aspirations of the belle âme a perfectly satisfactory substitute for goodness. It is in truth in the effect and purpose of the philosophic teachings of those days rather than their immediate and definite conclusions, in the new lines to which they have shifted once and for ever the battle against absolutism in government and doctrine that their real interest now lies. And their merits in this respect are well brought out by Mr. Morley in his admirable chapters on the "New Philosophy," on "the Encyclopædia," and on those kindred works which breathe throughout of Diderot's spirit, Helvetius's "L'Esprit," and Holbach's yet more famous "System of Nature." More pleasing possibly to unphilosophic readers will be the sketches of the critical writings, to which Lessing and through Lessing all German criticism has been indebted, whether on the drama or in the form of those earliest and liveliest of journalistic art critiques, the reviews of the Salons. From every side, however, the story of the life, the purports and importance of the literary work are traced with equal sympathy and insight. We may add that in the appendix will be found a masterly translation—the very thing Carlyle longed for years ago—of the "Neveu de Rameau," that strange and characteristic "farce tragedy," the story of whose re-discovery is among the most curious literary anecdotes of our own, or indeed of any age.

Is it ingratitude to think we breathe a purer air—forgetful that we owe the more bracing atmosphere to men like Diderot—when we turn to latter-day France in its best dress in "Modern Frenchmen: Five Biographies" (Seeley and Co), by P. G. Hamerton? Not very famous, perhaps, any of these five, if fame be measured by the length of Encyclopædic notices; three, indeed, men of whom nine readers out of ten will probably have never heard before; but all of them men whose lives are good to read not simply for the edifying of the very many whose ideas of Frenchmen wander vaguely between the common commis-voyageur type and the slang heroes of the Parisian romances, but better still as instances of a certain noble "intensity of life"—peculiarly French, we think, in its best aspects—as free in every way from coarseness as it is from all that borders on dulness or on languor. All are specimens of the professional classes—Victor Jacquemont of the traveller and the man of science, Perreyve of the priest, Jean Jacques Ampère of the scholar, Rude and Henri Regnault of the sculptor and the painter. They are men of all beliefs, from the submissive Catholicism of Perreyve (dead before his submissiveness could be tested by the decisions of the Vatican Council), to the Voltairian indifferentism of Rude. To analyse their histories, or even to give extracts within our limits would be impossible. To the lives of Victor Jacquemont, the Indian traveller, and of François Rude, the sculptor, the curious reader will probably turn first. Over the story of the latter—a man who might have sat to MM. Erckmann-Chatrian for the model of a simple hero of the Revolutionary epoch—he will not improbably linger last. But every one of the sketches is pleasant, and, better still, thoroughly healthy reading.

The new Series of "English Men of Letters" (Macmillan and Co.) for "those who have to run as they read" could not have opened more happily than with Mr. Leslie Stephen's almost perfect monograph, "Samuel Johnson." Alike as biography and as criticism, the volume is a model of sound taste and easy condensation—a volume indeed that, despite its colder French gray tint, might even compare not disadvantageously with Macaulay's gorgeous Essay. At least, Mr. Stephen is more generous, and we think more correct, than Lord Macaulay in his appreciation of Boswell's real power and genuine Shakespearian gift of telling just enough to indicate character or delineate a situation, yet without ever a superfluous touch. The volume covers fairly every phase in Johnson's life, from his early struggles at Oxford and at Lichfield to the autumn of his days as literary dictator, the first without a second (hardly even excepting Burke) in those club and tavern contests of wit and argument in which, and not in closet studies, as Mr. Stephen well points out, his genius, relieved by company and excitement from its habitual gloom, was able to put out its utmost strength. A few slight omissions excepted—readers, for instance, who "run as they read," would be none the worse for being told in what sense Johnson's father was "sheriff of a county," or in what Edinburgh Review Adam Smith noticed the "Dictionary"—we should be puzzled to name a more delightful volume among the books that address themselves to the million.

More qualified, we fear, must be our praises of "Fashion Then and Now" (2 vols.: Chapman and Hall), a new series of gossippy reminiscences by Lord W. Lennox apropos of dress and dinner in his young days and now, of modern battues and old-fashioned day's-shootings, of wagers, duels, and elections, and, above all, theatrical performances by amateurs and professionals. There is less too, we think, than usual in the present series of personal anecdote, and more of the sort of matter that can be fished up at will from ancient newspapers and magazines. Still, there is much in the two volumes to amuse an easy-going reader, not their worst chapter being a tolerably complete record of feats of activity and endurance in the last century—a record that might startle at times the contemporaries of Weston were they but sure of the perfect accuracy of ancient measurements of space and time.

"Camp Life and Sport in South Africa; or, Experiences of Kaffir Warfare with the Cape Mounted Rifles," by T. J. Lucas (Chapman and Hall), takes us back, as the title shows, to a somewhat distant day, when Kaffir Wars were more formidable affairs than now, and when the lion and the antelope might easily be found in regions from which, we fancy, they have long since withdrawn. A slight, unpretending, little volume, very neatly got up, with some pretty illustrations, it must mainly rest its claims to notice on a few camp anecdotes rather above the average, and some fair descriptions of the native tribes, Bushmen, Hottentot, Fingo, and Kaffir. Still, it will wile away an hour not unpleasantly, and probably does not aspire to do more.



NEW MUSIC

W. CZERNY.——A pleasing drawing-room song for a mezzo-soprano is "Puis que Mai Tout en Fleurs" (Balmy Spring). The French words are by Victor Hugo, translated by Mrs. Noble, the music by Edward Marlois.—Under the title of "L'Ange qui Chante," E. Marlois has extracted a beautiful theme from one of Mendelssohn's violin concertos, and arranged it skilfully for the pianoforte; it bids fair to become one of the most popular drawing-room pieces of the day.—Keeping well up to the mark, and fulfilling their mission, the "Moments de Loisirs," pour piano et violin, have arrived at Nos. 25 to 31; some grave, others gay, but all more or less classical. First we have a simple "Mélodie" by Ergmann, followed by "Florival," a composition of Wekerlin's ably transcribed by W. Czerny. No. 28 is a well-known Mazurka in G minor by Chopin. No. 29, a "Mélodie Celeste," by Mariani. No. 30, a merry "Sailor's Dance," by Handel, very much out of his usual track. No. 31 is a sentimental morceau entitled "Under the Lime Trees," by Volkmann.—Two neatly written pianoforte pieces of a very ordinary type are "Mignonette," by Max Schröter, and "A Dream of Fairyland," by J. Hart Gordon.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN AND CO.——Part III. of "A Dictionary of Music and Musicians" carries us from "Bolero" to "Concert Pitch," and contains a fund of interesting information, including a clever article on the use of the bow, by Paul David. Another upon Carillons is by the editor, together with the lives of many eminent singers, players, and composers, ancient and modern. This work is unique in its way, and is of incalculable value to all musicians.

MESSRS. WOOD AND CO.——Quaint and original are both words and music of a Scottish narrative song by Ellen E. Guthrie, entitled "On the Banks o' the Quair," the only fault to be found with it is seven four-lined verses, without a change of melody, six of which are printed on the back leaf, an old-fashioned and irksome arrangement for those who have bad memories.—The laughable frontispiece, by Concanen, of "The Gulliver Quadrilles" will attract attention to them, but the music, by A. W. Nicholson, and the vocal part ad lib. by Robert Reece, are of a very mediocre description.

MISCELLANEOUS.——"A Faded Flower," the touching poetry of which is by Shelley, and "Reverie," a tender love poem by Burns, have failed to inspire Mr. John Gledhill beyond dull and grammatical compositions; he has been more successful with two poems translated from the German, "The Pain of Separation" and "Serenade."—A graceful example of old-fashioned poetry by Herrick, "Go, Happy Rose," deserves better treatment than it has met with from the musical pen of H. B. Briggs (Messrs. Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.).—By far the best of the many patriotic songs which have appeared of late is "At the Queen's Command." The words, by F. E. Weatherley, are vigorous and inspiriting, the music, by the Countess of Charlemont, is exactly fitted for the poetry, a bold, tuneful melody, which no doubt will soon be made popular by street organs, brass bands, &c., no mean test of popularity (Messrs. Ashbee and Holloway).—The same cannot be said of "Up with the Flag," written and composed by C. A. Latrobe and C. Dubois; neither words nor music are striking or original (Messrs. Witt and Co.).—There is more merit in the words, by the Rev. Dr. Parker, of "The Weather," than in the music by E. Minshull, neither one nor the other soars above mediocrity (Messrs. Simpson and Co.).—Simple to feebleness are the words of "A Shepherd Sits Within a Dell," translated indifferently from the German of Rückert, and the music, by David H. Wilson, M.A., corresponds therewith (Messrs. Weekes and Co.).—A "Scherzo" for the pianoforte, by J. Gledhill, is carefully written; but will add little or nothing to its composer's reputation (Lamborn Cock).—"Souvenir d'Italie," a caprice brillant for the pianoforte by Carlo Tiessel, is showy and effective (Messrs. Wood and Co).—Two good songs for the home circle on Sunday are "Evening," a sacred song, words by Longfellow, music by G. Oolman, and "Agnus Dei," from a mass by the same composer (Messrs. Simpson and Co.).—"Rêve d'Amour," a piece for the pianoforte, by Annie Bushby, is fairly well written, but lacks originality (Messrs. R. Mills and Sons).—The Rev. Dr. Newman's beautiful sacred poem, "Lead, Kindly Light," has been set to music with true devotional feeling by Alfred Allen (Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.).—Pompous and blatant is "England's Clarion," war song, words and music by C. A. Ward; we have had more than enough of bombastic war songs; the subject has been written to death, and great must be the merit of a composition of this type to make it palatable (Messrs. Hopwood and Crewe).—"By Jingo," an "anti-war song," written and composed by John M'Ardle and D. Gribben, has sufficient racy wit in it to make condone a strong flavour of vulgarity which permeates through the second verse is really cleverly put together (W. J. Pillow, Liverpoo —The "Torpedo Mazurka," by F. E. S., is one of the best we ha heard for some time past, the time is so well marked (Messrs. Re Brothers).—We may say the same of "Marguerite," a waltz, by Caroli Lowthian (J. Scrutton).—An excellent series of "Exercises and So feggios," for contralto or bass, by Alfeo Gilardoni, are so well ar progressively arranged that an ordinarily painstaking student will bene much by steadily practising them (Messrs. Duff and Stewart).—Tw graceful trifles for the pianoforte, which should be learnt by hear are "Lullaby," the prettier of the two, and "Gondoliera;" both a by Max Schroter (J. Scrutton).

W. C. BENNETT'S NEW VOLUME,
Cr. 8vo., Cloth, 4s.

SEA SONGS. By W. C. Bennett. "While Dr. Bennett's new volume of sea songs is admirably qualified to attract maritime hearers, many of them are as well fitted to be sung in the drawing-room as on the bosom of the Atlantic. Simple, free, flowing, and full of buoyant vigour, they are now stirring and joyous in tone, and again unaffectedly pathetic. Their writer has caught the genuine odour and flavour of salt winds and blue foamy waves; he gives us songs of parting—grateful, simple, and tender—songs that tell of lonely musings in tropic calms, of ships beating amid sleet and snow 'round the Horn,' straining under clouds of canvas after flying foes, or sweeping into palmy isles over the Pacific swell; and he descants with the fiery energy of diction of the great deeds of Blake and Anson, Vernon and Pellew—naval worthies whom his songs should make more than names to the people. In short, Dr. Bennett's new volume is altogether excellent, and can scarcely fail to attain extensive popularity."—Freeman.

The Chances of a Dissolution.——There seems to be a general expectation that Parliament is about to be dissolved, and if the expectation is realised it will be impossible to blame the Government. The changes which have been effected, whether we like them or not, are at any rate of vast importance; and it would be perfectly natural that the Ministry should ask the nation openly to sanction their policy. There can be no doubt that the Tories have at present a much better chance of success than they would have a year or two hence. In the first place, the Premier is personally one of the most popular Ministers who have wielded power in this country for a century. We do not enter into the question whether his popularity is deserved; but that it is a reality is beyond dispute. Then, although the country is at present content with the arrangements which have been made, the probability is that as time goes on they will seem rather less satisfactory than they do now. The gains of Russia will appear greater, and we shall all realise more perfectly the weight of the fresh load which has been laid on "the weary Titan." Another consideration is that our new duties in the East could hardly be handed over to a Government representing a party which altogether disapproves of them. For a time, at least, the Cabinet may fairly plead, the task should be undertaken by those with whom it originated, and who must be supposed to have the clearest apprehension of its conditions. What the Tories are less likely to see, but what is not less certain, is, that England will by and by become irritated by their expensive methods of government. The outlay of the nation is rising year after year at a rather alarming rate; and although this attracts little attention in these exciting times, it will not always escape notice. Nor will John Bull, when the day of reckoning comes, enter very closely into the question whether the increased expenditure has been justified. He will restrict himself to the fact, and demand that by some means or other it shall be changed. All this must be perfectly clear to Lord Beaconsfield; and, as it must be plain to Lord Hartington too, the latter is probably anxious to avoid a division in regard to the Eastern Question. If there were no division, there would hardly be so good a pretext for an appeal to the constituencies.

Back from the Congress.——Lord Beaconsfield showed a consideration which was no more than just in desiring that Lord Salisbury should be included with himself in the hearty welcome accorded to him on his return to England, for Lord Salisbury was not only the Premier's colleague at Berlin, but his vigorous Circular of April 1st did much to clear the diplomatic atmosphere by showing Europe exactly what this country wanted. At the same time there can be no doubt that the lion's share of the popular ovation was intended for Lord Beaconsfield. This is partly because, being a man of a peculiar and original stamp, his career has been for many years watched with keen attention both by friends and foes, so that everybody was interested to see him on Tuesday at the top, as it were, of the tree up which he has been climbing so patiently for many years past. We say advisedly the top of the tree, for no additional titular honours can raise him to a substantially higher position than he now occupies. But, independent of the admiration, or (in the case of political opponents) the wonderment, caused by the elevation of this unique personality to such a height, does not Lord Beaconsfield, we may fairly ask, deserve the cheers of Tuesday last for other and more solid reasons? We think he does. The popular instinct is generally right, and the crowds who welcomed him welcomed not merely a brilliant adventurer who had won his way to the foremost place in the Queen's service, but a statesman who had maintained the honour of his country, and yet had saved it from a desolating war. From the very beginning of the troubles in Turkey Lord Beaconsfield saw what his opponents failed to see, that there was a point where Russian ambition would become dangerous to the interests of this country, and he has held firmly and consistently to this view, even when deserted by some of his own colleagues. The voice of posterity may decide that Lord Beaconsfield was wrong, and that those who opposed him were right, but at present there can be little doubt that the mass of the nation takes his side.

England and the Treaties.——The two Treaties which have just been concluded are still the absorbing subject of speculation, and now that the Parliamentary discussion is about to begin we may expect that for some time to come hardly any other public question will receive serious attention. There can be no doubt, notwithstanding the sanguine tone of Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury, that there is a good deal of genuine discontent with the results which have been achieved. As a matter of course, the party which has opposed the Government from the beginning complains that we have not done nearly enough in helping to break up the Ottoman Empire. It is not critics of this stamp, however, whom the Ministry have reason to fear. The mass of the British people never desired to see the Porte abolished, and would have been intensely dissatisfied had their Plenipotentiaries gone a step further in this direction. The most serious opposition, although it may be carried on rather in the Press than in Parliament, will come from those who are of opinion that far too much has been conceded to Russia. It must be admitted, even by the Cabinet itself, that the concessions of England have been very great. Notwithstanding all our protests, Bessarabia and Batoum are now both under the Czar; and he has acquired enormously increased power in South Eastern Europe. Still, the gains of this country, if we count them up impartially, are far more considerable than the violent enemies of Russia will allow. A glance at the map laid before Parliament suffices to prove this. The Treaty of San Stefano would have made Russia supreme in Turkey; her influence cannot now extend beyond the Balkans, and even to the north of that range she will henceforth have to consider Austria a direct rival. Good government will be secured in provinces hitherto oppressed, while, by the exercise of a little caution, we may prevent ourselves from being again taken by surprise by Russian encroachments. In Asia we have undertaken an enormous responsibility; but it is a responsibility by which we may secure our own safety and add to the welfare of a considerable section of the human race. It is true that if England had been allowed to settle the Eastern Question in her own way this is not the solution she would have adopted; but, unpleasant as the fact may be, we must recollect that the demands of other nations had to be considered as well as ours. We could have carried out our programme to the full only at the risk of a long and exhausting war, and the country was extremely unwilling to pay so heavy a price as that even for the greatest and most undoubted benefits. It may be said that we have still a conflict with Russia before us; but that is not certain, and surely in the mean time it was better to abate our claims to some extent than to plunge into a struggle which might have brought upon us immense calamities. The true defence of the Government will be that they have not done what was ideally best, but what was best under the circumstances.

Parliament as a Law-Making Machine.——Year after year towards the end of July the same venerable jokes are fired off about "the massacre of the innocents" preceding the massacre of the grouse. It would be thought a sign of clumsy management on the part of the directors of any ordinary institution if they were annually to undertake a great deal more business than they could possibly get through. Parliament, however (the House of Commons especially) is not like any ordinary institution, and when we recollect that many of the members have crotchets of their own, that others have crotchets forced upon their attention by their constituents, and that others regard it as a proof of patriotism to hinder all public business whatsoever, the wonder is that there is any legislation accomplished deserving the name. As for the "innocents"—a term usually employed to designate private members' Bills—their fate is often not deserving of much regret. Sometimes under a plausible outside they conceal revolutionary and destructive doctrines, and often, when unobjectionable in subject matter, they are so drawn as to be practically unworkable. It is otherwise with Government Bills, which usually represent legislation of which the country really stands in need, yet which year after year are flung aside for want of time. This want of time is chiefly due to the waste caused by the pranks of individual members, over whom the existing rules of the House exercise no efficient control. We are inclined to think that in these matters the Government ought to be armed with greater powers, and should not be so much as it now is at the mercy of any member or knot of members. As a debating club for discussing the topics of the day, the House of Commons has a dangerous rival in the newspapers; all the more reason, therefore, for making it more efficient as a legislative machine.

The Government and Irish Education.——The Government have scored a real triumph by the measure they have introduced in regard to middle-class education in Ireland. They have actually secured the approval of men of all parties in that strange country; a victory which has not been won by any other Government of our time. It is easy to understand the cordial way in which the Roman Catholic prelates have received the bill, for it will give an important stimulus to the schools under their influence. It will, however, be not less favourable to Protestant Schools, since the money which is to be expended will be granted without the least reference to the religious principles of successful candidates. All that the measure requires is that those who carry off the prizes and exhibitions shall have reached a certain standard of intellectual excellence, no matter by what machinery their knowledge may have been obtained. The only important difficulty which has hitherto arisen is that Roman Catholics object to a conscience clause being imposed upon schools whose pupils are successful. To get rid of this it has been proposed that no part of the money should be given to the masters; and it is argued that no real hardship would thus be caused, as any arrangement which induces boys to compete must in the end tell in favour of their instructors. It seems to us, however, that a teacher who sends forth successful pupils deserves special encouragement; and the Irish themselves being favourable to the plan, it is wise to assume that they know best. They must, however, reconcile themselves to the conscience clause. No English Government could venture to give money to a school at which religious instruction is compulsory, and Roman Catholics ought by this time to have learned so obvious a fact. The conscience clause will not subject them to the slightest inconvenience; but the want of it might in hundreds of cases altogether prevent Protestant youths from obtaining secondary education.

The Climate of Cyprus.——In spite of the sinister reports which have been circulated, it is not very likely that Cyprus is unhealthy in the sense in which certain spots on the West Coast of Africa are unhealthy, that is to say, absolutely poisonous to the constitutions of Northern Europeans. No doubt the wasteful destruction of the forests, as in Greece and Italy, has wrought much sanitary mischief. It is well known that, especially in sub-tropical regions, when the hills are clothed with wood, the rains fall frequently and moderately, the air is kept cool, and the land is fertilised. But when the forests are cut down, there are long intervals of drought followed by torrents of rain, which wash the vegetable mould off the slopes into the valleys, thus leaving, on the one hand bare rocks, and, on the other, miasma-breeding marshes. This appears to be the case in some parts of Cyprus; but it does not follow, because some districts are sickly, that no available place for settlement can be found in an island as big as half-a-dozen English counties. Besides, draining and tree-planting (especially of the Eucalyptus globulus) will soon work wonders in the way of sanitary improvement. To our soldiers, who are accustomed to endure the heats of the Indian plains, Malta and Gibraltar appear as health-stations by way of contrast, and it is most probable that in point of climate Cyprus is not very unlike Malta and Gibraltar.

The Cabinet and the Press.——The case against the Foreign Office clerk, which collapsed so ignominiously last Tuesday, has done good service by calling attention to the relations of the Government to the Press. It was brought out in the course of the evidence that the Government had some intention of communicating to the journals the very document about which so much fuss has been made, and the probability is that had it not found its way to the Globe, it would have appeared next morning in some more favoured paper. There is good reason to believe that during the last two years the Ministry have surpassed all Governments of recent years in the number of "tips" they have given to journals which have supported them. There are a great many ways of helping a paper besides that of handing to it important documents. Hints may be dropped in the course of conversation, or a private secretary may be sent with a message to the editor, or information may be given with just sufficient clearness to enable the "leader writers" to assume the airs of omniscience. It is deeply to be regretted that such relations as these should exist in this country. The Press is more and more taking its place as the guide of public opinion on political questions. How can it be trusted for honest and independent discussion if it is liable to be bribed in so shameful a way? Even this does not exhaust the evil results of the custom, for unfortunately there may be mean people connected with newspapers, and some of them would not hesitate to make a dishonest penny at the Stock Exchange out of information obtained in high quarters. Rumours are, in fact, going about to the effect that large sums have recently been made by these means. We hope the reports will prove to be untrue, but whether they are true or not, it is in the highest degree unpleasant that such things should be even talked of in connection with the action of British Ministers. There are journals whose managers would scorn to become subservient at any price. and the English people would like to feel that a similar spirit was dominant in every great newspaper office. But whatever may be the spirit of the newspapers, there ought to be no doubt as to that of the Cabinet. It would act with infinitely more dignity, if it allowed the Press to go its own way, seeking for no other support than such as is commanded by the wisdom of its actions.

Raising the "Eurydice."——All through the spring and early summer the weather was stormy and boisterous, and this, added to the strong tide which races up and down the channel where the Eurydice was lying, rendered the efforts of the Admiralty authorities useless, and failure after failure was recorded. At last, however, valuable experience having been gained during these unsuccessful experiments, a spell of really fine weather set in, and then, another effort being made, the shipwrecked vessel was dragged from her tomb of sand, and was even towed some distance out of the hole in which she had lain so long. Before long we may hope to see her in harbour and afloat, once more fit for service. Seeing the gallant ship thus, as it were, brought to life, one cannot help thinking of the crew, who were hurried into the depths of the sea with such awful suddenness that fatal Sunday afternoon. The ship being raised, one feels a natural longing to raise her crew also, and man her yards with her own brave fellows. That is a feat which must be left for a Higher Power. Meanwhile we can but lament their absence, and, for the future, take all care to avoid similar disasters.

"WHO'S WHO?" AND "WHAT'S WHAT?" AT WIMBLEDON CAMP.——The arrangements of the National Rifle Association for the annual competition at Wimbledon are in most respects so complete and satisfactory that it may seem somewhat ill-natured to find any fault. Yet we think that some means might be adopted to enable the general public to understand the nature of the contests which are going on before their eyes. At present the ordinary visitor, unless escorted by a guide who has been initiated into the mysteries, knows no more who is shooting, or what prize is being shot for, than a man a thousand miles away. The riflemen at work before him may be the crack shots of the meeting, struggling for a big thing, or the veriest dilettanti, merely amusing themselves at Pool. This uncertainty completely prevents him from watching the shooting with intelligent interest; and, after wandering hopelessly about from one group of competitors to another, he comes away in disgust. If the authorities wish to preserve the popularity of the Wimbledon meeting, they will do well to see that this state of things shall no longer continue.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

OUR INDIAN CONTINGENT

"THE PRINCE OF WALES' OWN GOORKHAS," writes our artist, "are, with the exception of the Bombay and Madras Sappers, the best practical-looking war material. They are small, but well-proportioned little men, and have none of that slimness of limb which characterises the rest of the Indian Contingent. There is just the shade of the Tartar type in their faces, and the majority are almost as black in colour as the Negro. They wear a black serge costume, relieved a little by a meagre facing of narrow red braid round the collar and cuff; a dark woollen cap, in shape between a Scotch bonnet and a handleless saucepan, constitutes the head-gear. Still, the costume is not unbecoming, and, as regards skirmishing, very serviceable. In camp this uniform is altogether discarded for their native costume—a fold of linen round their loins. In visiting their camp, one catches a good glimpse of Indian native life. Their tents are pitched on the Lazaretto ground opposite Sliema. On a series of terraces stepping to the sea they have built their kitchens, which are pieces of level ground, portioned off by rows of stones. In the centre a cavity is scooped out, wherein is placed the fire; on each side, stones, or a low earthen wall, supports the kettles or pans. Around the fireplace the ground is kept well swept and clean. Each Goorkha has a brass pot and pan, which he keeps so highly burnished that they sparkle like gems in the noon-day sun. Water is supplied by a Mussuk, who comes round at intervals. After their mess of rice and curry is cooked, and their unleavened bread baked, they squat round and commence eating in truly Oriental fashion. When the meal is finished, they each clean their eating utensils with soil and water. Then one will light a pipe, or hookha, which is handed round in true calumet fashion.

"The men like Malta very much, and, whether it is the air or extra rations, they grow sturdier and merrier daily. They have great respect and affection for their officers, who in their turn are highly satisfied with the men they command."

"THE INDIAN CAVALRY AND THE FALDETTE.——The first horsemen in Malta have created a great sensation, especially with the fairer sex. I believe one of our crack regiments, now in garrison, and which was once smiled on, is now quite in the shade of the Faldette, or native hood of the Maltese ladies, who now only peep out of their silken scuttles at the dusky cavaliers who gracefully saunter on Government Square, and, although strangers in the land, seem to be no strangers to the situation by the irresistible twist they give their turbans.

"A THIRSTY GHOORKA.——The Mussuk is more in request than any other Bheestie or camp-follower on the field, for the dry-throated warrior can quench his thirst at his mussuk of water. The soldier will stoop a little, holding out his head and opening his mouth. The water-carrier turns on a stream of the indispensable fluid, which he so nicely aims, that on its way not a drop is spilt. A nod or twinkle of the eye from the once thirsty one is a sufficient notice for the Bheestie to turn off the supply."

"AMONGST ALIENS"

"THE WANING HONEYMOON"

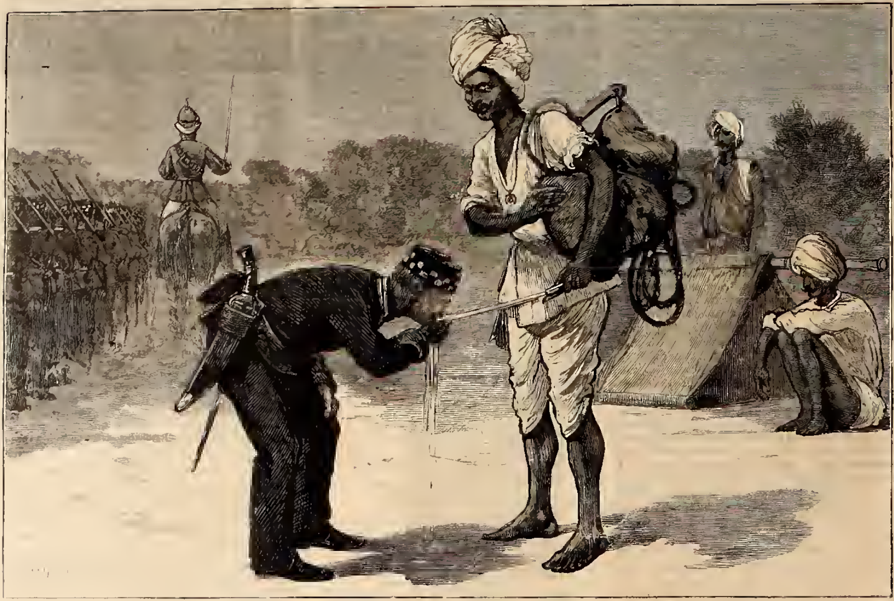
THE honeymoon is always rather a time of trial. Two persons, who have hitherto, as a rule, only seen each other by fits and starts, are brought constantly into each other's company, and the result is sometimes apt to be a certain degree of weariness and satiety. It must be remembered, too, that each of these persons is temporarily cut off from his or her usual occupations—the man from his business, the woman from her domestic duties and pleasures; their tempers are often ruffled by the fatigues and annoyances of travel, and it is therefore scarcely surprising that sometimes, although only the other day they exchanged vows of undying affection, they fall into the condition depicted in Mr. Boughton's picture, which is thus cleverly described by the critic of the Daily Telegraph:—"The lady has drifted into the listlessly-yawning stage; and the gentleman into a whistling, lip-biting, gravel-crunching frame of mind. He reads a book; she makes idle lunges at the turf at her feet with the ferule of her parasol. They occupy opposite angles of a rustic seat. Pouting on the one side is proximate; and, on the other, sulks have already set in."

A PICTURESQUE ENEMY

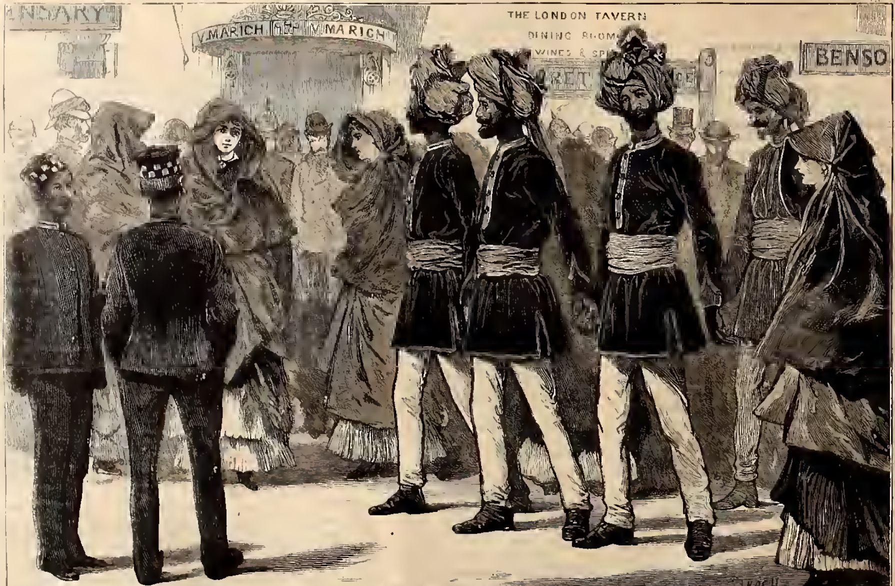
THIS is a sketch by our special artist in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, and needs but a brief explanation. Now that hostilities are over, Turks and Russians appear to fraternise very cordially, and even the dread Bashi Bazouk consents (of course for a consideration) to act as a peaceful model for the pencils of Russian officers, whose throats he would have cut with the greatest possible enthusiasm a few months ago. "Many of the officers," writes our artist, "in the Czar's service indulge their leisure in camp by sketching the surrounding scenery. One of the most industrious in the art is General Arnoldi. During the advance on the Lom in the first days of the invasion, on arriving at a new position, with the Turks steadily retreating, the general would spend the time between the slight skirmishes which then took place, by sketching the quaint Bulgarian houses and types of their inhabitants, or may be he would make a study of some picturesque Bashi-Bazouk prisoner brought into camp. During the Congress the warrior artist has greatly added to his album, and will take back with him, now peace is concluded, a sketch-book full of great artistic merit and of intense interest to the Russian people."

LAUNCH OF A LIFEBOAT AT CLACTON-ON-SEA

As a thanksgiving for the safe return from India of their Grand Master the Prince of Wales, the Freemasons of England have presented to the National Lifeboat Institution two large lifeboats. The first of them is stationed on the Devonshire coast, and the second was launched at Clacton-on-Sea on Wednesday week, in presence of Lord Skelmersdale, the Deputy Grand Master, and a numerous assemblage of visitors. The little town was gaily decorated for the occasion, and the proceedings were inaugurated by certain Masonic business at the Public Hall, where a procession was subsequently formed, which, headed by the band of the 11th Hussars, comprised a number of municipal dignitaries, including the Mayors and Corporations of Maldon, Harwich, Ipswich, and Colchester. As soon as the boathouse was reached, Lord Skelmersdale, attended by other members of the Order, wearing the full craft clothing, laid the memorial stone, upon which were inscribed the occasion and object of the building.



A THIRSTY GHOORKA



"OFF GUARD"—CAVALRY SOLDIERS AND THE FALDETTE

OUR INDIAN CONTINGENT AT MALTA

My firmness was put to the test instantly, for Signor Sandro scouted the idea of this course of action, and opposed it vehemently. "You're a fool, Caterina," said he, shaking his brush at me indignantly; "a blundering fool!"

AMONGST ALIENS

By FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE

AUTHOR OF "A CHARMING FELLOW," "AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE," "BLACK SPIRITS AND WHITE," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

SIGNOR SANDRO's advice was to watch and wait; to lay secret trains for the discovery and exposure of the plot against Lucy's little patrimony (he refused to consider the matter in any other light), and then to spring a mine and blow up the plotters with a theatrical virtue-protected-and-villainy-discovered kind of dénouement. He grew brisk and eager, was full of schemes, talked of renewing half-forgotten relations with this person and that person who might prove useful, and in a word the old conspirator in him was thoroughly re-awakened. He had passed the prime of his early manhood in conspiracy,—always from patriotic motives which approved themselves to his conscience, at least,—and had grown to think conspiracy the proper method of fighting evil things, whether in high places or low places. He could not understand my point of view when I told him that what chiefly pained me was to find that Lucy had begun to withdraw her full confidence from me. As to her becoming a Catholic, that alone did not seem to me so great a misfortune.

"Pshaw, Caterina," said Signor Sandro, "you don't know what you are talking about. They'll never rest till they get her money; and the only way to secure it is to make her enter this pet sisterhood of theirs. Don't you know what their grand bazaar is really for? To get funds to buy a house and grounds for their nuns. It's illegal, you say? Oh there are ways of evading the law, never fear. They have plenty of clever heads among them."

"It may be, master, that poor Lucy's little fortune has nothing to do with the zeal of the Princess and her friends. I have no right to say that they are conscienceless in the matter. They may be sincerely anxious to secure Lucy's eternal welfare."

"Why are they not anxious to secure your eternal welfare? A soul is a soul, eh? And yet they have not made the slightest effort at converting you!"

This was an argument which certainly had some weight. For to answer that I was not so sweet and interesting a person as Lucy would scarcely have been a good reason for the indifference of devout persons as to my conversion from error!

I was silent, and Signor Sandro went on triumphantly, "Ay, ay; you get somebody to leave you fifty thousand lire, and you'll find Monsignor Chiappaforti's interest in the state of your soul will spring up like a mushroom." Then he proceeded to enter into a variety of stratagems for unmasking the real purposes of Monsignor Chiappaforti, and exhibiting him before Lucy's eyes in his true colours. Signor Sandro especially hated Monsignore, and considered him to be the originator of the scheme for Lucy's conversion. The Princess he spoke of far less harshly. She was not a bad woman: a bigot, of course, and under the influence of the priests; but not a hard-hearted woman. I wondered, as I listened to him, whether any remembrance of the Princess Olympia's youthful beauty, thirty years ago, availed to soften my old master's judgment of her. If it were so, I am sure he did not know it. But I had my suspicions that the Princess's splendid eyes, and rich black tresses, and Juno-like figure,—"the true Roman type!" Signor Sandro would exclaim enthusiastically, "the true Roman type!"—were somehow accounted to her for righteousness.

After my first talk with my old friend on the subject, I lay awake for hours, as I have said, revolving painful thoughts. But the night brought counsel, and when I went to the studio early next morning I was resolved how to act. I would speak out plainly and straightforwardly to Lucy, and to the Princess, and to Monsignore himself, if I had the chance. Plots and counterplots should be thrown to the winds; and if there was to be war, I at least would not carry it on in ambuscade.

My firmness was put to the test instantly, for Signor Sandro scouted the idea of this course of action, and opposed it vehemently. "You are a fool, Caterina," said he, shaking his brush at me indignantly, "a blundering fool!"

"Thanks, master."

"Thanks, master," he exclaimed, trying to mimic my quiet tone in one of lively irritation. "I say that if you go on as you say, you'll lose your sister altogether. You don't know these people,—I do."

"But I know my sister."

"Ta, ta, ta! A little white mouse! What do you think she can do against such a wily old fox as Giacomo Chiappaforti? I tell you, you must match cunning with cunning."

"I can't do it, master."

"You? No. You're as blunt as a barbarian. But let me do it for you."

"No, master, I must do what I think right."

"You think? Isn't it enough to raise the bile of a stone to hear her talk?" cried Signor Sandro. And he gradually worked himself up into such a violent passion that he fairly danced about the studio, inveighing against my obstinacy and stupidity, and knocking over the mannikin on which I had carefully arranged some crimson drapery the day before. I let him work off his fiery temper a little in these performances, and then I said: "Listen, master, I know you are full of kind interest in me, and Lucy. I am not ungrateful——"

"Oh no! Ungrateful? What an idea! Only you are as obstinate as a mule, and intend to take your own way—gratefully."

"Please to hear me. I have heard you. I don't believe in lies; be the intention what it may, good or bad, wise or foolish, I have no faith in the power of lies to help any one. Your own proverb says, 'A lie hath short legs.'"

Signor Sandro sat down at his easel with his back to me and pretended to be absorbed in painting a bit of background. I went on, nothing daunted:

"Now if I pretend not to see what is going on with Lucy and these people at the Palazzo Corleoni, I shall be lying to all intents and purposes. I have lied in that way already by holding my tongue about ——"

I paused, and I saw Signor Sandro's head turn a very little in a listening attitude. "Well," said I, "I cannot explain to you what the matter was, but I had a suspicion, and I smothered it up, and waited and watched, on your plan, and no good has come of it. I dare say a frank word would have set all right. Any way I have thought about the matter to the best of my ability, and I have made up my mind to be absolutely sincere. We despise wiles and tricks and crooked ways, don't let us follow them! I never heard of but one way to shame the devil, and that is to tell the truth."

The background on which Signor Sandro was at work was assuming a very extraordinary appearance. I knew that his attention was wholly given to my words, although he still feigned to be painting in a rapt absorption. I went close up to him and laid my hand on his shoulder. "Come, master," said I, "forgive my plain speaking. I'm a blunt barbarian, as you say, but don't hate me for that."

For an instant he remained still, stiff, and mute. Then all on a sudden he put up one hand to touch mine which lay on his shoulder, and took a noisy pinch of snuff with the other. "Hate you, Caterina?" he said, with a little break in his voice. "No. You are a fool,—remember I said so;—but I don't hate you for it. I don't know,—I don't know but I almost like you the better for it; but that's because I'm a fool too."

Dear, kind, noble-hearted, irascible old master! All the prejudices of early education, and the unfortunate influences of a youth embittered by secret struggles against injustice, could not stifle the natural loyalty and affection of his character.

That afternoon I spoke to Lucy plainly. I told her that I fancied she was inclined to be attracted by the Roman Catholic religion, and that on that subject I should not then argue with her; but that it hurt me to think she should conceal her mind from me. And I begged her to return to her old frank confidence, promising on my side to be equally unreserved with her. She looked greatly startled at first,—almost scared. And then with a gush of tears she threw her arms round my neck, exclaiming, "Oh, Catherine, I am so glad to be able to speak to you. I wanted to tell you long ago."

"And why," said I quickly, "did you not?"

The procession then re-formed, and, joined by the boat on its carriage, drawn by four horses, and filled with the crew, dressed in blue jackets and red caps, and wearing cork belts, approached the shore under the pier, where the ceremony of consecration, and other solemn forms, were performed. After a discourse from the Grand Chaplain, Miss Wool, of Colchester, broke a bottle of wine over the boat's bows, and christened her the Albert Edward, the boat being then launched amid loud cheers. A banquet, presided over by Lord Skelmersdale, concluded the proceedings.

THE PRINCE OF WALES AT BRISTOL

The visit of the Prince of Wales to the Royal Agricultural Show, on Friday, was of course taken advantage of by the inhabitants of Bristol as an opportunity for loyal display and rejoicing. The streets were decorated with bunting and flowers, and crowded with sightseers, and the inevitable corporation address was delivered and responded to at the Railway Station. The Prince, with whom was Lord Skelmersdale, Colonel Kingscote, and the Mayor of Bristol, drove in an open carriage, and followed by one or two other carriages, with an escort of Lancers, to the Show Yard, a detour being made through the streets which made the route quite three miles in length, the whole distance being thronged with enthusiastic spectators. On reaching the Show Yard the Prince had introduced to him the Members of the Council, and afterwards lunched in a splendidly furnished marquee. His Royal Highness subsequently walked round the various departments of the Show, and on leaving the ground for the Railway Station, instead of going again through the city, was driven across the Downs and the Suspension Bridge, thus causing some disappointment to those who were waiting for him in the streets.—We have been assisted in the production of some of our engravings of Bristol by photographs taken by Mr. Cyrus Voss Bark, Clifton.

THE CIVIC VISIT TO BLACKPOOL

Blackpool, the Lancashire Brighton, kept high festival last week in celebration of the opening of her new Winter Gardens, the Lord Mayor of London, with the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, and civic dignitaries from some fifty-eight provincial towns, having accepted the invitation of Mr. W. H. Cocker, the first and thrice-elected Mayor of Blackburn, to take part in the rejoicings. Although the weather was not of the most favourable character, about 60,000 spectators turned out to see the procession, which included the State chariots of the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, and no fewer than 600 ordinary carriages. The building, which the Lord Mayor declared open, and which has cost 100,000*l.*, is a very fine one, with a fine dome of glass and iron. It was designed by Mr. T. Mitchell, F.R.I.B.A., of St. Ann's Square, Manchester. A grand banquet succeeded the ceremony, and in the evening there was a concert, a pyrotechnic display, and a grotesque torchlight procession through the streets. The Lord Mayor and Sheriffs remained the guests of the Corporation until Monday, when they returned to London.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——Lord Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury met with a most triumphant reception on their return from Berlin. On landing at Dover an address of welcome and congratulation was presented by the Mayor to the Premier, who, in returning thanks, expressed the hope that he had brought back peace, honour, and prosperity. The interior of the railway station at Charing Cross was decorated with bunting and flowers, and along the short route from thence to Whitehall there was a dense mass of spectators. The Earl left the station in an open carriage, which no sooner turned out of the yard than it became the target for myriads of bouquets, which descended as thick as hail from the windows of the houses on either side. The shouting and handkerchief-waving as the carriage passed along were most enthusiastic, and were continued outside the Foreign Office after his lordship had arrived, until both the Premier and Lord Salisbury had appeared at a window and addressed a few words to the crowd below. Lord Beaconsfield has accepted an invitation to a dinner at the Carlton Club, and has also promised to attend a Ministerial banquet to be given by the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House on August 3rd.—On Tuesday a despatch from Lord Salisbury was issued explaining the objects of the Berlin Treaty, in which he maintains that the policy which has received the sanction of Congress generally coincides with that sustained by the Government since the Treaty of San Stefano was published; and remarks that "whether use will be made of this—probably the last—opportunity which has been thus obtained for Turkey by the interposition of the Powers of Europe and of England in particular, or whether it is to be thrown away, will depend upon the sincerity with which Turkish statesmen now address themselves to the duties of good government and the task of reform." Both the Premier and Lord Salisbury attended a Cabinet Council on Wednesday, and Lord Salisbury afterwards went to Windsor, and had audience of the Queen.—Several Conservative Associations have already sent addresses of congratulation to Lord Beaconsfield; but, on the other hand, the Liberals are declaring their discontent, both with regard to the policy of the Treaty and the secret manner in which the negotiations between this country and Russia and Turkey have been conducted.—On the 10th prox. Mr. Bright will have been the Parliamentary representative of Birmingham for twenty-one years. His constituents intend celebrating the occasion by holding a demonstration and erecting a statue of their favourite.—Mr. Gladstone has received an address of gratitude from a number of Bulgarians. In his reply, he says that it is alike his duty and his pleasure to contribute in any humble measure to the defeat of oppression and the advance of freedom. He reminds them that it is bad that Christians should be oppressed by Mussulmans, but worse that Mussulmans should be oppressed by Christians, and conjures them to use all their influence to denounce and put down every tendency to use their recovered liberties in the exercise of outrage and oppression. "Be assured," he concludes, "that those who either commit or countenance any act in derogation of such principles are a disgrace to the Christian name, and are likewise the deadliest enemies of Bulgarian and Roumelian freedom."

Miscellaneous.——The Volunteers have been hard at work during the week at Wimbledon. The weather has been hot, on Wednesday the thermometer stood at 144 deg. in the sun. The winner of the Queen's Prize is a Scotchman, Private Rae, of the 11th Stirling Volunteers, who put together 78 points; in the Lords and Commons Match the former were victorious; and Cambridge beat Oxford in the Inter-University competition for the Chancellor's Challenge Plate. The Graphic prize was won by Captain T. Johnston, of the 105th Lanark Volunteers, "The Glasgow Highlanders." The meeting closes to day with some athletic sports in lieu of a review, H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught having undertaken to distribute the prizes.—The efforts to raise the Eurydice have been at last successful. On Tuesday she was lifted, and moved a distance of 150 feet, and on Wednesday some 300 yards nearer the shore, where she rested on solid ground, with her bulwarks level with the water. H.M.S. Thunderer, the hulks Rinaldo and Pearl, and a number of steam-tugs were engaged in the operations, which will have to be several times repeated ere the wreck can be got ashore. The strain on the towing hawsers was so great that the Thunderer's capstan was carried bodily away. Two more bodies have been recovered.—On Monday a review and sham fight took place at Aldershot in the presence of the Prince of Wales.—The July Orange celebrations in Ireland and at Liverpool have passed off without very serious rioting, though in some instances the processionists were interfered with, and the police had great difficulty in preserving order.—Last Saturday the annual Board School fête was held at the Crystal Palace, and 4,000 Bibles, presented by Mr. F. Peek and the Religious Tract Society, were distributed to Board School scholars for proficiency in Biblical knowledge.—On Tuesday, at the same place, the Band of Hope Union celebrated its annual festival. Concerts were given by two gigantic choirs of youthful performers, the majority of whom had never tasted intoxicating liquors.—The Prince's Theatre at Bradford, which was built about two years ago at a cost of 26,000*l.*, was on Tuesday night completely destroyed by fire.

PARLIAMENT

With the beginning of the week, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has found the necessity for indicating the possible fate of some of the Bills that have cumbered the Order Book during the Session. Being a gentleman constitutionally disinclined to give pain, Sir Stafford was careful not to allude to the ceremony as a "Massacre of the Innocents." Sir Stafford Northcote would not even give a Parliamentary Bill the pain of openly alluding to it as not of sufficient importance to be proceeded with. But phrases apart, it came to the same thing, and we have now a pretty clear idea of what yet remains to be done before the Prorogation. The two Bills on which the Government are chiefly bent are the Irish Education Bill and the Cattle Plague Bill. They also expect to be able to pass through the Scotch Education Bill, the Scotch Endowed Schools and Hospitals Bill, and the Highways Bill. There are some smaller Bills, such as the Bishoprics Bill, the Territorial Waters Bill, the Admiralty and War Office Bill, and the Enclosure Bill, which the sanguine Chancellor of the Exchequer also hopes to see passed into law. But with respect to two of these his hope is not likely to be fulfilled. The Bishoprics Bill is opposed by a body of members who, though small in number, are the sort of men who will take care that nothing so important as a Bishop is made within the limited space now at the disposal of Parliament.

The Admiralty and War Office Bill is one which Melancholy and the Obstructives have marked for their own. Bought over by the magnificent bait of a million sterling which the Government propose to give Ireland by the Education Bill, Mr. Parnell and his friends have been deprived of the comfort and consolation of obstruction in Committee of Supply, and on the larger Ministerial measures. Under these circumstances the Admiralty and War Office Bill is a safety valve. The Bill is brought on at odd corners of the night, in the altogether illusory belief that possibly Mr. Parnell and Mr. Biggar may be caught napping. But, as happened on Tuesday night, they sit out the whole of the evening quiet and wakeful, and then, as soon as the main business is disposed of, and the large body of members have gone home, the Admiralty and War Office Bill is timidly brought forward, and with brightened aspect and cheerful voice Mr. Parnell and Mr. Biggar fling themselves into the fray. The Minister for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty are in joint charge of the Bill, but they are a sort of nine-pins in the practised hand of Mr. Parnell. They rise up with explanations only to be knocked down by objections, and thus hour by hour slips by. But the Government have at least learnt by experience that obstruction is not a force to be dallied with. It must be steadily faced and persistently pursued, and the mechanical force of the majority must be turned on whenever the division bell rings. Thus it was on Tuesday night. Mr. Biggar having with much lucidity and considerable iteration delivered his views on the dead-meat trade during the early portion of the evening, passed the game on to the hands of Mr. Parnell and Mr. Meldon. But these gentlemen were not supported by their compatriots, and as there must be an end to all things, their speeches came to a conclusion about two o'clock in the morning, when the Bill passed through Committee.

The Irish members were represented in quite a new aspect on Monday, when the Intermediate Education Bill came on. Mr. Meldon could not take quite kindly to this new attitude towards the Government, and delivered a speech in which he was able, or thought he was able, to point out some incompleteness about the measure. But this proved an exception to the general rule. Member after member for Irish constituencies rose and expressed unqualified assent and approval of the measure. This support from the Opposition naturally suggested criticism from the Ministerialists, and this was forthcoming on the part of Mr. Charles Lewis, who moved the rejection of the Bill on the ground that it really provided for concurrent endowment, and paved the way for State support of a Catholic University. These reasons were quite sufficient for Mr. Newdegate, who in his solemnest tones and most prophetic manner warned the Government of the dizzy precipice whither their desire to please all men was leading. But Mr. Lewis, though he is not averse from reminding the House and the Government of his existence, shares the general tendency amongst the most independent Ministerialists to stop short of the division lobby to which Sir William Dyke does not lead the way. Accordingly, after many speeches had been delivered, amongst others Mr. Gladstone speaking, Mr. Lewis rose, and in the blandest manner announced that he did not intend to divide the House, having fulfilled his philanthropic purpose of raising a debate. Thus the second reading was passed in the first half of a single sitting, an incident unprecedented in recent Parliamentary history when a measure affecting Ireland, whether great or small, has been introduced.

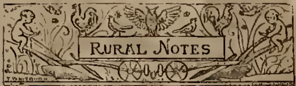
The Cattle Plague Bill has proved a beast of quite a different colour. In dealing with it, the Opposition have shown a long unwonted unity, and a power of which they have not been suspected, and of which they possibly did not suspect themselves. Possibly the fact that the measure is not a party one has endowed the Opposition with this increased influence. The fight, as has previously been explained, has lain between the boroughs and the counties. But it happens that one or two blunders in the Bill have given a hold to the Opposition which, taken in conjunction with some dejection on the Ministerial benches, has resulted in a distinct and decisive victory. The principal objection, raised at a late hour on Tuesday night, was to a clause in the Bill which, by establishing distinctions between foreign countries in respect of the import of cattle, violates what is known as "the most favoured nation clause" of the Commercial Treaties. From nine o'clock till one in the morning the debate on this question was pursued, the Government declining to give way, and the Opposition quietly, but effectively, pressing their objections. On Wednesday the subject came up again, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, beginning by scolding the Opposition for what he called their obstruction, ended by a capitulation, in which Mr. Pell was the ambassador. It being arranged that this dangerous distinction shall be avoided in the schedule of the Bill, the debate proceeded on the clauses, and occupied the House throughout the whole of the afternoon.

THE READER

Under the title of "Tent Work in Palestine" (2 vols.: Bentley and Son) Lieut. Conder presents a picturesque and popularly written narrative of one of the most important geographical undertakings of recent times, the Trigonometrical Survey of Western Palestine. In this survey we need hardly say Mr. Conder took the foremost part. His predecessor in the task was invalided home when as yet only a few preliminary reconnaissances had been made. His successor, after the interruption of the work for a year in consequence of the attack on the surveying party at Saphed, found only 1,300 out of 6,000 square miles left him to examine, in order to complete what may not improperly be called an Ordnance Map of Palestine from the Jordan to the sea. Of the general results of the work it is scarcely necessary to speak. In mere new discovery it has effected as much as all previous travellers put together; but more than this, it has for the first time tried all discoveries, early or recent, by a really scientific test. Nor must it be supposed that this was an easy task; even setting on one side for a moment the difficulties and dangers all around—the daily toil under a burning sun and in a fever-haunted land, the frequent hostility, in spite of all precaution, of fanatic villagers and insolent Moslem Sheikhs. The explorer in Palestine must make his way through a maze of data, chronicle, and legend—obscure passages from Josephus and the Talmudists, valuable but uncritical notes of early Christian Fathers, legends of later Jew and Saracen, hasty guesses of pilgrims and Crusaders, traces of ancient names and builders' work, comparisons of distances and positions—all which he must then sift and put together, too happy if at times a general consensus of Jewish, Christian, and Mahometan tradition enable him without further trouble to set down a reputed site as beyond reasonable doubt. Lieutenant Conder's present volumes are meant to serve as a popular introduction to the official memoir and great map of the Survey, now rapidly approaching completion under the auspices of the Palestine Exploration Fund Committee. They will be found of scarcely more interest for the light they throw on scenes and passages in Holy Writ than for their bright and life-like pictures of the country and its inhabitants at the present day. There are few descriptions in any volume on the Holy Land better than those of Palestine, as it lies before the spectator on the top of Hermon, or of the gigantic ruins of earthquake-stricken Baalbek—few chapters that will have more attraction for the patient student of Biblical topography than that in which the true boundaries of the Jewish Temple are marked out from a minute examination of measurements and levels, or in which Mr. Conder modestly yet forcibly sets forth his own independent theory of the true position of Calvary and the Sepulchre. Yet no less interesting even than these are the accounts of Palestine as it is to-day, by one who has made himself at home in the black tents of the Bedawin and in the streets of wicked, fanatical Damascus, who has pitched his camp among the savages of the Desert of Judah and the wild hill villagers of the Galilæan range, has watched the pilgrims at the Feast of the Holy Fire, and been permitted by the high-priest of the little remnant of the Samaritans to behold the famous Roll of Abishuah, the Book of the Law, which purports to have been written out by the third in descent from Aaron. Vastly perplexing to the natives generally were the proceedings of the surveyors—proceedings dimly believed to be preliminary in some way to the conquest of the country—and very frequently was the wish expressed, whether in earnest or in flattery, that the English would really come and build the land up again from its ruins; nor does Mr. Conder fail to show how easy would be the work of restoration under a strong, wise Government, like that of some great European Power. But the whole work should be studied thoroughly by all who would gain with little trouble a clear idea of Palestine as it was and as it is.

"Central America, the West Indies, and South America" (E. Stanford), edited by W. H. Bates, or the second volume of "Stanford's Compendium of Geography and Travel," fairly maintains the high standard that was set up by the first volume of the series, Mr. Keith Johnston's "Africa." True the number of independent States necessitates a greater sub-division and an arrangement more nearly approaching the Gazetteer. But the notices in all cases are thoroughly readable, well brought up to the date of the most recent travels, e.g., of Mr. Squier in Peru and Mr. Boddam-Whetham in Guatemala, and more especially rich in descriptions of the curious fauna and flora which in tropical and sub-tropical America fairly divide the traveller's attention with native man. We should add that the volume is provided with excellent maps and a more than usual number of pretty illustrations, while the scientifically disposed will find in the appendix a most learned account, by Mr. A. H. Keane, of the Aboriginal races of America and their languages.

It is long since we have read so freshly-written a book of travel in the United States, or one whose author has so happy a knack of finding something new to say even about old familiar scenes, as that in which Mr. Wallis Nash introduces "Oregon" (Macmillan and Co.) to an expectant public. One of the youngest, as it is one of the most remote, of all the fedemcy of the Stars and Stripes, Oregon stands a little out beyond the high tide-mark of emigration—only, indeed, accessible by steamer from San Francisco, or by land-stage, if strangers have no objection to conveyances which, at the time of Mr. Nash's visit, had been stopped by highwaymen five times in eighteen months. But once within the happy valley, and all is peaceful, orderly, and law-abiding. A calm that fairly startles one by contrast with the high-pressure pace of Californian life, reposes upon everything around, but it is the calm of a tranquilly complacent well-doing that can abide its time and wait for railways to come further up, or ports be opened on the Pacific coast, and will not be disquieted if half its fine peaches must be given to the pigs, or if that orchard must really be ploughed up, the apples are so many that the fruit is simply wasted. And very pleasant are the stories, which Mr. Nash picks up and verifies en route—of the world-worn Presbyterian minister who took heart of grace and came to Oregon, and meditates his sermons now amidst his own corn-fields, not preaching a whit the worse because well backed up by the mammon of unrighteousness; of the Italian sailor who came inland for a spell and dwells now in a house of cedar amidst the hum of bees; or of the entire townships that go off every summer to the mountains for a picnic, returning only when the yellow harvest insists on their coming down to reap and carry it. Nor does Mr. Nash stop short after telling us all this. He gives, too, most useful information about the law-courts and the land-laws of the State, and the gentle Oregonian welcome to settlers of every race and country. Shall we add, to complete our praises of the book, that Mr. Nash actually passes through San Francisco, going out, and by Niagara, coming home, without describing the regular tourist rounds—nay, even giving a few particulars which, to our ears, seemed slightly novel? Altogether a pleasant book on a very pleasant subject. Yet not to make the home reader too envious, we would hint that there is one bitter drop in the Oregonian's cup of bliss. It is thought—only thought as yet, it is true—that they are using up their salmon.



RURAL NOTES

The Prize Paris Stock.——Still at Blackwall lie most of the fine shorthorns and the Aberdeens that came across from Paris. Zvesda, the fine cow that 2,000 guineas was offered for ere she left for the Trocadéro, is dead, and carried with her to the grave a fine calf that would have realised about a thousand guineas to Lady Pigot. At the shed there, called Brown's Wharf, there were this week forty cattle, and about a like number of sheep. All of the animals, we are told at the door (of course, all but attendants are Pariahs in this condemned place), are "down" with the foot-and-mouth complaint, and this being the case now, it is likely that the quarantine will be over in a fortnight, the average time which, it is presumed by veterinarians, murrain runs its course through stock for better or worse. It would have been much better we think had all the cattle taken the foot-and-mouth disease on their first arrival, for then all might have been sufficiently well rid of it a fortnight ago. It surely was a mistake on the part of the veterinary authorities not to have had the first ailing beast separated from the healthy ones. Isolation is what our present Orders in Council decree; yet, at Blackwall, we have had the good mingling with the bad so long, that there is not the toss of a doit which gets out first. The incarceration has been a sad loss, not only to the breeders, but to the consumers who most depend upon good and cheap beef to the produce of such animals as now are enthralled.

Weather and Crops.——Much as farmers might have had cause to grumble at three weeks ago, they have none now as to the prospect of all crops. The hay is being carted to the farm-yard in splendid condition, and in some districts we have passed through within the fortnight, east, west, north, and south, the haycocks seem to indicate that farmers would need, as in the old Jewish times, to pull down their barns and build greater. The hay crop is quite over an average, and when the fields are clear a nice aftermath is to be beholden—a good second crop, with clover abundantly interspersed. Wheat has improved much during the past fortnight; barley looks fairly; oats so well, that Scotchmen are not likely to be deprived of the horses' meat in England, which is the bone and sinew of many "a braw chiel" north of the Tweed—Dr. Johnson notwithstanding; and peas for the later market look well: mangolds and Swedes promising, the latter apparently quite free from the "fly." Little disease is noticeable in potatoes, and the crop will be a weighty one if the half-mythical Colorado beetle does not present itself on the scene.

The Royal Agricultural Society at Bristol.——The Royal was blessed with excellent weather which, in the case of agricultural shows, is half the battle of financial success. The Prince of Wales contributed in no ordinary degree to "gorge the till" by his presence. He was enthusiastically received, and admired and criticised with keen yet fond eyes the whole of the stock. His Royal Highness himself was an exhibitor and a prize taker in sheep. Never have we seen a town better decorated in honour of His Royal Highness. The Bristol meeting was a much better business one than the Oxford, but that is to be accounted for by the absence of wet.

Miscellaneous.——American live cattle are coming into the London market in great force. On Monday there were about a thousand, and some of them so mountainous that they might be made fit subjects for a decent itinerant show.—Goats are good and useful animals for cottagers. They not only supply beautiful milk for weakly children, but when the children are becoming convalescent, they can easily pull them about in a little "goat chay." Mr. Stephen Holmes strongly recommends more attention being paid to them in the country than hitherto there has been; in the same strain follows Lady Pigot, and we coincide with both. Without saying whether or not they are more profitable than pigs, they are certainly a capital adjunct to the cottager's little plot.

THEATRES

Miss Glyn's Readings.——On Friday Miss Glyn gave the third of a series of dramatic readings at 13, Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, the selection on this occasion being from Macbeth. Miss Glyn evinces considerable imagination, and delineates the different characters with an artistic force sufficient to mark the distinctive attributes of each, but not approaching that dramatic intensity associated with a stage performance. At the same time some of the scenes were rendered with an effective, if reserved power, notably the witches' scene in Act III. and the first scene of Act V.

Madame Tussaud's.——A very effective representation of a meeting of the Berlin Congress has been added to this popular Exhibition. The room in which it is exhibited has been decorated and arranged presumably after one of the salons of the Radziwill Palace. The most prominent of the portrait-models represent Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury, Prince Gortschakoff, Counts Schouvaloff and Corti, Count Andrassy, M. Waddington, Mehemet Ali Pasha, and the "man of blood and iron," Prince Bismarck. We must not omit to make mention of a handsome transparency which is exhibited on the facia of the Baker Street Walhalla.

Royal Albert Hall.——Mr. Brandram is to be congratulated on the success of his Dramatic Recital given at the Albert Hall on Wednesday evening. Although the immense hall was by no means thronged, the audience was large and attentive. His selection included readings from As You Like It, and "Brutus and Marc Antony in the Forum," and Mr. Tennyson's ballad of the fleet, "The Revenge." These were given with Mr. Brandram's well-known vigour and striking versatility of power. His rendering of Jacques' monologue, "All the world's a stage" and of Marc Antony's speech over the dead body of Cæsar were especially powerful, and were much applauded. Doubtless much of the effect of declamatory passages and shading of pathos were marred by the echo inevitable in such a vast hall. The evening's entertainment was much enhanced by the admirable services of the London Vocal Union, under the direction of Mr. Fred Walker, and by the charming rendering by Miss Anna Williams of some of the well-known Shakespeare songs.

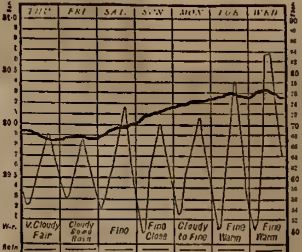
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

July 11th to July 17th (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.——The weekly period just ended has witnessed a gradual but steady improvement in the weather, and at its close there were no signs of any immediate change. At the commencement of the week the sky was cloudy, and the weather rather gloomy; but on Saturday, the 13th instant, the clouds passed away, and since then the sky has been almost clear. The barometer has risen steadily all the time, and light westerly winds have prevailed. Temperature remained rather low until Tuesday, the 16th instant, when it rose quickly, and on the following day it was still higher. No rain has fallen with the exception of a very slight shower on Friday, the 12th instant. The barometer was highest (30·31 inches) on Wednesday, the 17th instant; lowest (29·86 inches) on Thursday, the 11th instant; range, 0·45 inches. Temperature was highest (83°) on Wednesday, the 17th instant; lowest (50°) on the mornings of Sunday, the 14th, Tuesday, the 16th, and Wednesday, the 17th; range, 33°. With the exception of Friday, the 12th instant, when a slight shower fell, there has been been no rain worth recording.

SCRAPS

A Man aged 148 years has just died at the little village of Kirchbracht, Germany. At least, so says the Berlin Post.

An Electrical Bracelet, connected with a battery and an alarm clock, is the latest method of awakening heavy sleepers across the Atlantic.

The Levant Herald, which was recently suppressed by the Turkish Government, has been replaced by a journal called the Constantinople Messenger.

A New Book of Beauty, an album containing the portraits of the handsomest women in Europe, is to be one of the chief features of the International Anthropological Congress, which is to be held in Paris next month.

A Long Bicycle Tour throughout Italy is being undertaken by a Frenchman named Payet. He has already arrived at Florence from Naples, and intends visiting Venice, Modane, and Turin, before returning to his native town of Lyons.

A Good Example has been set by the London and Brighton Railway authorities, who have arranged with the refreshment contractors at certain stations that during the hot weather iced water should be carried along the platform on the arrival of each train, and sold to thirsty passengers at 1*d.* a glass.

The Hotel at Fontainebleau, where the Shah of Persia is said to have rebelled against the "little bill," is now every morning inscribed by some would be wag with the sentence, Au Shah Ecorché—the "Skinned Shah"—doubtless a suggestion to mine host to change his sign in commemoration of the Persian sovereign's visit.

The following Handbill has been circulated by a European bootmaker at Mussoorie. He informs the ladies and gentlemen of Dehra Doon, Mussoorie, and Landour, "that he has commenced his business as bootmaker, and begs to solicit their kind patronage, which will be made of Cawnpore material, but on the English style, with good English hemp and wax."

Among the British Indian Troops now quartered at Malta, the Jewish World states that there are some black Jews, members of a community existing on the coast of Malabar. They claim to be descended from the Jews sent by King Solomon to India to collect ivory and precious stones. They differ from other Jews in many of their religious services, and only observe the Sabbath and the Passover.

The Grosvenor Gallery has been generously thrown open to the public by Sir Coutts Lindsay this (Saturday) afternoon, and will be open free after three on the afternoons of Saturday, July 27, and Saturday, August 3rd. As the galleries will only accommodate a limited number, some system of admission is indispensable, and it has therefore been decided to issue tickets, which can be obtained gratis on Friday next and on the following Friday by application either personally or by letter containing addressed envelope to the Secretary, 132, New Bond Street.

The Bank of France has alarmed Parisians by announcing that it will not receive certain cleverly forged notes for 50 and 100 francs, which have been in circulation for some time past. At the same time minute directions are given how to detect these spurious notes, which are more shiny and bear traces of rougher work than the real bank issues. Still it would need close observation, even on the part of experts, to detect the forgeries, and we would therefore recommend all inexperienced British visitors to insist upon receiving gold for their change at hotels and shops.

A curious Lottery Superstition is related by a correspondent of the Daily News. It appears that in Venice it is believed that, in the event of a stranger dying in one of the hotels, the numbers of his rooms will be the lucky cyphers at the next drawing. An illustration of this occurred recently on the death of the late Sir W. Stirling-Maxwell at one of the best known hotels, when, immediately on his decease, the employés subscribed to take shares in the numbers of the two rooms occupied by the late Member for Perthshire, both of which numbers, strangely enough, were afterwards drawn prizes. In talking over the matter with the writer, a person connected with the hotel bitterly lamented that he had been prevented by sudden illness from taking the whole of the lucky numbers, and thus realising a handsome fortune at one stroke.

An Eccentric Colonel, if we are to believe the Paris Figaro, is striving to impress the importance of thrift and saving upon the mind of the Paris gamin. He may be observed going from one point to another of the Boulevard Magenta, and receiving pennies from children to whom he at once presents twopence. It appears that the Colonel is very fond of children, and takes a delight in giving them coppers for toys or lollipops, but at the same time is anxious that they should learn order, economy, and honesty. Thus, when for the first time he gives a child a present, he tells him to meet him at a certain hour at a stated point on the Boulevard, and to bring a penny with him. If the child fulfils his promise, he at once receives double the money which he produces. According to the Colonel, these children will grow up to be "excellent soldiers or good little housekeepers."

London Mortality increased last week and 1,589 deaths were registered against 1,511 during the previous seven days, an increase of 78, being 93 above the average, and at the rate of 23·2 per 1,000. There were 85 deaths from whooping-cough (a decline of 23, but exceeding the average by 38), 249 from diarrhœa (an increase of 104, exceeding the average by 53), including 195 infants under one year of age, 11 from small-pox (a decline of 8, and 13 below the average), 16 from measles (a decrease of 15), 20 from scarlet fever, 8 from diphtheria (a decline of 3), and 19 from different forms of fever. There were 2,394 births registered against 2,520 during the previous week, exceeding the average by 65. The mean temperature of the air was 61·9 deg., or 0·3 deg. below the average in the corresponding week of the sixty years 1814–73. The duration of registered sunshine was 33·3 hours, the sun being 113·8 hours above the horizon.

A Day in the Country.——The manager of the Hackney Juvenile Mission earnestly pleads for funds to take 300 children for a day's outing in the fields and fresh air. Contributions may be sent to Mr. John Newman, hon. manager, 117, Cheapside, E.C.; Mr. H. M. Heath, 4, St. Thomas's Road, South Hackney; or to Mr. A. A. Knight, 71, King Edward Road, South Hackney. A similar appeal is made by the Committee of St. Thomas's Sunday Schools, E., to take 300 children for a day's holiday in the country. Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Vicar, the Rev. A. W. Cribb, the Vicarage, Arbour Street, East Stepney; by Mr. W. F. Cannon, High Street, Shadwell, E.; or by A. G. Stoddart, Hon. Superintendent, 85, Eleanor Road, Hackney, E. The Hon. Secretary of Gray's Yard Sunday Ragged Schools also appeals for a similar purpose. Donations will be thankfully received by Mr. Alister G. Fraser, 4, Inverness Terrace, Bayswater, W.

The well-known Actor, Joseph Jefferson, forms the subject of yet another anecdote in the San Francisco Newsletter, which states that while he was playing Rip Van Winkle at Chicago last spring, he went to the theatre very much exhausted by a long day's fishing on the lake. When the curtain rose on the third act it disclosed the white-haired "Rip" still immersed in his twenty years' nap. Five, ten, twenty minutes passed, and still he did not waken. The audience began to get impatient and the prompter uneasy. The great actor doubtless knew what he was about, but this was carrying the "realistic" sort of thing entirely too far. The fact was that all the time Jefferson was really sleeping the sleep of the just, or rather of the fisherman who has sat eight hours in the sun without getting a single bite. Finally the gallery began to be uproarious, and one of the "gods" wanted to know if there "was going to be nineteen years more of this snooze business." Here Jefferson began to snore. This decided the prompter, who opened a small trap beneath the stage, and began to prod "Rip" from behind. The much-travelled comedian began to fumble in his pocket for an imaginary ticket, and muttered, drowsily: "Going clear through, 'ductor." The audience were transfixed with amazement at this entirely new reading, when suddenly Jefferson sat up with a loud shriek. The exasperated prompter had "jabbed" him with a pin. The play went on then—with a rush.

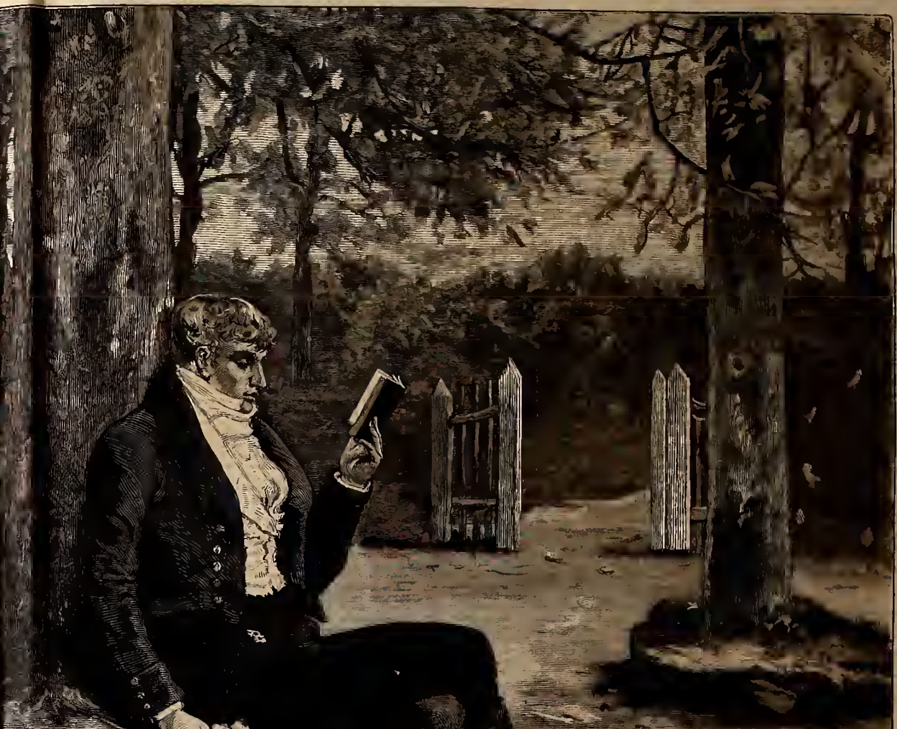
"THE WANING OF

FROM THE PICTURE BY G. H. BOUGHT



THE HONEYMOON"

IN THE ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION

FOREIGN

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The Congress duly completed its work on Saturday, when the Treaty of Berlin was sealed and signed by the Plenipotentiaries in full uniform, the Turks showing some hesitation at the last moment, but being finally brought to reason by Count Andrassy. Prince Bismarck delivered a closing speech, in which he said that the "Congress had deserved well of Europe, and that History would do justice to its intentions and its work." Count Andrassy then, in the name of the Plenipotentiaries, thanked Prince Bismarck for his Presidential services, and also expressed their gratitude to the Emperor and the Royal family for their kindness and hospitality. A brief reply from Prince Bismarck then closed the twentieth and final sitting of the Berlin Congress. In the evening a farewell banquet was given at the Royal Palace by the Crown Prince, who drank in the Emperor's name the health of "those Sovereigns and Governments who had that day signed the Treaty of Berlin." As for the Treaty itself it is—without the protocols—a lengthy document, and consists of sixty-four articles, which may be roughly summarised under ten heads. First and foremost is the constitution of Bulgaria as "an autonomous and tributary Principality," to be governed by a "freely elected" Prince, who is to be chosen in nine months' time, until when an Imperial Commissioner is to take charge of matters. Secondly, comes the formation of a province to the south of the Balkans, to be entitled Eastern Roumelia, which is to remain under the direct military and political authority of the Sultan, but which is to possess "administrative autonomy," and will have a Christian Governor-General, appointed by the Porte with the consent of the Powers. The Russians on their part engage to vacate both Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia within nine months. Thirdly comes a provision for the "occupation and administration" of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary. Fourthly, the Independence of Montenegro is declared, and the territory ceded to her defined on condition of religious liberty being fully accorded to all Montenegrin subjects, and that she shall take her share of the Turkish public debt in proportion to the new territory acquired. The same stipulations are made with Servia, who comes under the next head with a declaration of her independence and an increase of territory; and, sixthly, comes the turn of Roumania, whose independence is recognised on condition of religious equality being established, and of her ceding to Russia "that portion of territory in Bessarabia detached from Russia by the Treaty of Paris of 1856." In return she is awarded a large portion of territory in the Dobrudscha, for which—as it is an exchange, not an acquisition—she will bear no part of the Turkish debt. The seventh head lays down the complete freedom of the navigation of the Danube, all fortifications on the banks from the mouth to the Iron Gates are to be razed, and no vessels of war permitted higher up the river than Galatz. Under the eighth head we come to Greek affairs, and Protocol 13, providing for negotiations for a rectification of frontiers between Greece and the Porte is duly noticed, while the Porte engages to carry out the long planned reforms in the Island of Crete. Ninthly, the Porte solemnly promises to maintain the principle of religious liberty in its widest possible sphere throughout the Ottoman dominions; and tenthly, we come to Asia and the cession to Russia of Batoum, Kars, and Ardahan, and the retrocession by the Czar of the district of Bayazid. A final clause takes note that the Treaty of Paris of 1856, and the Treaty of London of 1871, are maintained, as far as their stipulations are not abrogated and modified by the Treaty of Berlin.

Foreign opinion on the Treaty, as a whole, is mainly favourable, although in Italy and France the Anglo-Turkish Convention has, in a great measure, detracted from the plaudits with which the end of the crisis would otherwise have been hailed. ITALY in particular is highly discontented, and a witticism that the Treaty has been signed by feathers taken from four vultures, one pigeon, and two geese (Italy and France), has been universally quoted as the general opinion. The Italian Government also and their organ, the Diritto, in order to draw away the public attention from the Austrian occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, are holding up the "ambition" of England to popular reprobation, and are hinting that England must not be allowed to monopolise the Mediterranean unopposed. AUSTRIA, although much divided in opinion, is very fairly contented, and is now very anxious to conclude the final arrangements with the Porte for the occupation of the provinces allotted to her, and it is thought that General Philipovich will cross the frontier next week. RUSSIA, also, despite the paring down of her Treaty, appears to be satisfied with the result of the Congress, and the Agence Russe sums up the various objects which have been attained by the negotiations, foremost amongst which is the way which has been opened to "a reconciliation between England and Russia." TURKEY and GREECE are by no means content with the Treaty, the latter is most deeply annoyed at obtaining no definite cession of territory, while the Porte is by no means willing to consent to the proposed rectification of frontier, and will oppose the Greek claims with all the means which lie in its power, having already begun by sending an ironclad squadron to Volo. The news of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, however, has been hailed with delight. In CONSTANTINOPLE the Ambassadors are discussing the Rhodope Question, and the delegates appointed by them were to leave on Thursday.—The Russians have fired on a British man-of-war boat which had come within the Russian range to inquire about some British sailors who had been taken prisoners by the Russians.

CYPRUS has been now formally handed over to the English Government. On the 11th inst., Mr. Baring, who had brought the firman from Constantinople, took possession of the island in the name of the Queen, and on Saturday morning Admiral Sir John Hay arrived at the capital, Nicosia, and, in the presence of Samih Pasha and the various notables of the island, completed the ceremonial by superintending the official hoisting of the British flag. Until the arrival of Sir Garnet Wolseley Sir John Hay acts as Governor. The greatest delight has been expressed throughout the island at the British occupation, and the price of land, both in the island and on the Syrian coast, has risen enormously, while steps are already being taken to procure a concession for a railway from Beyrout to Erzeroum. As an equivalent of the taxes and dues paid by the inhabitants, the British Government undertakes to pay the Porte a yearly tribute of 150,000*l*. for the island, 30,000*l*. in excess of the present revenue.

FRANCE.——The Anglo-Turkish Convention and the British occupation of Cyprus still continue to be the foremost topic of the French Press, but the angry tone with which the news was first received is greatly modified, and the views of the Temps and the Débats that England has only done what in self-defence she has been compelled to do by Russia, and that no danger is to be feared from a non-conquering and unaggressive Power like England, are beginning to prevail. Still people are discontented that M. Waddington is coming back without bringing back any advantages whatever for France, and there are various rumours abroad that he has brought something in his pocket in the form of a guarantee from England that she will take no independent action respecting either Syria or Egypt. To turn to home political matters, the only item of interest has been a further election of two Republicans to the Chamber, making the Republican majority 380 in all.

There has been no lack of party fêtes and meetings this week, and on Thursday the much-talked-of Rousseau Commemoration took place at Myers' Circus, where numerous speeches in honour of the author of the "Contrat Social" were made, M. Louis Blanc being the chief orator. On the same day the Advanced Radicals gave a dinner in commemoration of the taking of the Bastille, during which, however, no "incident" occurred; while non-politicians thoroughly enjoyed a monster orpheonist concert in the Tuileries Gardens, in which some 18,000 persons took part. The editor of the Lanterne has been fined 20*l*. for displaying a flag with a Phrygian cap on the day of the National Fête; the Siècle has been fined 80*l*., at the instance of the Prince Imperial, for libelling his father, Napoleon III.; and the only other item of news is a Legitimist celebration of the fête of St. Henry in honour of the Comte de Chambord on Monday, and the holding of another review on September 15th. There is no Exhibition gossip beyond the inflation of the monster balloon, and the English concerts at the Trocadéro, which the Prince of Wales has gone over to attend, and the first of which took place on Wednesday under the leadership of Messrs. Arthur Sullivan and Henry Leslie; and the only theatrical novelty is a two-act comic opera, Pepita, of which the music is by M. Delahaye, sen., and the libretto by his son. It was produced at the Opera Comique, and although somewhat more of the nature of operetta that is usual at this house, the opera was fairly well received.

INDIA.——The harvest reports were more satisfactory last week, and there has been a heavy rainfall throughout the North-west Provinces; while rain is reported from Madras, where also the cotton trade is said to be markedly reviving. The famine, however, has been succeeded by a plague of locusts in some districts. —An important question of constitutional law as to the right of the Crown to cede territory without the consent of Parliament has been argued before the High Court of the North-west Provinces, the point being the cession of certain provinces to the Nabob of Rampore for services during the Mutiny. The Court has reserved its judgment.

THE UNITED STATES.——The Indian war in Oregon is being vigorously continued on both sides. On Saturday a band of hostile Indians attacked the friendly Umatillas, but after two hours' time Colonel Miles appeared with a force of regulars, and ultimately drove back the Indians to the mountains, the Indians not being able to withstand the howitzer fire. Reinforcements are hastening to the assistance of the troops, 700 of whom are now encamped at Wallula—a force, it is thought, sufficient to cope with the Indians.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The Emperor of GERMANY continues to improve in health, although not so rapidly as might be wished. His wounds have healed, and he is now able to walk down a few steps of stairs, but his power of walking is of small duration, while his arm and hand are still incapable of performing the numerous actions required of them, and he is unable to feed himself without assistance. The Emperor has presented a portrait of himself by Winterhalter to Prince Bismarck, whose substitute, by the way, has just been appointed under the new law,—Count von Stollberg, Vice-President of the Ministry of State.—The solemn obsequies of the Queen of SPAIN took place on Wednesday at the Church of San Francisco, Madrid.—The little village of Leuk in SWITZERLAND, renowned for its sulphur baths, has been almost entirely destroyed by fire. The expected riots in Montreal, CANADA, were fortunately prevented by the firmness of the Mayor, who took every precaution to prevent a disturbance of the peace, forcibly prevented the Orangemen from parading on the 12th inst., and at the same time protected them from the violence of the crowd which frantically attempted to attack them. The Orangemen then returned to their Hall, and announced their intention of parading on Tuesday, on the occasion of the unveiling of Hackett's monument. This, however, they did not do, and complete quiet has now been restored in the city.—The Sultan of MOROCCO, although he has been dangerously ill, is not dead, and has now completely recovered.—There has been a native rising in the French penal settlement of NEW CALEDONIA, and eighty-nine persons have been massacred. The French Government has ordered reinforcements to the island, but the Governor telegraphs that he is "master of the situation."

THE COURT

THE Queen and the Princess Beatrice were to leave Windsor for Osborne yesterday (Friday). On Saturday, the Queen came to London, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, and was present at a garden party given by the Prince and Princess of Wales at Marlborough House. Her Majesty returned to Windsor in the evening. The Queen and the Princess Beatrice attended Divine Service in the private chapel at Windsor on Sunday, the Rev. Arthur Barry, D.D., Principal of King's College, London, and Canon of Worcester, preached. On Monday Princess Christian visited Her Majesty, and remained to lunch, and Colonel the Right Hon. F. Stanley, Secretary of State for War, dined with the Queen. Her Majesty drove out on Tuesday, accompanied by Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne and Princess Beatrice, and in the evening Prince and Princess Christian, Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, the Duchess of Roxburghe, Colonel Hon. Sir C. Lindsay, and Col. G. A. Maude, C.B., dined with Her Majesty. The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne left Windsor Castle on Wednesday. The Grand Duchess of Hesse and the Hereditary Grand Duke of Hesse, and the Princesses Victoria, Ella, Irene, Alix, and Marie of Hesse, lunched with the Queen, and returned to London in the evening.

The Prince and Princess of Wales were present last week at the State Ball given by command of Her Majesty at Buckingham Palace, and on Saturday the Prince and Princess gave a garden party at Marlborough House, at which Her Majesty, Princess Beatrice, the Duke of Connaught, the Grand Duke and Duchess of Hesse, with the Hereditary Grand Duke of Hesse, the Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, Prince and Princess Christian, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duke and Duchess of Teck, were present. On Monday, the Prince and Princess of Wales went to the review held at Aldershot by General Sir Thomas Steel. The Prince and Princess afterwards returned to town, and were visited by the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, who remained to lunch. In the afternoon the Prince and Princess went to a garden party given by Lady Holland, at Holland House, and, with the Grand Duke and Duchess of Hesse, were present in the evening at the performance of Semiramide, at the Royal Italian Opera. On Tuesday the Prince and Princess attended the marriage of Lord Carington with the Hon. Cecilia Margaret Harbord. The Duke of Connaught, the Duke of Cambridge, Prince Leopold, Prince and Princess Christian, and the Duke and Duchess of Teck were also present. The Prince of Wales left London in the evening for Paris, where he arrived on Wednesday morning, and subsequently was present at the first of the English Courts at the Trocadéro Palace. The Princess will accompany the Prince on his visit to Southampton next August, when he will lay the foundation stone of the Memorial Church of St. Mary's. —According to the World, the Duke of Connaught's marriage will take place next February.

CHURCH NEWS

VARIOUS.——Next Sunday, the 28th inst., is to be observed in the all the churches of the Established Church of Scotland as a day of Thanksgiving for "the peace secured at Berlin by Lord Beaconsfield, and for the escape that this country has had from the horrors of war."—The sittings of the Pan-Anglican Conference at Lambeth Palace, will be resumed on Monday next. —The enthronisation of the new Bishop of Lichfield was reported in our columns last week. In the course of the sermon which he delivered immediately after the ceremony, Dr. Maclagan said that there were some who feared that men desired to lead us back to the Roman system, and it was natural that those who valued the Reformed faith should be unwilling to adopt ancient or unusual customs. It was almost impossible to believe that any sober-minded man who knew anything of Church history could desire to bring back the state of things which existed in the time of the Roman usurpation, or to see the spiritual state of England reduced to that of Italy, Austria, or Spain in the present time, where men had rosaries in their hands and scepticism in their hearts, and worshipped alike the material and the mechanical. Our lot was cast in an age impatient of the supernatural and hostile to dogmatic truth—an age which would rob Christianity of its splendour and beauty by treating the Bible as a common book and regarding our Saviour as a common man. We should not, however, join in petulant denunciation of a sceptical spirit; but rather hope that the hostile criticisms we encountered were misguided longings after the truth.—The anniversary service of the London Free and Open Church Association took place on Monday evening at St. Paul's. There was a very large congregation, the service was rendered by the choir of the Lay Helpers' Association, and the sermon by the Bishop of Albany, who urged that churches should not merely be free and open once a week, but should be used daily for public and private prayer.—The latest American "notion" is "illustrated sermons." The preacher is accompanied in the pulpit by an artist, who illustrates his discourse by sketches in chalk on a large black board. A "chalk sermon," as it is termed, was delivered to an immense congregation in Brooklyn a few weeks since with marked effect, the picture-captions, as they are termed, meeting with considerable approbation. Another divine, however, quite threw the chalk into eclipse, by delivering a sermon on Hell, which was vividly illustrated by oil paintings.

MUSIC

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.——Le Nozze di Figaro, cast as are the leading parts at this house, could hardly fail of success. Mozart's inimitable opera—a ceaseless flow of tune, no less than a model of construction—is always welcome, even with a fairly balanced performance; and this was more. With Mdlle. Caroline Salla as the Countess, and Mdlle. Trebelli as Cherubino, the one pensive and lady-like, the other brisk, mercurial, and saucy (too saucy on occasions, perhaps), there was little or nothing to complain of. Mdlle. Salla gave both her airs with artistic feeling, more particularly "Dove sono;" and Madame Trebelli won the usual encore for "Voi che sapete," which she might easily sing in Mozart's original key. As Susanna, Miss Hélène Crosmond justified the hopes entertained of her from the first, showing decided progress, and earning well-merited applause in the expressive "Deh vieni non tarda." Signor Galassi understands the character and gives the music of Mozart's Figaro so well that we should like to see him in another and a livelier Figaro—the Figaro of Rossini, although the part may be a trifle too high for his voice. His "Non più andrai" was excellent. The Count of Signor Del Puente is also a strong feature in a cast made complete by the able manner in which the less important characters are sustained—by Madame Lablache (a perfect Marcellina), M. Thierrey (Bartolo), Signor Rinaldini (Basilio), &c. These, it must be borne in mind—even to Don Curzio (Signor Grassi) and Antonio, the drunken gardener (Signor Franceschi)—while in one sense subordinate, are indispensable to the well-going of the concerted pieces. Thus the magnificent finales of the first and second acts had every chance of realising the desired effect. The overture, and the richly-coloured orchestral accompaniments in which the score abounds, were played as might have been expected from such an orchestra as that so admirably directed by Sir Michael Costa. Nothing was wanting, indeed, to a thoroughly satisfactory ensemble; and to amateurs of high-class music, the evening was one of the most agreeable of the series. The sixth performance of Carmen on Saturday night brought the regular season to a close. Despite inconveniences, owing to the departure of Signor Campanini, and the non-appearance of Mdlle. Valleria, the impression created by the opera of Georges Bizet was as lively as before. Signor Runcio took the part of Don José, in many respects acquitting himself so well as to obtain unanimous applause. The music of Michaela was omitted, except her share of the finale to Act III., which was undertaken at an hour's notice by the versatile Madame Bauermeister (the Mercedes of the story). Miss Minnie Hauk may be truly said to have surpassed herself on this occasion, and henceforth Carmen must be inseparably associated with her name. The "Farewell Performances" (at reduced prices) began on Monday night with Il Flauto Magico. About these, which are to extend over another week, we shall have something to say in our next.

Royal Italian Opera.——The revival of Semiramide, for the sake of affording Madame Adelina Patti an opportunity of appearing before the London public in the character of the Babylonian Queen, brought an immense audience, and was an indisputable success. Rossini's imposing opera, the last he wrote for his native country, has lost none of its brilliancy and charm. Its melodies sound as fresh and spontaneous as ever, and the splendid instrumentation produces all its old effect. It would be a pity that such a work should be allowed to die away because dramatic music of so different a kind has been allowed, temporarily, to put it in the background. Now, however, there is a new cause to be pleased at its revival, and a new chance of its obtaining a fresh lease of its popularity. It need hardly be said that we refer to Madame Adelina Patti's assumption of the chief character—an assumption in every sense remarkable. Better executed the Maid of Semiramide has never been—for years past, indeed, never so well. How the aria, "Bell raggio," was sung (with embellishments invented by Rossini himself, expressly for Madame Patti, be it understood), and how the famous duets with Assur and Arsace, those familiar with Madame Patti's consummate art as a vocalist need hardly be told. But what astonished most people was the dramatic side of the impersonation—its admirable force and subtlety. Enough for the present that the new Semiramide has won a new and legitimate triumph. Madame Scalchi, as well-endowed an Arsace as could in these times easily be found, was a companion of whom any Semiramide might be proud; and so the duets both went to perfection—the exquisitely melodious cantilena, "Giorno d'orrore," in the last and finest of the two, being enthusiastically applauded and encored. What M. Maurel may prove, in the end, as Assur, we cannot guess, his voice being just now sadly out of order. He looks the character well, however, and represents it with unquestionable intelligence. Nevertheless, after three French Assurs (Agnesi, Faure, and Maurel) we confess a longing once more to hear Rossini's florid music from the mouth of a genuine Italian vocalist, versed in the genuine Italian method. The performance generally of Semiramide, under the direction of Signor Bevignani, is in most respects to be unreservedly commended. This week, the last of Mr. Gye's season, began on Monday with a second representation of Semiramide, followed, on Tuesday, by the Hamlet of Ambroise Thomas, with Mdlle. Albani as Ophelia. But, as we shall have some few recapitulatory observations to make, we reserve further comment.

Italian Music at the French Exhibition.——The successes of the orchestra from the Scala, under Signor Faccio, have been rivalled, if not surpassed, at the Trocadéro, by those of another Italian orchestra, from Turin (114 in number), under the direction of Signor Pedrotti (composer of the well-known opera, Tutti in Maschera); but in the last instance, as in the first, the programmes did not redound greatly to the credit of modern Italian composition. The Turin orchestra gave three concerts, at not one of which was there anything very remarkable to speak of, except some incidental music—overture, march, and andante—written by Signor Mancinelli, conductor of the Teatro Apollo at Rome, for Pietro Cossa's tragedy, Cleopatra. For the performance of these Signor Pedrotti gracefully resigned the bâton to his Roman colleague, the non-appearance of whose orchestra at the Exhibition has already been explained. The proposed concert in which the orchestras from Milan and Turin were to be heard together being, at the eleventh hour, abandoned, a supplementary concert was given by the Turin orchestra alone.

Waifs.——Count Beust, an earnest amateur of music, has composed a Marriage Waltz for the King and Queen of Saxony, in honour of the occasion of their silver wedding.—Instead of joining the autumn Scandinavian tour, as was expected, it is probable that Signor Foli may become one of the Mapleson Operatic Company in the United States.—Wagner's Siegfried (Part 3 of the great Tetralogy) is in rapid preparation at the Imperial Opera House, Vienna.—The well-remembered Mdlle. Ilma di Murska, most "bohemienne" of Bohemian vocalists, has been singing with great success at Cincinnati. No one can have forgotten Ilma di Murska, at Her Majesty's Theatre, as Lucia and Dinorah, in both of which characters her individuality, as original as it was charming, made a striking impression.—Madame Adelina Patti leaves London on Monday, for North Wales, where she intends taking a short holiday. She is engaged for two concerts at Dublin, in the autumn.—Madame Christine Nilsson is at Mont d'Or, where she will remain until compelled to return for the series of concerts she has undertaken in the English provinces.—Among the candidates for the chair left vacant by the death of François Bazin at the French Academy are MM. Massenet and Camille Saint-Saens.—The monument for the tomb of the late Félicien David, composer of the Ode-Symphony called Le Désert, and so many other works, is being erected at Pecqsous Saint Germain, in which commune he died, some two years since.—In honour of the Silver Wedding of the King and Queen of the Belgians, and as part of the festivities got up to celebrate that festive occasian, there will be two "extraordinary" operatic performance at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, the one a "gala," the other open gratuitously to the public. The opera selected for both is Verdi's Aïda.—A statue of Auber is about to be erected at Caen, the birthplace of the celebrated composer. Better late than never.

SPORTING

The Turf.——It must be confessed that the Liverpool July Meeting has been little short of a failure, most meagre fields of horses contesting for several events, and the company being very slack. The great handicap event, the July Cup, though it had a good entry, only saw seven runners at the post. One would have thought that "the talent" could have placed them pretty accurately; but they made a poor hand of it, Advance, Plaisante, Footstep, and Snail being the most fancied. Of these only Advance got a place, and this was third, Strathmore and Constantine finishing first and second. There was some excuse, however, for the learned ones, as the winner all through the season has shown himself apparently but second-rate, and a cue into the bargain.—The Winchester Meeting, as usual, was a fairly good one, Cæsarion taking the Hampton Cup, and following up his victory by securing the Hampton Stakes on the second day. Another double-event victor was the Duke of Montrose's Eminence, who scored the Welter Handicap and Crawley Plate.—It is rumoured that the redoubtable Robert Peck, of Russley, will for the future only train for the Duke of Westminster and Lord Rosebery.

Cricket.——In glorious cricket weather, the ball has been kept merrily rolling since our last Notes. The counties have been putting on the steam as the season progresses. Surrey, for whom the energetic secretary, Mr. Alcock, arranges abundance of matches, has been down to Trent Bridge to sustain a ten wickets' defeat from Nottinghamshire. The Home county only scored 54 and 84, and no wonder considering the Captain, Mr. Strachan, and other crack amateurs were absent. The time really seems to have come when those interested in Surrey cricket should take serious cognizance of the state of affairs. The rule now seems to be that if the captain cannot or will not play, four or five other amateurs follow suit, and a more absurd rule it is hardly possible to conceive.—Lancashire has given Yorkshire a good drubbing, winning in a single innings by 26 runs. For the Western county, Mr. Hornby and Barlow contributed 78 and 60 respectively.—It can hardly be said that Yorkshire was recompensed for this crushing overthrow by beating poor Surrey at Bramall Lane in one innings, and with 104 runs to spare; among the big Northern scores 67 being scored for Ulyett, 61 for Greenwood, and 71 for Armitage.—The Tunbridge Wells week seems to aspire to rank with the Canterbury week, but still longo intervallo. In accordance with the fitness of things the "native" Eleven had its revenge for the recent defeat at Brighton, as on this occasion Kent worsted Sussex in one innings by 36 runs, though several of her best men were absent. For the home county the 76 of Lord Harris is to be noted.—From a certain point of view the Eton and Harrow match at Lord's takes precedence of all other cricket as a great carnival of the "Upper Ten." It was unusually exciting this year in consequence of the result being thoroughly open till the very end. Harrow went in first, and marked 119, which was responded to by Eton with 117. Harrow's next effort was 224, the last two bats making nearly 100 between them. Undismayed the Light Blues went to the wickets, and from the first the scoring was rapid, and 206 were eventually made. Thus Eton only lost by 20 runs. It requires the pen of a very special correspondent to describe the cheering and counter-cheering of the "boys" and their friends on the second day of the match, hardly a ball passing without loud cries of "bowled," "hit," "stopped," or "fielded," being ejaculated from thousands of partisan throats. Taking it as a whole, the play on both sides was good, and in the long annals of public school cricket a better contested game has hardly ever been witnessed.

Aquatics.——As only Mr. Payne, of the Moulsey Boat Club, has challenged the holder, Mr. Playford, for the Wingfield Sculls, this amateur championship will be rowed in one heat on Monday next. Where is Mr. Edwardes-Moss, the Diamonds man at Henley?

Swimming.——Captain Webb, preparatory to his thirty-six hours' flotation attempt, has done a "gentle breather" from Gravesend to Woolwich and back, being in the water ten hours all but three minutes. The distance swam was about forty miles, the longest ever accomplished in fresh water.

Quoits.——This fine old classical game, not fast enough for the majority of athletes in the present day, is not yet defunct, nor likely to be we are glad to add. Witness the fourth annual match played on the Everton Ground between twenty-five gentlemen representing the counties of Lancashire and Cheshire. Result—Cheshire 671, Lancashire 668.

LEGAL

The Anglo-Russian Treaty.——The prosecution of Mr Marvin, the Foreign Office writer, has fallen through, as we anticipated it would do. The third hearing took place at Bow treet on Tuesday, when Mr. Vaughan dismissed the case, remarking that he would not trouble defendant's counsel, as there was no evidence of a larceny having been committed. It was perfectly clear that the first communication, which appeared in the Globe on May 30th, was the result of an effort of memory. He had at first been very much struck with the great breach of trust that the defendant had committed, but it now appeared that there was reason to believe that the information would be published the following morning in the papers, and it would not appear very extraordinary that he should seek to anticipate the publication. The charge stood on a different footing with regard to the exact copy published on the 14th of June. It must have been copied, and he must have had access to it at some time subsequent to the 30th of May and before the 13th of June; but there was no evidence as to when it was copied, nor under what circumstances the defendant could possibly have had access to it.—The Globe, in a leading article on Wednesday, says:—"The prosecution appears to have started with two fixed ideas—the one to secure the condemnation of the accused by almost any means; the second, to injure the journal which had audaciously dared to publish what was probably intended for some more favoured and subservient newspaper."

Miscellaneous Items.——At the Lancaster Assizes last week, before Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, seven men and one woman were convicted of having taken part in the riots, and in the burning of Colonel Jackson's house during the recent cotton strike. The woman was sentenced to seven years', two of the men to fifteen, one to twelve, two to ten, and one to seven years' penal servitude, and one to eighteen months' hard labour.—We should all feel obliged to Lord Dorchester for endeavouring to prevent English travellers from being "fleeced" by Parisian tradesmen, but we can hardly agree with the method of procedure chosen by his lordship. So long ago as October, 1874, Lady Dorchester ordered some Chantilly veils and handkerchiefs of a mercer in the Rue de la Paix. They were duly forwarded to London with the invoice, and no complaint as to the price was made until December, 1875, when payment was first demanded, and his lordship's offer to pay if 10 per cent. were taken off, was declined. The mercer appears to have waited patiently for some time longer, but ultimately an action was brought in the Queen's Bench Division, and a jury having decided that the charges were reasonable, Mr. Justice Mellor has given judgment for the full amount claimed.—A curious application, arising out of a breach of promise action, has just been heard before Vice-Chancellor Malins. A young woman having obtained a verdict for ninety pounds damages against a Herefordshire farmer, the mother of the defendant immediately sought probate of her husband's will, which had remained unproved for twenty-eight years, with a view to show that the farm occupied by the defendant belonged to her. It was contended that this was a scheme to avoid paying the damages, and an inquiry before a Judge in Chambers was accordingly directed.—Dr. Berson, a Polish Jew, is in custody on a charge of having in 1873 robbed his employer, a merchant of Tiefenbach in Austria. It was urged, on his behalf, that the alleged offence was committed before the passing of the Extradition Treaty, but this objection was overruled, and a remand granted that evidence might be produced as to his identity, which was also disputed.—A number of robberies have recently been committed at the Civil Service Stores in Bedford Street, Strand, and the other day a thief was detected in the act of walking off with a miscellaneous collection of goods for which he had not paid. He had a musical box and a railway-bag under his arm, and in his pockets where found an eye-glass and a pipe; another musical box and an umbrella, also stolen from the stores, had been placed by him in a cab, and subsequently taken to the police station by the driver, who had become tired of waiting for him.—On Monday at the Salisbury Assizes a man was tried for wilfully drowning a little boy aged seven, whom he had pushed into the river, having first tempted him to the river side by a promise of some halfpence. He was acquitted on the ground of insanity, it being shown that he had a mania for pushing naked boys into the water.—At Edinburgh a man, while in a somnambulistic condition, has killed his child by dashing it against the walls of his room. The jury returned a verdict that he was not responsible for his actions, and he was discharged, the Judge advising him to take precautions for the future.—Another curious case of supposed somnambulism occurred on Monday in Coram Street, London, where a young servant girl set fire to her bedroom in three places, and was found in an adjoining apartment with her own clothing on fire. The fire was discovered by a policeman, who aroused the inmates.—A dreadful murder has been committed at Farnham, in Surrey, by an army pensioner, who was employed at a lime kiln. On Saturday his dinner was taken to him by his daughter, a child aged twelve, and because the child declined to fetch him more beer, he beat her about the head with a heavy hammer, and, leaving her for dead, went and gave himself up to the police. The child lingered until Monday morning, when she died.—Baron Dowse, at the Armagh Assizes on Saturday, before sentencing a prisoner, asked the governor of the gaol whether the new rules which require a prisoner to lie on a plank for the first month were in force, and whether that meant the prisoner should sleep in his clothes for a month. Both questions having been answered in the affirmative, Baron Dowse said that judges were not mere automatons, but had their feelings like other men. He should give a much shorter sentence, for he considered the new rule nothing more nor less than torture.—A Roxburghshire farmer who is stated to be an "elder" of the United Presbyterian Church, has been ordered to pay 500*l.* damages in respect of a breach of promise action.—At Hereford a girl of thirteen has been committed for trial for attempting to poison her mistress, by mixing with her medicine some bi-chlorida of mercury, which was kept in the house for the purpose of dressing sheep.—A country schoolmaster has had to pay 10*l.* damages for having injured a girl's thumb by striking it accidentally with a cane with which he was rapping a desk as a signal for order amongst the scholars.—A foolish fellow at Bristol was given into custody on the day previous to the Prince of Wales's visit, for having threatened to shoot the Prince. When taken before the magistrate, he fell upon his knees in the dock and made an abject apology, and was set at liberty on entering into recognisances to keep the peace.—A wonderful story of prison-breaking has been going the round of the papers. The modern Jack Sheppard was one Robert Ray, who, being in custody for horse-stealing, managed on Saturday night to break through a nine-inch wall of his cell into the corridor, pull up the grating of a heating apparatus, and then crawl fifty or sixty feet along the flue, only about a foot square. At the end of the flue he forced up two large paving stones forming the floor of a cellar, picked the lock of the cellar-door, and then, finding himself in the garden, scaled a twenty-feet wall. After all this trouble he was retaken early the next morning.—At Llaughby, near Newport, South Wales, a family of five persons were on Tuesday night murdered by some unknown assailants, who also ransacked the house, and set fire to the furniture.

Seamens' Hospital Society, Greenwich.——At the quarterly General Court of the Governors of the Seamen's Hospital Society (late Dreadnought) it was announced that 368 seamen have been admitted to the hospital as in-patients, during the past quarter, from British and foreign ships. In addition to the British seamen, 113 sailors of different nationalities were benefited, including 28 from Sweden and Norway, 22 from Germany, 18 from the colonies, 13 from the United States, 10 from Russia, and representatives from Austria, Italy, Spain, France, Holland, Mexico, India, and Denmark. We regret to record that the accounts presented a deficiency of 458*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, a fact which eloquently proves how inadequate is the public support extended to this universal charity.

The late William Cullen Bryant, states the Echo, attributed his marvellous health and agility to his prudent mode of living. He rose about five o'clock in the morning, and worked with dumb-bells, a horizontal bar, and a pole, for a full hour, occasionally diversifying his exercise by swinging a light chair round his head. He then bathed and had a light breakfast of oatmeal-cakes, milk, and fruit. After breakfast he occupied himself for a while with his studies, and then walked to his newspaper office, a distance of three miles, transacted his business, and walked back again, whatever the weather might be. He worked upon his farm or in his garden in the afternoon, dined early, eating meat only once a day, and living principally upon fruit and vegetables. He seldom drank any wine, never smoked tobacco, avoided in the evening every kind of literary occupation which tasked his faculties, such as composition, even to the writing of letters, and retired to rest at ten o'clock, or sometimes earlier.

An interesting Account of that once all-important arm—the bayonet—is given by Engineering, which states that it is an arm peculiarly French. It was invented, it is said, at Bayonne, in 1641, and employed in 1670 in the regiment of the King's Fusiliers. It sensibly modified the military art in Europe, as it made cavalry less terrible to infantry, and caused the fires of lines of battle to be regarded as the principal means of action. According to a local tradition, it was in a small hamlet near Bayonne that this arm was invented. What led to its invention was that, in a fierce combat between some Basque peasants and some Spanish smugglers, the former, having exhausted their ammunition, fastened their long knives to their muskets, and by means of the weapon so formed put their enemies to flight. The arm rapidly came into general use in Europe. In 1678, at the time of the peace of Nimeguen, all the French grenadiers had the bayonet, but the socket, which makes the use of it so easy, was not invented until a later period. Bayonets at that time were a sort of dagger, of which the handle was placed in the muzzle of the musket, and, of course, prevented the musket from being fired. The first battle at which the bayonet was seriously employed was that of Turin, in 1682; but it was not until the battle of Spires, 1703, that the first charge of the bayonet was executed. After this epoch, up to 1792, the bayonet was often employed in combat, but the real value of it was not revealed until the wars of National Independence. Then the bayonet became really a French arm.

ART DURING THE CONGRESS—A PICTURESQUE ENEMY

LAUNCH OF THE FREEMASONS' LIFE-BOAT "ALBERT EDWARD" AT CLACTON-ON-SEA

PROMINENT MEMBERS OF THE FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND

THE annual General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, which was held a few weeks ago in the New Public Hall recently erected in Glasgow, created a special interest, as no meeting of the Assembly had been held there since the year 1638. During the Diet, which lasted eleven days, the Great Hall was constantly crowded, especially when the charge of heresy against Professor Smith of Aberdeen was under discussion. The number of members was 728, the clergy and laity being represented in equal proportions, and some of the delegates coming from India and Africa, as well as the continent of Europe. Our portrait group includes the Moderator, the Rev. Dr. Andrew A. Bonar; his immediate predecessor in the chair, the Rev. Dr. Goold; the Senior and Junior Principal Clerks of Assembly, the Rev. Dr. Sir H. W. Moncrieff, Bart., and the Rev. Dr. William Wilson; and the Rev. Dr. Rainy, Principal of the "New College," Edinburgh, instituted in the year of the Disruption.

The Rev. ALEXANDER BONAR, D.D., was born in 1810, is a native of Edinburgh, and was educated at its University. He was licensed to preach in 1835, and, after some time spent in mission work in Jedburgh and Edinburgh, was ordained to the Ministry in Collace, Perthshire, in 1838. In the following year, accompanied, among others, by the Rev. R. M. M'Cheyne, he was sent on a mission to the Jews. He formed an intimate friendship with M'Cheyne, and became in 1844 the writer of his biography, the work by which Dr. Bonar is best known, and which has attained a circulation of over 120,000 copies. In 1856 Dr. Bonar removed to Glasgow to engage in home mission work, and became minister of the territorial charge known as Finnieston Free Church. He is ardently attached to the cause of Evangelical truth, and, like his brother, the Rev. Dr. Horatius Bonar, the distinguished hymn writer and author of several religious prose works, is a believer in the pre-millennial advent of Christ. His degree of D.D. was received a few years ago from Edinburgh University.

The Rev. WILLIAM HENRY GOOLD, D.D.——The Martyrs' Free Church, Edinburgh, of which Dr. Goold is minister, was, previous to the union of the Free and Reformed Presbyterian denominations, connected with the latter body. Dr. Goold was born in Edinburgh in 1815, and after leaving the University there, where he distinguished himself as a classical scholar and linguist, he was in 1840 ordained as colleague and successor to his father, the Rev. William Goold, who died in 1844. Father and son have successively been ministers of the same church for about seventy-four years. In the Reformed Presbyterian College Dr. Goold held for a quarter of a century the Chair of Exegesis and Church History. He is noted for his ability as an expounder of Scripture, and among other literary efforts which have won for him a high place in the theological world, is his edition of Owen, the great Puritan. He likewise edited the works of Mr. M'Laren, the well-known Scotch preacher of the last century, and, for publication in this country, those of Dr. Hodge of America. He was Moderator of the Free Church General Assembly last year.

THE REV. SIR HENRY WELLWOOD MONCRIEFF, BART., D.D.——The name of Moncrieff is one of which Scotland is justly proud, which has conferred honour on the Church, the Bench, and the Bar. Sir Henry, whose brother is Lord Justice Clerk Moncrieff, is son of the ninth Baronet of that name, and is a Lord of the Session. He was born in 1809, and holds the degrees of B.A. Oxon. and D.D. Edinburgh. He was Minister of Baldernock in 1836-7, of East Kilbride Established Church from 1837 till 1843, and of East Kilbride Free Church from 1843 till 1852, when he was translated to St. Cuthbert's Free Church, Edinburgh, where he still labours. He was elected Moderator of the Assembly in 1869. As Senior Principal Clerk of the Assembly he occupies a conspicuous position in the House, is firmly attached to orthodox views, is a man of considerable presence, of robust frame and intellectual vigour, and possesses a telling voice, with clear and massive elocution.

Rev. William Wilson, D.D.——The colleague clerk of Sir Henry Moncrieff, Dr. Wilson, has long been acknowledged as a man of honesty and firmness of purpose, shrewd and trustworthy. He was ordained in 1837, and was many years minister of the Free Church of St. Paul's, Dundee. He now resides in Edinburgh, having, though still nominally retaining his connection with that charge as senior minister, virtually retired from the pastorate. He is secretary of the Sustentation Committee, and joint convener of that Committee with Principal Rainy. He was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1866, a fitting recognition of his merits and usefulness.

Rev. Robert Rainy, D.D.——Principal Rainy is a son of the late Dr. Harry Rainy, one of the Medical Professors of Glasgow University. He was ordained in 1850, and in 1862 was appointed Professor of Theology and Church History in the New College, Edinburgh. On the death of Dr. Candlish, he succeeded to the Principalship of the College. His skill and readiness in debate early marked him out as a leader in the Church Courts, in which, more especially since the death in recent years of some of the more renowned veterans, he has, by universal consent, been assigned a first place. He is author of "Delivery and Development of Christian Doctrine," being the fifth series of the Cunningham Lectures; "Lectures on the Church of Scotland," "Life of Principal Cunningham," a lecture on "Church and State from Constantine," and "The Bible and Criticism."

Our portraits are from photographs: Dr. Bonar by Stuart, 120, Buchanan St., Glasgow; Dr. Goold by Tunny, 13, Maitland St., Edinburgh; Sir H. W. Moncrieff by R. Brown, Inverurie; Dr. Wilson by J. Valentine, Dundee; Dr. Rainy by J. Moffat, 125, Princes St., Edinburgh; and Mr. R. R. Simpson (who is Writer to the Signet and Clerk to the Assembly) by A. Lewis, Douglas, Isle of Man.

THE GRAPHIC SUMMER NUMBER,

which was entirely sold out on the day of publication, has now been re-issued, and a few copies still remain unsold.

The numerous readers of THE GRAPHIC who were disappointed in not being able to procure the number at the earlier date would do well to make immediate application to their newsagents, as, after the copies now remaining are disposed of, there will be no further re-issue.

THE GRAPHIC SUMMER NUMBER.

"Nothing better of the kind, whether as regards the artistic merit or its literary attractions, has ever been issued—and we are thinking of productions which cost a good deal more than a shilling—than the Summer Number which the enterprising proprietors of The Graphic have published at that price. It stands, indeed, in some respects, entirely alone."—Manchester Examiner.

"We may embrace this opportunity of saying that The Graphic people have excelled even themselves in their Summer Number."—Greenock Telegraph.

"The most entertaining number of The Graphic yet issued is the Summer Number for 1878."—Leeds Express.

"From its novel and interesting character great success is anticipated."—Bilston Herald.

"A popular number, that will assuredly secure a great demand."—Daily Chronicle, June 25, 1878.

"Is a novelty in newspaper literature."—Warrington Guardian.

"Which is likely to meet with a very favourable reception."—Bradford Telegraph.

"The coloured engravings, which are numerous, and finished in a very superior style, hit off in a happy manner the peculiarities incident to life at the seaside, the more humorous features receiving special notice."—Bradford Chronicle.

"The number is certainly the best yet issued by The Graphic, and that is saying a great deal."—Preston Herald.

"Will excite general interest."—Eastern Morning News.

"Having read your notice of The Graphic's Summer Number, I hasten to examine for myself this artistic and wonderful production. I can with confidence recommend my readers, residents or visitors, to procure for themselves copies of this admirable paper, feeling sure that they will derive much genuine pleasure from an inspection of its contents."—Scarborough Weekly Post.

"Christmas is no longer to have a monopoly of good things in the way of literature and art. To The Graphic belongs the credit of invading the 'old Father's' time honoured domain."—Brighton Herald.

"A charming special Midsummer Number of that inimitable journal, The Graphic, whose varied and unique illustrations are a marvel of the printer's art, and exhibit a great advance in colour printing. We have seldom seen a better shilling's worth."—Staffordshire Advertiser.

"Demands a word of praise for the excellent taste and artistic beauty of its illustrations, the majority of which are coloured by a process which the proprietors were the first, we believe, to employ for the purposes of popular periodical literature."—Manchester City News.

"Some of the pictures are very amusing, while others are inclined to be sentimental."—Liverpool Daily Chronicle.

"Holiday numbers of the lighter monthlies are by this time almost an institution, but a 'summer number' of an illustrated weekly is a rather novel idea. It is an idea, however, which is likely to be heartily welcomed by many people in the form given to it by the publishers of The Graphic. The accuracy of some of the views is noteworthy, while the spirit and humour displayed in all would not have discredited John Leech's Punch."—Scotsman.

"Is one of the most artistic productions that has lately been published. A very pleasant day indeed might be spent on the sea shore with no other companion than the summer number of The Graphic."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Sufficient light reading to wile away a few hours very pleasantly."—Midland Counties Express.

"Its novel and interesting character will doubtless render it a marked success."—Belfast Northern Whig.

"Is delightfully fresh and breezy. The number is a highly creditable one, and is full value for a shilling."—Sheffield Post.

"It contains a large number of coloured engravings, the subjects of which will excite general interest."—Leeds Mercury.

"A great many of the drawings are given to phases of life at Scarborough, and several to those of Harrogate."—Hull Express.

"The views are most amusing, and true to life. We commend the Extra Summer Number of The Graphic to our readers."—Shields Daily News.

"Affords us greater pleasure than almost any such venture which we can remember. How such a work could be produced at the price charged for it we are utterly unable to explain."—Bath Herald.

"The special numbers of The Graphic are always good, but the present one is the best which has been yet produced."—Observer.

"Will be the source of considerable amusement, illustrating the life and habits of various classes of seaside visitors."—Staffordshire Sentinel.

"This number has a true holiday air about it, and is almost redolent of the sweet breath of kine, and bracing with the briny air of ocean."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"Admirable, and the illustrations of our babies among the buttercups and on the sea-shore will find their way into many a scrap book."—Sunday Times.

"Will be of special interest to Yorkshire readers because of its coloured illustrations, numerous and effective, of Mr. Chumley's Holidays at Scarborough."—York Herald.

"By far the most elaborate thing of the kind that has ever been issued in newspaper form."—Banbury Guardian.

"During the height of the season is admirably pourtrayed. It should have an immense sale."—Doncaster Gazette.

"This splendid holiday number of The Graphic is sure to sell by tens of thousands. Everybody at the seaside or at inland resorts, famous for their medicinal springs, is bound to buy this number; and no one buying it will fail—unless he is afflicted with a very severe attack of mental blindness—to discover her own or his own portrait. . . . This summer number will prove, we hope, the prelude to many more equally good."—Weekly Times.

"Redolent of the seaside. The number is an admirable one, both in a literary and artistic sense."—Liverpool Evening Express.

"Is a surprise of a most pleasurable kind, a budget of fun, and brimful of the pleasantest, brightest, and funniest coloured seaside sketches ever gathered together in such a form."—Liverpool Albion.

"Is resplendent in gorgeous colours, and they must indeed be fastidious who are unable to derive pleasure from its bright and amusing sketches. The Graphic, as a high-class journal of art, is always an acceptable element of our current literature, but there is a peculiar charm about the present issue which is calculated to make it particularly welcome at the commencement of our Scarborough season."—Scarborough Daily Post.

"The coloured supplement, 'The Last Bit of Scandal,' is alone worth the cost of the number."—Eastern Daily Press.

THE GRAPHIC SUMMER NUMBER

"It is one of the most attractive of the special numbers of this enterprising journal yet offered to the public. Just the thing, in fact, for a companion on the sands, the steamboat, or the coach."—Doncaster Chronicle.

"Full of pictures, most of them coloured, and chiefly relating to the seaside and fashionable life thereat, and mostly humorous. There is an abundance of capital stories likewise, and also a large, fine, coloured separate plate, entitled 'The Last Bit of Scandal.'"—Halifax Courier.

"There is an appropriateness about the treatment of these pictures which is charming. We can say no more than to advise our readers to purchase and peruse The Graphic for themselves, and they will admit that it is a perfect treat."—Leeds Daily News.

"The coloured scenes of life at the seaside, as illustrating 'Mr. Chumleigh's Holidays,' are cleverly drawn."—Shrewsbury Journal.

"It is a wonderful gathering of all manner of pictures of out of door amusements and occupations, colour illustrated in a humoursome manner."—Bradford Daily Post.

"The reading matter is amusing, interesting, and thrilling. We anticipate a great popularity for this most charming number."—Liverpool Weekly Albion.

"We cannot recount a fiftieth part of the attractions of the number. Our readers should see and enjoy it for themselves."—Sunderland Weekly Echo.

"A splendidly illustrated summer number."—Waterford Weekly News.

"It will be welcome everywhere, but especially in the northern counties. 'Mr. Chumley's Holidays' were at Scarbro', and when he went to that delightful watering-place he took his sketch-book with him. He worked well."—Hull Packet.

"As a specimen of literature it is unsurpassed; and as a specimen of art it is most exquisite."—Blyth Weekly News.

"Is a splendid contribution of a light literary kind, suitable to holiday life. . . . The pictures show society in all its seaside forms: on the sands, in the ballroom, flirting in appropriate places, and a great variety of other pretty scenes, the truth of which will be apparent to all who have enjoyed their holidays in our watering places."—Western Daily Mercury.

"The number is one of great beauty and interest, and the stories are of a class which will well repay the time devoted to their perusal."—Paisley Daily Express.

"It is by far the best shilling's worth of holiday literature and art that we have ever had the pleasure of looking at. Our fear is that the supply will hardly equal the demand."—Devon Weekly Times.

"Perfection in illustrated newspaper art."—Newcastle Chronicle.

"The enterprise which could produce such an extra number for a shilling deserves commendation and countenance."—Hereford Journal.

"Is one of great interest. . . . The letterpress is very enjoyable."—Edinburgh Daily Review.

"Will, from its novel and interesting character, be a great success."—Chester Chronicle.

"The extra number issued at Christmas was of a novel and interesting character, admirably illustrated in colour, and when it is understood that the number under notice is intended as a companion one to that, a good idea of it will at once be formed."—Northampton Herald.

"Is one of the prettiest things we have seen for a long time."—Liverpool and Southport Daily News.

"Contains some thirty or forty pages of illustrations and prose as amusing as anything of the kind that has come under our notice. A cheaper shilling's worth for the seaside, or the country holiday, it is not within our power to recommend."—Brighton Gazette.

"A really wonderful shilling's worth, both in respect of quality and quantity, and far excels in attractiveness the extra number issued at Christmas, successful as that was."—Darlington and Stockton Times.

"This remarkable companion to the last Christmas number seems quite as marvellous at the price. In fact, we may say, without fear of contradiction, that this is the most extraordinary shilling's worth ever given to the public."—Hawick Advertiser.

"The present number will, we are certain, find a place on drawing-room tables without number."—Freeman's Journal.

"No one going out on a holiday should be without a Graphic Summer Number. Children, especially, will be delighted with it."—Sussex Daily News.

"We venture to predict it will give general satisfaction both to old friends and new patrons of their very excellent journal."—Newark Advertiser.

"Scenes common at watering-places, but which do not usually attract attention until presented in this way, have supplied abundant material to the skilful draughtsman employed."—Western Morning News.

"The number is certain to prove a most agreeable companion for those who like to take their summer holidays easily."—Nottingham Daily Guardian.

"Will, from its novel and interesting character, be a great success."—Chester Courant.

VIRTUTE ET INDUSTRIA

BRISTOL ILLUSTRATED—THE CHURCH OF ST. MARY REDCLIFF

THE physical situation of Bristol, a bottom enclosed by hills, and even now subject in parts at high spring-tides to overflowings of the Avon, was probably found by the Romans at the time they occupied the adjacent heights of Clifton to be an uninhabitable swamp. St. Philip's Marsh, Marsh Street, Canon's Marsh, and Frogmere Street, commemorate by their names the former condition of large portions of the level within the present city boundaries, and suggest a period when Nature ruled unrestrained, and when, instead of the voices of men and hum of traffic, a solitude prevailed which was broken only by the scream of wild fowl and the cries of ravenous beasts, that found their appropriate haunts amid dank reeds and rushes, tall ferns, and gigantic trees. By degrees the woody morass became a hermitage, a village, an abbey, and a city of churches. Previously to these issues the Briton had settled on the high rocks of the Avon, and the remains of defensive earthworks commanding that river are the earliest positive traces that we find of human settlement.

Of the first foundation of Bristol there is no historical record. That the Danes and Saxons together or successively held the place there are, in addition to other evidences, numerous coins of Bristol mintage of Canute, Harold, and Edward the Confessor to show. The earliest mention of a castle here is in connection with Godfrey Mowbray, Bishop of Contance, nephew to the famous Tancred, the hero of Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered."

BRISTOL ILLUSTRATED—CLIFTON SUSPENSION BRIDGE

We find him at Bristol in company with Robert the "Peace-breaker," his nephew, a huge, dark, proud, and melancholy man, who rarely smiled. These had combined with Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, against William Rufus, in favour of Robert, Earl of Normandy, and having sacked Bristol they brought their booty into the castle. The rebellion was unsuccessful, and the belligerent prelate, with the "Peace-breaker," was driven out of the kingdom. William Rufus then granted the Royalty or Honour of Gloucester to his cousin, Robert Fitzhamon, whose daughter and heiress Mabel, marrying Robert, Earl of Gloucester, natural son of Henry I., that powerful noble came into possession of her opulent dower, which included Bristol. The castle there, which had been hitherto very inferior in strength and magnitude, was so improved (A.D. 1138) by Earl Robert as to become one of the strongest fortresses in the kingdom. It stood outside the eastern wall of the town, and spread over six acres. The Donjon Tower or Keep, according to William Wyrcestre, who quotes as his informant, the porter of the castle, was twenty-five feet in thickness at the base, and was hardly inferior in magnitude to the famous Julius Cæsar or White Tower of London, which it resembled.

Could we recall the past to sight, there would sweep before us in association with the fabric of this once redoubtable stronghold a succession of the most illustrious persons of English history: persons whose biography might almost or altogether be called the history of England. We should see John, with his mailed barons on their clanking war steeds, trooping towards the barbican, which stood at the entrance to the present Castle Street. The portcullis must on many occasions have been raised on the approach of that shameless king, for he no less than nineteen times visited Bristol; and, doubtless, Kingswood Forest often resounded with the cry of his hunt. Henry III., immediately upon the death of John, came to Bristol Castle for security; when he permitted (A.D. 1216) the town to choose a Mayor, after the manner of London, and with him were chosen two "grave, sad, and worshipful men," who were called Prepositors. The Princess Eleanor, the Beauty of Brittany, sister of the ill-fated Arthur, endured half her forty years' captivity within the same fortress. The greatest of the Plantagenets (Edward I.) twice celebrated high Christmas festival at Bristol Castle, and within its walls was held the marriage feast of Eleanor, his eldest daughter. Edward the Second, in his days of darkness, was also at the Castle, within the towers of which met the Council of Prelates and Barons in the presence of the Queen, that appointed the Duke of Aquitaine, the King's son, to be Regent of the kingdom. Among the company was the Bishop of Hereford, who wrote the equivocal letter to the keepers of Edward II. at Berkeley Castle, "Edwardum Regem occidere nolite timere bonum est." Richard II., with his voluptuous company, here held his Court (A.D. 1387), having with him, says Froissart, "full 200 lances, knights, and squires, and 10,000 archers," in addition to the Queen and all the ladies and damsels of her retinue. Proud Bolingbroke, on his hot and fiery steed, was soon after beneath the battlements of the Castle with an embodied force of 60,000 men. Shakespeare has made us familiar with his demand to bring forth Bushey and Green, whom he charged with having been the cause of his eating the bitter bread of banishment, and with corrupting the King by their servile and wicked arts, and then ordered them to execution in the market place, before the High Cross.

MEDIÆVAL BRISTOL

Towards the close of the fifteenth century the Saxon area of the town had increased fourfold. Bristol was then characteristically a city of towers, as many as eighty being enumerated to have crowned the embrasured walls, monasteries, and churches. As the town was clasped within its strong arms of stone, and was itself a huge castle whose warders at the gates challenged all strange comers; so within the town the numerous guilds or brotherhoods of trades formed each a separate federation as compact against intruders as the squares of an army on a battle day. Each parish, likewise, was virtually itself a guild, and close watch was kept that none moved from one parish into another without security that such persons should not become a burden to the parish they had intruded into. Among the papers of St. Mary-le-Port vestry is a bond dated A.D. 1627, written in Latin, with an explanation in English appended, which states that Thomas Smith has lately come to reside in that parish, and having "a wife and family upon his charge," he binds himself under a penalty of 40*l.* (equal to 200*l.* at the present day) for which John Norton and another friend are securities, not to become chargeable upon the parishioners." Also at a vestry held at Christ Church, 25th November, 1664, one John Culleymore "is authorised from henceforth to observe and take notice of all strangers that come to inhabit in this parish, and immediately on discovery thereof to inform the churchwardens, that so security may be taken to discharge the parish against such far comers and their family."

Upon the fall of the monasteries outside and inside of the church-crowned walls of the city, Bristol might be said to have been ecclesiastical rather than commercial in its proper character, or at most it was a commercial centre with an ecclesiastical cincture. Chatterton likens Religion's self to a Grey Friar, who with sad visage and slow pace approaches the town of Bristow, and seeing the city full of soldiers and merchantmen, with few saints among them, is about to retire in despair. But the heavenly visitant is met by Fitzharding, who promises to raise a tall minster for prayer and praise, where he himself would become a cowled monk, and Religion should find solace and repose. The numerous convents that rose up before and after the mitred Abbey of St. Augustine, the church of which is now the cathedral, owed their existence to the powerful Earls of Gloucester, to the Barons of Berkeley and of Beverston Castle, and to the Lords de la Warr, rather than to merchant princes like the Canynges, the Framptons, and the Shipwards, who some three centuries later built the glorious churches of which Redcliff and St. Stephen are the chief. Franciscans, Carmelites, Benedictines, Dominicans, and Austin Canons, with the devotional guilds, hospitals, hermitages, churches, and chauntries, made the air thick with clouds of incense, and Fitzharding's promise that Religion should be the principal thing seemed fulfilled. It might have been thought that when the "cowls were sent adrift," and inaction exchanged for secular pursuits, there would have been an almost sudden expansion of commercial enterprise. It is strange to notice, however, that in the time of Elizabeth (A.D. 1572), when a general registration was made of the shipping of the kingdom, the commerce of the second seaport of the realm had gone backward. In that year the number of merchant ships attached to the port of Bristol was 53, of which the largest was of 140 tons; the aggregate tonnage being 1,993. This was less than the tonnage of Canynge's vessels alone in the previous century. Bristol, however, in 1635 paid 25,000*l.* for customs, and gave 2,163*l.* towards fitting out a fleet against France and Holland, notwithstanding that about the same time 6,500*l.* was charged on the city for ship money.

COMMONWEALTH PERIOD

No single episode of the Civil War affected Charles more deeply, or proved more decisive of the ultimate event of the struggle, than the disloyalty of Bristol, and its final deliverance into the hands of the Parliament. "We had not killed of ours in the storm," says Cromwell, "nor in all this siege two hundred men. He who runs may read that all this is none other than the work of God. He must be a very Atheist that doth not acknowledge it." Soon after "the Committee for Establishing a Godly and Pious Ministry" was appointed; and Cromwell rejoices that "Presbyterians, Independents, all have here the same spirit of faith and prayer, the same presence and answer: they agree here, have no names of difference: pity it should be otherwise anywhere!"

In 1654 came an order from Cromwell for the final demolition of the Castle which had long been ruinous, but in some degree tenable, inasmuch that a garrison occupied certain of its chambers. The commission was dated February, and though Major Butler declared he would stay at Bristol, notwithstanding the badness of horse-quarter and the dearness of the place to soldiers, until the fortress was made untenable, it appears the work was not effected till a fresh command came from the Protector:—"Oliver C.—These are to authorise you forthwith to demolish the castle within the city of Bristol, and for so doing this shall be your warrant." This brief injunction was directed to the Mayor and Commonalty; and every householder was warned to assist in the demolition personally, or to appoint a substitute. The destruction of the castle was effected in a fortnight. An industrious explorer, however, may yet find a few interesting fragments, of which the most important is a fine Early English chamber that now serves as a humble cottage. Twelve years after the tragedy at Whitehall, at which time the Mayor of Bristol had proclaimed "that there was no King in England, and the successors of Charles I. were traitors to the State," the Mayor and Sheriff proclaimed Charles II. at the High Cross.

In May, 1660, the city, having returned to its allegiance, entreated the king for a ratification of their former privileges. Thereupon, in a letter to the magistrates, Charles confesses a particular kindness for Bristol, as a place where he had long resided. He wishes all who had been removed from the Corporation for their loyalty to be restored. In 1683, in consequence of some irregularities a Quo Warranto was issued by the Attorney-General against the Corporation, and the charter was required to be surrendered into the hands of the King, but in the following year a fresh charter was granted, constituting Bristol for the future a city incorporated and county by itself as heretofore: the Common Council to consist of 42 persons besides the Mayor, 12 of that number being Aldermen. The total number of Council is now 64.

LORD MACAULAY'S DESCRIPTION

Lord Macaulay, in speaking of Bristol as it existed at this time, remarks:—"Next to the capital, but next at an immense distance, stood Bristol, then the first English seaport, and Norwich, then the first English manufacturing town. Both have since that time (1685) been far outstripped by younger rivals, yet both have made positive advances. The population of Norwich has more than doubled." Pepys, who visited Bristol eight years after the Restoration, was struck by the splendour of the city. But his standard was not high, for he noted down as a wonder the circumstance that in Bristol a man might look round him and see nothing but houses. It seems that in no place with which he was acquainted, except London, did the buildings completely shut out the woods and fields. Large as Bristol might then appear, it occupied but a very small portion of the area on which it now stands. A few churches (eighteen) of eminent beauty rose out of a labyrinth of narrow lanes, built upon vaults of no great solidity. The hospitality of the city was widely renowned, and especially the collations with which the sugar refiners regaled their visitors. The repast was dressed in the furnace, and was accompanied by a rich beverage made of the best Spanish wine, and celebrated over the whole kingdom as "Bristol milk." Evelyn mentions in his diary that he here for the first time saw the process of casting sugar loaves, at the same time enjoying the luxury of eggs fried in the sugar pan with excellent Spanish wine. "Though as many elephants are fed," says old Fuller, "as cows grazed within the walls of this city, yet there is great plenty of this metaphorical milk, whereby Xeres or sherry sack is intended. Some will have it called milk, because (whereas nurses give newborn babes in some places pap, in others water and sugar) such wine is the first moisture given to infants in this city. It is also the entertainment, of course, which the courteous Bristolians present to all strangers, when first visiting their city." Sugar was an article of rarer luxury in the seventeenth century than at present, and a sugar loaf was a present worthy of the acceptance of a bishop. In the Church accounts of St. James's, under A.D. 1634, there is a charge of 1*l.* 6*s.* for two sugar loaves for my Lord Bishop, and there is a repetition of the gift in the following year. It appears that in 1607 the best refined sugar was 2*s.* 2*d.* the pound. Macaulay remarks that the luxury was supported by a thriving trade with the North American plantations and with the West Indies. "The passion for colonial traffic," he continues, "was so strong, that there was scarcely a small shopkeeper in Bristol who had not a venture on board of some ship bound for Virginia or the Antilles. There was, in the Transatlantic possessions of the Crown, a great demand for labour; and this demand was partly supplied by a system of crimping and kidnapping at the principal English seaports. Nowhere was this system in such active and extensive operations as at Bristol. Even the first magistrates of that city were not ashamed to enrich themselves by so odious a commerce." The same historian says that he cannot reckon among Judge Jefferies' crimes the reprimand given by him to the civic dignitaries on the kidnapping for which the city was infamous. That silver-tongued Chief Justice came to Bristol on the sangainary Western Assizes. According to his own elegant metaphor, he brought with him a broom which was to be used upon the Corporation. The Mayor and Aldermen, we are told in the "Lives of the Norths," were a "proud body;" which only increased Jefferies' pride in humbling them. The practice Macaulay adverts to of shipping off pilferers and small offenders for servants and slaves to the American colonies afforded him a rich opportunity. Sir Robert Cann was mayor at the time of Jefferies' visitation. Cann had never been personally guilty of kidnapping, but at least had more favoured than discountenanced the malpractice. The moral indignation of the eloquent Chief Justice was, perhaps, even less strong than his delight at the god-given chance of showing the force of his rhetoric. Quid datur à divis felici optatius horâ? After lashing and reviling the city magnates, whom he made tremble like the kidnapped culprits themselves, he turned to their chief, in his scarlet and furs, and having stormed upon him his choicest reproaches, and given him all the ill epithets his scolding eloquence could supply, he made his worship quit the bench and go down to the criminals' post at the bar, and there "plead for himself as a common rogue or thief." When the mayor hesitated, "he bawled at him," and stamping, called for his guards. The citizens, seeing their scarlet chief magistrate at the bar, were amazed and confounded; but hardly dared or cared to help his cause. After being called to London to answer an information against him, Sir Robert Cann, through the interest of friends, was released from further prosecution. "Go thy way," said the Scriptural Jefferies; "sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee."

EDWARD COLSTON

There was one merchant who could answer boldly "not guilty" to any such charge. We refer to Edward Colston, "the Man of Bristol," who was born in 1636 and died in 1721. We shall not attempt to establish the truth of the tradition that "St. Colston" was the inventor of Protestant charity. It is probably one of the cases in which the effect has given birth to the cause. It is said that Colston resided, together with his father and two younger brothers, for some time in Spain. In the course of their disputations with the Papists of that country, it was often urged to the brothers, in terms of reproach, that the Reformed religion produced no conspicuous examples of charitable works; to which taunt they were accustomed to reply that, if it was God's will to bring them safe home, they would do their part to wipe off that aspersion. In no long time two of the brothers were poisoned to prevent their return; but the elder, Edward, escaped, and munificently redeemed his promise. Inserted beneath his monumental effigy, in All Saints' Church, Bristol, is a list of the public charities and largesses of Colston. In the foundation of almshouses and schools, and "to the repairing and beautifying of churches" in his native city he gave, so far as can be learnt, upwards of 70,000*l.*, a princely sum in his day. His benefactions were not restricted to Bristol. He gave 5,500*l.* to St. Bartholomew's and other hospitals in London. Each successive year he went through the Marshalsea and Whitechapel Prisons, to dispense freely his money in releasing debtors confined for smaller amounts; and in one case sent 3,000*l.* to liberate poor debtors in Ludgate Prison. He gave 20,000*l.* to relieve the starving poor of London in 1709—a year of dearth. In at least one instance he was more willing to give than his munificence was to be received. Such was the grateful spirit of the Bristol aldermen, that when he offered to increase the number of scholars in Queen Elizabeth's Hospital—a yet flourishing public school of the city—from forty-four to one hundred, provided the Corporation would erect a suitable building, the civic dignitaries refused his offer, and denounced the institution as a "nursery for beggars and sloths, and rather a burden than a benefit to the place." Indeed, it must be confessed that our present flare of enlightenment has owed its origin to but small sparks of public spirit and gratitude; and the manner in which Colston himself formulated his educational schemes would, no doubt, in the present day be accounted narrow. One of his earlier foundations was a school for thirty boys in his own parish of Temple; a master to instruct the boys being provided at a salary of 25*l.* a year. Mr. Colston was careful that no books should be used that contained "any tincture of Whiggism;" but only such as would tend to make his scholars staunch sons of the Established Church. His principal charity is yet known as Colston's Hospital, and was founded in 1708 for the education and maintenance of one hundred boys. He enjoined by his will that, if any boy were persuaded by his parents to enter "a conventicle, or meeting, on pretence of religious worship, or if a parent, by word or action, deterred any child from attending the public worship of the Church of England, that child was to be expelled from the school and his clothing taken from him." Some would hence infer that Colston, in spite of his lavish outpouring of wealth in charities, was nevertheless a man of partialities and prejudices. His favour for the National Church at least redeems him from the imputation of being a Papist; a charge which was in his lifetime freely applied to him, and which his High Church doctrines inevitably brought upon him. But he lived in times when political and religious parties were divided by the sword. He was thirteen years of age when his liege sovereign was sacrificed at Whitehall, and since the fate of the royal Duncan no fouler deed had, in his estimation, been committed. The mansion in which Colston dwelt was the same that Charles I. was received in when he came Bristol, in 1643, to compose a contention between Prince Rupert and the Marquis of Hertford; and we can understand that the grand Norman hall contained within the stone mullioned house, which yet partially exists, would be more interesting to our philanthropist for its associations than even for its venerable architecture. He did no evil to live after him, and the good he did is not interred with his bones. Three societies, founded in his honour, yearly assemble on St. Colston's Day, and celebrate his memory with flowing cups and flowing speech; and at the same time more practically recognise his philanthropic character by the contribution of liberal alms to the poor that are always with us. Up to the end of 1877 these societies have collected at their banquets an aggregate sum of 120,000*l.*

EDMUND BURKE

Certainly one of the most honourable episodes in the history of the city is the election of Edmund Burke as one of its representatives in Parliament. The season was the end of autumn (1774), and during the month the poll was kept open, the great statesman had, of course, an ample opportunity of viewing the remarkable scenery of the neighbourhood, which might have afforded him an illustration for his own "Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful." The acclivitous woods on one side the Avon had lost their green leaves, but the majestic rocks on the Clifton side afforded him an apt illustration when, upon his election, after energetic opposition, and the usual display of temper on either hand, he had the welcome duty to "thank his friends." "As for the trifling petulance," he says, "which the rage of party stirs up in little minds, though it should show itself even in this court (the Guildhall), it has not made the slightest impression on me. The highest flight of such clamorous birds is winged in an inferior region of the air. We hear them, and we look upon them, just as you gentlemen, when you enjoy the serene air on your lofty rocks, look down upon the gulls that skim the mud of your river, when it is exhausted of its tide." Burke, however, did not, on the whole, please his electors. He took a course which offended them on the question of the American War, on subjects relating to the Catholics, &c. His defence on the hustings at Bristol in 1780 of the policy which had dictated the course he had followed on each of these topics, "is one of the most convincing pieces of popular oratory on record." It has been said that it was the warning which Burke's treatment at Bristol held out, to statesmen, that caused Sir Robert Peel to remain contented with representing the borough of Tamworth.

BRISTOL CHINA

Burke was invited to stand for Bristol by Richard Champion, a Quaker, who, besides his association with the eloquent Senator, has a claim to be remembered by the excellence of his china manufacture. Though Bristol china is now more eagerly in request than any other porcelain, it would appear from a local advertisement in 1772 that its earlier reputation was very small. "The manufactory," it is remarked, "is not sufficiently known," and an N.B. is added to the effect that "there is some of the old china which will be sold very cheap." In contrast to this cheapness three fine vases were recently exhibited at the Burlington Fine Arts Club that were valued at 1,000*l.* Some pieces of an elaborately-decorated tea service, which formed part of a complete set presented by Mr. and Mrs. Champion to the wife of Edmund Burke on his being returned member for Bristol, have realised twice their weight in gold. Mr. Burke's country residence was at Beaconsfield. When Lord Beaconsfield (then Mr. Disraeli) was the guest of Mr. Romaine Callender, on the occasion of the Conservative demonstration at Manchester, the teapot used was that of the very set of china just adverted to, and cost Mr. Callender 220*l.*, the like cup and saucer placed before Mr. Disraeli having cost the same owner 90*l.* Champion having carried on the china works at Bristol with apparently not much commercial success during a course of thirteen years, from 1768 to 1781, sold his patent to a company of Staffordshire potters.

TWO PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATES

DISTINGUISHED parliamentary representatives of Bristol can hardly be reckoned in the plural number, particularly in modern days. Sir Samuel Romilly's "Diary of his Parliamentary Life" gives a long narrative of his unsuccessful attempt A.D. 1812 to become one of its two members. He was promised 3,000 votes, which would have ensured success had the promises been kept. His reception was enthusiastic. The people met him on the road, took off the horses from his carriage, and themselves drew him into the city. The streets were thronged, the windows and housetops were crowded with spectators, all the shops were shut, and the shout of welcome was as when great Pompey passed in triumph through the Roman streets. Sir Samuel was fiercely opposed by Cobbett, who in his weekly paper supported the notorious Henry Hunt, the Radical. After seven days' poll it was evident that the Tory candidates would succeed, and Romilly withdrew from the contest. In the following July, Hunt here suffered another defeat that was accompanied by the popular tempest of yells and hisses inevitable to a losing candidate, but he proved not unequal to the uncomplimentary outburst. What Christopher North remarks concerning the excellence of his voice and effrontery was illustrated on the occasion. He would pause, says Kit North, for a moment, until the unanimous clamour of disgust was at its height, and then repitching his note, apparently without an effort, left his "halloo as clear and distinct above the storm as ever ye heard a minster bell tolling over the racket of a village wake." As a peroration to the response with which he encountered the deafening acclaim that now opposed, he rehearsed these lines of Milton:—

> I did but prompt the age to quit their clogs,
> By the known rules of ancient liberty,
> When straight a barbarous noise environed me,
> Of owls and cuckoos, asses, apes, and dogs.

RIOTS OF 1831

THE famous riots of 1831 were of more barbarous character, and resulted from outlets of brutal passion far fiercer than any such harmless creatures as these suggested in the last line of our quotation. No doubt the popular feeling against the Tories for their opposition to the Reform Bill acted as the first incentive to the revolutionary outbreak, but the frenzy of an ignorant mob is stronger than their patriotic feelings. Being unchecked by external authority, the cry of "Reform" was speedily changed to the howl of "Havoc," and the dogs of war were instantly slipped against the rights of property. Had magisterial action been suspended during six days instead of three, all Bristol would have been burnt to ashes. What remained of half of one of the most spacious quadrangles in Europe was a heap of smouldering and dangerous ruins. While women and helpless children, naked, homeless, and terrified, were flying from the dreadful spot where they had so lately enjoyed their own firesides, and while lawless ruffians, madly drunk with the choice wines they had stolen from the richly-stocked cellarage of the Mansion House, were continuing to set fire dwelling after dwelling, the military were restrained from charging the mob, and their commander was shaking hands with the rioters in the delusive hope to conciliate and subdue them by the "power of kindness." Forty-one spacious houses in Queen Square were consumed, besides four toll houses, the Bridewell, the Gaol, and Lawford's Gate Prison, and the Bishop's Palace, the Cathedral itself escaping by the heroism of the verger, who, bold as Cocles, single-handed barred the way of the incendiaries.

BOUNDARIES AND POPULATION

BY the Municipal Act of 1835, the boundaries of Bristol were made to include the adjoining parish of Clifton, the out parishes of St. Paul and St. James, and St. Philip and St. Jacob with parts of the parishes of Bedminster and Westbury-on-Trym, the whole area representing a circuit of 15 miles. The population of Bristol, including the added districts, was in A.D. 1801, 61,153, in A.D. 1871, 182,552.

The Canal known as the New Cut, a channel nearly three miles long, with two capacious basins, the Cumberland and the Bathurst, communicating with the Avon, was commenced in 1804 and completed in 1809. The floating dock covers an area of 82 acres, and the entire work cost 600,000*l.* Steam communication between Bristol and Ireland was established as early as 1826; and to Bristol belongs the honour of being the first port in the kingdom that instituted a regular steam traffic with the United States, the first voyage being performed by the Great Western steamship in 1838. This vessel was built at Bristol at a cost of 60,000*l.*; the Great Britain and the ill-fated Demerara were also cradled here, the former costing 120,000*l.*

DISTINGUISHED NAMES

AMONG the more illustrious of her children Bristol might name the Mediæval scholar Grocyn, the friend of Erasmus, to whom we owe the introduction of the study of the stately language of Homer to the schools of England. To Sebastian Cabot, another native, but of Venetian paternity, is due the fact that Englishmen were the first to colonise and henceforth hold the great North American continent. In William Wyrcestre we have the first home traveller who studied architecture as a science. To the encouragement given by Joseph Cottle, a Bristol bookseller, the earliest literary works of Wordsworth, Southey, and Coleridge were given to the world, which incipient works were first published here. The scientific career of Sir Humphry Davy was commenced in the laboratory of Dr. Beddoes, at Clifton. To the names of Chatterton and Southey as poets should be added that of T. L. Beddoes, author of The Bride's Tragedy, who was the son of Davy's tutor. Mrs. Hannah More should not be forgotten, and to eminent names we might add those of such native artists as Sir Thomas Lawrence and W. J. Müller, also that of the distinguished sculptor, W. H. Bailey. If we might point to well-known living Art critics of Bristol birth we should mention Messrs. J. B. Atkinson, J. A. Symonds, and Frederick Wedmore.

ANCIENT ARCHITECTURE

NOTWITHSTANDING the ruthless spirit of innovation, Bristol can yet show a dozen ancient churches and some considerable remains of monastic and domestic architecture to interest the antiquary. Anglo-Norman work will be found at St. James's Priory Church, at St. Peter's, and at All Saints' Churches, but the most extensive remains are at the Cathedral. The only domestic relic in that style are some arches and pillars of Colston's house now forming part of the Law Library of the New Assize Courts.

We find some beautiful Early English at Redcliff, St. Philip's, and St. Mark's Churches; also at the Cathedral; monastic remains of that period will be found at St. Bartholomew's Priory, Christmas Street, and at the Dominican Priory, Merchant Street. A chamber of the Castle, in Tower Street, is a good specimen of thirteenth century work, and a stout gateway of the old walled town of the same epoch may be seen at the end of St. John's Street.

Decorated work will be discovered at Temple, St. Mark's, and St. Mary Redcliff churches, but most extensively at the Cathedral.

Of Mr. Ruskin's "detested Perpendicular" there are numerous examples, as will appear by our description of individual pieces of architecture.

THE CATHEDRAL

THE Cathedral, even with the newly-added nave, hardly ranks with first-class structures of its kind, but the critic must be difficult to please who does not find its architectural features worthy of careful study. The blackened and heavy buttressed, long and somewhat low exterior rather contrasts than compares with such majestic fabrics as Salisbury or Lincoln, but it should be remembered that Fitzharding, its founder, raised the massive Norman walls of the earlier structure for the services of a monastic church, and that the like purpose was kept in view when the chancel was rebuilt in the fourteenth century.

Though Fitzharding's Norman church was destroyed three centuries ago to give place to a more advanced style of building, there are yet some noble remains of the early monastery. The bold archways of the Great Gatehouse, with their labyrinthine ornamentation, and the rectangular Chapter Room, with its arcaded walls and groined roof, curiously enriched with sculptured mouldings, are the chief of these features, but a diligent inquirer may distinguish many minor relics in the same style. The existing Decorated choir and chancel was built between the years 1306 and 1332 by Abbot Knowle, whose mitred figure lies within a rich canopied tomb in the holiest place of the sanctuary, where "warm gules" fall upon him from the great Eastern window above. The enamelled lights on the east of the north choir aisle are traditionally said to have been presented to the Cathedral by Nell Gwynne. The tradition is at least as old as Horace Walpole, who, in mentioning his visit to the Cathedral in 1776, without hesitation declares them to be her gift. The "Elder Lady Chapel" is so called to distinguish it from another and later chapel to the Virgin Mary at the south-east end of the church, to which the Lady Altar was removed after the rebuilding of the choir. The chapel is a characteristic specimen of pure Early English, and dates about the beginning of the thirteenth century, but the east window and wall, together with the groined roof, are Early Decorated, and belong to the end of the same century. The Berkeley Chapel attached to the east end of the south aisle was founded in 1348 by Thomas Berkeley for the soul of his wife. One of the ogee arches in the vestibule to this chapel has a chimney, which was used in pre-Reformation days for baking the Sacramental wafer. Two of the windows are embellished with ball-flowers. The chapel of the Newtons at the west end of the same aisle belongs to about the same period.

By the obviously symbolical combination of the tracery of the great east window, as well as by the triple compartments of the reredos beneath, we are reminded of the dedication of the Church to the Holy Trinity. The rich stained glass, "like an inestimable treasury of precious stone, and with all its brilliancy as soft as roseleaves," is among the best in England. It dates, according to Mr. Winston, from about the year 1320, but much modern glass has been inserted, which can be easily discerned by the comparative coarseness of tone. The window represents a stem of Jesse. The combinations of arches in the vaulting of the aisles are singularly striking, and the scientific architect can explain that the constructive utility of the arrangement is as useful as the effect is beautiful.

Besides many ornate Gothic tombs of abbots, bishops, and mailed barons, are other memorials that should be considered by the visitor. The tablet to the wife of the poet Mason, with its oft-quoted poetical inscription, "Take, holy earth, all that my soul holds dear," is among these; also the carved mural monument to Sterne's Eliza, who is here buried. Two pieces of sculpture by Chantrey, and an inscription by Southey to the author of the "Analogy," are not likely to be overlooked. Lady Hesketh, the friend of Cowper, lies in the southern transept at the entrance to the aisle, but there is no indication of the spot.

The western towers of the new nave are yet to be erected, so that the full effect of the exterior has yet to be realised. So grand an ecclesiastical work as the entire construction of a cathedral nave has not been effected since Wren built St. Paul's. The present work is a reproduction of the choir. Whether so exact an imitation is a carrying out of the mediæval builder's design may be doubted, but on the whole it was the safest procedure for the modern architect, and the result is an edifice that may now claim to rank architecturally among the Cathedrals of the land—a distinction which it had, previously to the addition of the nave, a difficulty to maintain.

HISTORICAL VISITORS TO THE CATHEDRAL

OF Royal visits to the present Cathedral, or primarily to the Abbey of St. Augustine, we have no complete record. At the period of its first execution, Prince Henry, afterwards King Henry II., was receiving his education in Bristol, and the inscription over the great gateway denotes his interest in the work while in procedure. In a charter he afterwards granted to the abbey he speaks of it as "that which from his early boyhood he had aided and encouraged by benefactions." John, notwithstanding his worldly, fleshly, and devil-like qualities, did good things in his day for the Austin Canons here established. He granted and confirmed to them Leigh, since called Abbot's Leigh; also their liberties and free customs, and that they should be for ever free from toll and passage for ships, boats, and men; and be quit from all exactions belonging to his royalties in the seaports or elsewhere. That John was personally familiar with the "King's Hall" of the monastery which he so benefited can hardly be questioned, seeing that he so frequently visited Bristol. The visit to the Abbey of the martial Edward I. is expressly recorded, and he bestowed upon it many costly gifts, and obliged his retainers also to make oblations. The fierce victor of the field by Tewkesbury came here with his white-rose banner three years after that bloody fight. An MS. Calendar says, "In the year 1474 King Edward the Fourth came to Bristol, and lay at St. Augustine in the Abbey, and got much money by way of benevolence of the townsmen and dwellers near it, to help him with his wars which he had in hand," the king being then on the eve of invading France. Leland gives an account of the reception (A.D. 1486) of another illustrious visitor, him of Bosworth Field, to the Abbey, where he was received with due ceremony by the Abbot and convent. Archbishop Cranmer in 1534 tarried nineteen days in Bristol, preaching, we are told, in St. Austin's Abbey and other churches. In Nichol's "Royal Progresses" there is a detailed relation of the celebration of the visit of the Virgin Queen to Bristol in 1574. The old order had long been changed, yielding place to new. Her Majesty attended the College, as it was still called, to hear a sermon and a hymn, the latter being sung "by a very fine boy." Scarcely more inspired than this hymn, which is given in the "Progresses," was the poetry of Robert Naile, a Bristol apprentice, who undertook to describe in numbers the ceremony of Anne of Denmark's coming to the same sanctuary in the year 1613. He tells us that Her Gracious Majesty,

> Mounted like fair Cynthia bright into her sumptuous coach,
> Drawn by four milk-white coursers brave, and next her did approach
> The ladies on their trampling steeds, like fair Diana's train, > Hunting in the Arcadian woods, as do the poets fain, which seems to show that Ovid was familiar to Bristol apprentices, or, at least, to Robert Naile. Charles I., with Prince Charles and the Duke of York, might have been seen here on Sunday, August 6, 1643, attended by his body guard, heralds, and pursuivants in their gorgeous tabards, in company with the mayor and aldermen in their scarlet robes, soon after which royal visit his good old church was turned into a brewhouse, and the Bishop's palace into a malthouse and mill. It afterwards became a Dissenting preaching-house, till the King had his own again, when the preacher was silenced. We are not aware that any English sovereign has visited this Cathedral, at least ceremonially, since the Sunday that Charles I. here attended Divine service. It is curious that kings and queens were more plentiful in Bristol centuries before railways had connected the "second city in England" with the first than they are at the present time.

ST. AUGUSTINE'S CHURCH

ST. AUGUSTINE'S CHURCH, at the east of the Cathedral, was originally built by the canons of the adjacent monastery to serve as a chapel for the inhabitants of the district. The earliest mention is in A.D. 1240, but the present edifice dates from 1480. The whole of the church, except modern pinnacles and other restorations, is of the Perpendicular style. In the register there is an entry of the baptism (March 20th, 1687) of a daughter of Bishop Trelawny, one of the famous "seven," by Thomas Ken, Bishop of Bath and Wells, another of the seven, who is not less favourably known as the author of the "Morning and Evening Hymns."

THE MAYOR'S CHAPEL

ST. MARK'S CHURCH, or the Mayor's Chapel, in College Green, is embedded among houses; but will attract notice by its large western window, filled with tracery of a mixed style of Decorated and Perpendicular. It was originally the chapel of the Hospital of Bonhommes, of which Order there were two other houses in England. St. Mark's Hospital was founded by Robert de Berkeley, the second Lord of Berkeley, and finished by Maurice de Gaunt, his son, who died in 1230. The house was placed under the control of the Canons of St. Augustine's Monastery, and was ordained for the maintenance of a chaplain and the daily relief of one hundred poor; but twelve scholars were afterwards admitted on the foundation. These wore a red shield on their habit during the year of probation, to which a white cross was afterwards added. The house was dissolved in 1534, and in 1540 the estate was granted from the Crown to the Mayor and Burgesses of Bristol for public uses. The chapel has undergone much renovation, particularly in its interior arrangements. It is undivided by pillars, and but for its ecclesiastical fittings would present the effect of a long and lofty Gothic hall. But the interior view is very impressive. The panelled and gilded oak roof, rich fretwork stalls of dark oak, carved tabernacle work, the canopied altar tombs with their sculptured effigies, and the sombre illumination derived from the traceried windows, glowing with imagery of saints and martyrs, fill the mind with a kind of æsthetic awe of even more intense character than usually belongs to a mediæval church.

ST. MARY REDCLIFF

IN St. Mary Redcliff—the rose and flower of parish churches—the Third Pointed or Perpendicular style of architecture is seen in its highest realised perfection. In completeness of parts, grandeur of proportion, and finish of detail, the building partakes of the character of a cathedral church. The exuberantly carved porches, particularly the famous northern entrance, the panelled walls, flying buttresses, trefoiled parapet and mural pinnacles, the storeys of windows with their elegant tracery, the magnificent tower and spire, triple-aisled transepts, long and lofty nave and chancel, tall clustered columns and graceful arches, groined roof embossed with literally more than a thousand sculptured devices, of which no two are alike, together with the Lady Chapel and undercroft, are attributes that entitle the edifice to rank architecturally with at least the lesser cathedrals of England. Why the magnitude and beauty of the structure did not cause it, instead of the neighbouring house of Austin Canons, to be raised to the dignity of a cathedral, to which William Wyrcester (1450) likens it, is answered by Fuller, who says "that the church was not sufficiently accommodated, like St. Augustine's, with public buildings about it for the palace of a dean or chapter." The same quaint historian characteristically adds that "as the town of Hague in Holland would never be built about, as accounting it more credit to be the biggest of villages in Europe than a lesser city, so Redcliff Church esteemeth it a greater grace to lead the van of all parochial, than to follow in the rear after many cathedral, churches in England."

The origin of the church is obscure, but a Saturday Reviewer, in an article entitled "St. Mary Redcliff" (Nov. 10, 1877), no doubt correctly assigns its original erection to the Barons of Berkeley, who, in the thirteenth century, held the Manor of Redcliff. These lords were among the greatest church builders of the Middle Ages, their arms being, according to the historian of the family, emblazoned in the windows of as many as one hundred parish churches and oratories, which they more or less erected or endowed. In the fifth year of Edward III., the Berkeleys having fallen into disgrace, the Manor of Redcliff was confiscated into the King's hands, and there is evidence that the church then existing had become so ruinous as to necessitate reconstruction. The city chronicles assign the honour o rebuilding the fabric to Simon de Burton, who filled the office of Mayor of Bristol five times between the year 1291 and 1304, a period when the authority of the Berkeleys was paralysed.

About the year 1445 there occurred a terrible storm, in which the spire of Redcliff was struck down by lightning, and, falling upon the body of the fabric, reduced the church almost to ruin. The work of reconstruction was effected by the later William Canynge, and with what success the present superb edifice shows. The restoration of the church, which has included the re-erection of the spire, is now complete, and may be pronounced one of the most successful works of its kind. It has cost 40,000*l.* Included in this sum is 2,500*l.* for re-sculpturing the north porch, which was effected by the liberality of the late Mr. Alderman Proctor, who was a worthy successor to Canynge.

TEMPLE CHURCH

Temple Church, with its leaning tower, nearly five feet out of the perpendicular, retains no structural connection with the Knight Templars, but undoubtedly occupies the site of a small church which belonged to these martial monks. No portion of the present building is of more remote antiquity than the beginning of the fourteenth century, to which date is to be referred the north, or Weavers' Chapel, and a portion of the chancel. With these exceptions the church, which consists of a nave divided from the aisle by light clustered columns, of quatrefoil section, is a good specimen of the Perpendicular style of architecture. On viewing the interior it will be regretted that the cold crystal daylight which illumines the aisles should have superseded the sombre religious hues obtained through the stained glass which once filled the traceried windows, and was destroyed in the Commonwealth wars.

St. Catherine's Chapel was on the site of the present vestry. It was anciently ordained that on the vigil of St. Catherine, the Mayor and Sheriff and their brethren were "to walk to Saint Catherine's Chapel, within Temple Church, there to hear their evensong; and from evensong to walk unto the Katherine Hall, there to be worshipfully received of the wardens and brethren of the same; and in the hall there to have their fires, and their drinkings, with spiced cake-bread and sundry wines; the cups merrily filled about the house. And then to depart every man home; the Mayor, Sheriff, and the worshipful men ready to receive at their doors Saint Katherine's Players, making them to drink at their doors, and rewarding them for their plays. And on the morrow, Saint Katherine's Day, the Mayor, Sheriff, and their brethren to be at the Temple Church, and from thence to walk with the procession about the town, and return to the said Temple Church, and there to hear mass and offer. And then every man retray home."

In the south wall of the Guild of Weavers' chantry may be discerned a blocked-up doorway, that once communicated with the high altar. Through this opening one Richard Sharp, a weaver, in the days of Mary, suddenly interrupted the elevation of the host, proclaiming the act to be idolatry, whereupon he was seized and finally condemned for the act, and burnt upon St. Michael's Hill, where now stands Highbury Chapel.

ST. THOMAS'S CHURCH

The architectural interest of St. Thomas's Church is soon despatched. The only portion of the ancient structure remaining is the mutilated tower, the roof of the belfry of which shows internally some ribs and elaborate bosses the Early English style, but externally the buttresses and windows are of the Perpendicular period. The existing church was completed in 1793, a date that of itself assures us that the character of the architecture does not deserve much attention.

ST. NICHOLAS CHURCH

BEYOND Bristol Bridge is conspicuous by its spire, 205 feet high. It is the third building on the same site, and was erected in 1768. The crypt, formerly the Chapel of the Guild of the Holy Ghost, dates about the year 1503, and it is a remarkably fine example of its kind. It consists of two aisles, divided by five clustered pillars, from which spring the ribs of the vaulting, that have boldly carved bosses at the intersections. The present crypt or crowd was a kind of secondary church, the superstructure being called in the old wardens' books "the high church." It had its own procurators or wardens distinct from the church above, being also separately endowed. In 1528 Bishop Latimer preached one of his stirring sermons in the old church; and soon after, George Wishart, the Scottish martyr, made no less excitement by setting forth similar "heretical" doctrines. Being accused and convicted, he was sentenced to bear a faggot in the same church, and also in Christ Church, where probably he also preached, which penance he duly performed on 13th July, 1539.

ST. MARY LE PORT CHURCH

REACHING the middle of High Street we turn to the right into St. Maryport Street, and glance at its quaint overhanging timber-framed dwellings and old church imbedded among them. This church is dedicated to Our Lady of the Port, there having been formerly an open approach from the river to the south side of the sacred building, and therefore was much used by sailors. It consists of two aisles of unequal breadth, the columns dividing which are of Perpendicular date, assignable to the fifteenth century. The tower is of the Florid style, like the interior, and is 72 feet in height. The edifice has been recently restored, and a new font given by Colonel J. R. Bramble. The great brass eagle formerly belonged to the Cathedral.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH

ST. PETER'S CHURCH stood outside the barbican of the Castle, and was used by the inmates of the fortress. The tower in its first stages is a Norman structure, very massive, the walls of the belfry being six feet in thickness. It is a rectory, and was granted by Robert Fitzhamon to the Abbey of Tewkesbury, which grant was confirmed by a Charter of Henry I. dated 1106. During the Rebellion it narrowly escaped the fate of its huge military neighbour, inasmuch that Colonel Fiennes, in 1643, had given orders for the demolition of the churches of St. Peter's and St. Philip's on account of their proximity to the castle, but the appearance of Prince Rupert with 20,000 men before the city prevented the mischievous design. At the east end of the south aisle was a chauntry dedicated to the honour of the "Blessed Mary of Bellhouse," whose shrine was here visited by Wolsey's victim, the great Duke of Buckingham.

In the south wall of the church is attached a label with the name of Richard Savage, the story of whose life is so pathetically told in Johnson's "Lives of the Poets." Savage died a debtor in Newgate, Bristol. During his imprisonment, which was not rigorous, he wrote a satire on the merchants of Bristol, which might be characterised by the adjective his name expresses. He died of a fever on the 1st of August, 1743, in his forty-sixth year, and was interred at the expense of his gaoler, assisted by some contributions from Lady Huntingdon.

CHRIST CHURCH

Christ Church, at the angle formed by the junction of Wine Street and Broad Street, replaces one of the ancient churches which surrounded the High Cross in the centre of the city. It is built of freestone, and any attempt at exterior ornamentation has been expended on the western end and the tower, the rest being enclosed by houses, and rudely finished. The style is nominally Grecian, with variation in accordance with modern exigencies and taste. There being no classical prototype to guide the construction of an ecclesiastical interior, the present is divided in the manner of a Gothic edifice into three aisles. "I remember the old church," says Southey, who was born and spent his boyhood almost under its shadow, "a row of little shops was built before it, above which its windows received light, and on the leads which roofed them crowds used to stand at the chairing of members, as they did to my remembrance when peace was proclaimed after the American War. I was christened in that old church, and vividly remember our pew under the organ —— was then rector, a humdrum somnificator, who, God rest his soul for it I made my poor mother stay at home Sunday evenings because she could not stay awake after dinner to hear him. There were quarter boys to this old church clock, as to St. Dunstan, and I have many a time stopped with a satchel on my back to see them strike." Relative to this quarter-boy clock, there is an entry in the Proctor's Book A.D. 1575 of payment to "the clerke for singing and dressing the Rolodge agaynst the Queen's Majesty's comyng," meaning Queen Elizabeth. There are few monuments of general interest in this church. The principal is, perhaps, a tablet to the memory of Dr. Standfast, who was sequestrated in the civil war for his adherence to the King. At one time he escaped his Parliamentary pursuers at Thornbury by putting on the habit of a thatcher, and pretending to be busy in mending the roof of a house at that place. His living was given to one Evans a tailor, and he himself imprisoned in Bristol Castle "for his disaffection to the Parliament of England and their proceedings, which in his printing, praying and preaching he had expressed." The metrical portion of the following epitaph might have a place in some "quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore." "Here lyeth Thomas Turner and Mary his wife. He was twice master of the Company of Bakers, and twice Churchwarden of this parish. He died March 6, 1654. She died March 8th, 1643.

Like to a baker's oven is the grave
Wherein the bodyes of the faithful have
A setting in, and where they do remain,
In hopes to rise and to be drawn again.
Blessed are they who in the Lord are dead,
Though set like dough, they shall be drawn like bread.

ST. PHILIP AND JACOB'S CHURCH

The Church of St. Philip and Jacob is the furthest of the old churches eastward. It was primarily a chapel to a religious house of the Order of St. Benedict which stood at the chancel end of the present building. The tower, except the upper stage, which is debased Perpendicular, is a beautiful piece of Early English, having two collateral lancet windows, with bold mouldings on each of the four sides. A deeply-recessed, boldly cut arch of the same (thirteenth century) date, opens from the base of the tower into the church; and a corresponding arch divides the north aisle of the church from the nave aisle. The nave is separated from the aisles by three arches of very broad span, which are sustained by massive piers, having no capital or base, the mouldings springing direct from the ground and round the soffit of each arch. The Kemys Chapel belonged to a family of that name, and is divided from the chancel by panelled arches of the time of Henry VII. Inside one of the piers is a stone staircase which communicated with the rood-loft. Some remains of steps in another pier belonged to a stone pulpit; and in the pier adjoining is an aumbry for Eucharistic vessels. Recent investigations of the piers have led to the discovery that they form a superadded casing to the remains of a beautifully-proportioned Early English church which occupied the area of the present chancel. In the external north wall of the chancel may be seen traces of a thirteenth-century window and doorway. The roof of the nave is an excellent specimen of a timber roof of the time of Richard II. Some corbels which supported the old roofs of the aisles jut from the walls. The font is Norman.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH

The Church of St. John the Baptist belongs to the fifteenth century. The belfry tower and spire are erected over the northern gateway of the old walled city, and having formed part of the line of the inner wall, the church has no transept, or projecting porch, being a simple oblong, pierced by eight Perpendicular windows on each side. It has also no east nor west window. The roof, of open timber work, is of fifteenth-century construction. The richly-carved communion table is, no doubt, identical with the one charged in the accounts under A.D. 1635. The crypt is of more interest than the church, and is a characteristically good specimen of such a substructure. It is lighted by a range of low windows on the north side, where is also a door from the street. It has a groined vault, the mouldings of which spring from clustered mural columns. The apex of the roof is eleven feet from the floor. The date of the crypt seems architecturally to correspond with the superstructure. It formerly served as a chapel for a religious guild, which was established in 1465 in honour of the Holy Rood, or St. John the Baptist and St. Martin. The Proctors' Book among the Vestry archives contains the names of the originators of the Guild with the ordinances of the foundation. This book is of unusual interest. It begins in 1472. The Proctors, who were wealthy merchants, candidly confess at the outset that they do not understand "the cunning of writing," and therefore engage a professional scribe at the payment of a shilling a year to keep the accounts. Sir John Masty, the Vicar of St. John's in 1535, received for a "whole year's wages" only 6*l.*, "Nicholas, our clerke," receiving 2*l.* The wages of a mason at that time were 8*d.* a day, or 10*l.* 8*s.* a year, more than Sir John and his clerk together received for their year's work, and after the Reformation even this 6*l.* was reduced to 5*l.* The weather-beaten statues on either side of St. John's Gate are accounted to represent Brennus and Belinus, the legendary founders of Bristol. As far back as A.D. 1366 the name of Bristol was derived from Brennus. King Henry VII. was met at this gate—ad portam sancti Johanni—by a pageant of "many mayden children, richly besene with girdells, beads, and oncheus, wher Justicia had the wordes that hereafter ensueth."

ALL SAINTS' CHURCH

All Saints' Church with its Italian campanile gives externally little promise of antiquity. Within, however, will be found at the western end of the nave four cylindrical piers which are of Norman date, and belong to a structure that in A.D. 1216 was assigned to the use of the Guild of Calendars. These were a fraternity of religious and laity, to whom was committed the custody of the archives of the town, and whose office it was to keep a register of events and public acts. They were also a guild of literature, and their library was the only public one in the town. Every festival day free access was granted to all who were willing to enter for the sake of instruction; and the Prior, if duly required, was to explain to the best of his knowledge doubtful and obscure passages of Scripture to all who asked him, and read a public lecture every week in the same library. Each book was secured by a chain, and three inventories of the whole collection were kept, one each by the mayor and dean for the time being, and the third by the prior and librarian. By an ancient ordinance it was appointed that upon All Halloween Day the Mayor and the Sheriff of Bristowe were after dinner to assemble with the whole Council at the Tolsey, "with many other gentils and worshipfull comeners, such as apperith there at that tyme, and fro thence to walk all in fere unto the Maire's place, there to have their fyres and their drynkyns with spiced cakebrede and sondry wynes, the cuppes merilly serving aboute the house; and then fro thence avery man departing unto his parish church to evensong." Even till the eighteenth century the ecclesiastical ceremonialism that hedged a Mayor was such as to try Puritanic feeling. On All Saints' Day he was required to attend, in scarlet costume, All Saints' Church, with the pearl sword and cap of maintenance carried before him; on St. Stephen's Day the church of that saint; on the first Sunday after St. James's Day, St. James's Church; on Ascension Day the Temple; at Pentecost, Redcliff; and other churches at other festivals; but the sword was not carried on Christmas Day, Whitsun Eve, Ash Wednesday, or Mid-Lent Sunday. A relic of the custom is yet maintained by the visit of the Mayor, be he Churchman or Nonconformist, in full civic costume to Redcliff Church. On this occasion the church is decorated and strewed with flowers and rushes.

Among the relics of the Calendars were the candlestick and skull, or rather "one of the skulls," of St. Thomas a'Becket.

The oldest remaining portion of the edifice are the four short circular pillars at the western end of the middle aisle. These sustain the houses that extend over the extremity of the aisle, and are curiously incorporated with the church. The house on the south was the vicarage, and originally built about the year 1422; it substantially yet remains. The library was over the north aisle, but the structure has been rebuilt. A few of the old black-letter books are preserved in the vestry. The most conspicuous monument in the church is one by Rysback to the memory of Edward Colston, who lies interred under the Communion Table. On every Sunday a nosegay of such flowers as the season affords is placed on his half-recumbent effigy, money having been left for the purpose.

ST. STEPHEN'S CHURCH

St. Stephen's Church, with its stately tower, might alone give ecclesiastical character to Bristol. The body of the present structure belongs to the latter half of the fifteenth century, and was built at the joint expense of the parishioners and the Abbot of Glastonbury. The tower, with its latticed pinnacles and battlements, was built at the sole expense of John Shipward, Mayor of Bristol, in 1455. He is buried within the walls of the church, and this magnificent trophy over his urn, like Absalom's pillar in the king's dale, reared up in his lifetime is worthy to commemorate a prince, and these old merchants were princes. It is 133 feet in height, and is confessed to be one of the handsomest parish steeples in England. "This tower," says Mr. Freeman, "is remarkable for having æsthetically dispensed with buttresses, those which it has having so slight a projection as hardly at all to influence the general effect. It has, indeed, almost the appearance of a Gothic version of the old Italian campanile. However this may be, its idea, which is one quite peculiar to itself, though it may not altogether approve itself to our preconceived notions must be allowed to be, in point of fact, magnificently worked out." The absence of buttresses seems to rank this with Mr. Ruskin's ideal class of towers, in all of which he requires it to be a "point of chief necessity, that they shall seem to stand, and verily shall stand, in their own strength, not by help of buttresses nor artful balancings on this side or on that. Your noble tower must need no help, must be sustained by no crutches, must give place to no suspicion of decrepitude. Its office must be to withstand war, look forth for tidings, or to point to Heaven; but it must have in its own walls strength to do this; it is to be in itself a bulwark, not to be sustained by other bulwarks; to rise and look forth, 'the towers of Lebanon that looketh towards Damascus,' like a stern sentinel, not like a child held up in its nurse's arms," &c. When the late Prince Consort visited Bristol, and came within full view of St. Stephen's tower, he was observed to impulsively raise his hat in homage to its majesty. The south porch is roofed with elaborate fan tracery, and for general beauty is worthy of the rest of the structure.

By will dated 25th May, 1398, John Wyett, Mayor in 1398, bequeathed "to the Church of St. Stephen, one ring, in which was set a stone, part of the very pillar to which Christ was bound at the scourging, to be kept among the relics for ever."

ST. JAMES'S CHURCH

The western façade of St. James's Church is the only accessible portion of the exterior by which its original Norman character may be discerned. It is recorded that the powerful Robert, Earl of Gloucester (A.D. 1140) devoted one-tenth of the stones which he had imported from Normandy for the construction of his castle to the building of the Benedictine Priory, of the church of which this façade and the existing nave were a portion. The monastic buildings have disappeared, and with these the chancel of the church, which having belonged to the monks, while the nave was parochial, fell a sacrifice at the dissolution to the spoiler. The massive Norman piers with their cushioned capitals, and the semicircular arches by which they are connected are part of the structure that formed the last resting-place of the feudal chieftain who founded the monastery; and in viewing them we cannot but picture to ourselves the black-robed prior and cowled brethren conducting the hallowed rites over his remains with dirges, psalms, and knells, uplifted crucifixes, waving censers, and flaming torches. Two or three years since, a workman, digging within the precincts of the former chancel, and upon or near the spot answering to that of the interment of Robert, Earl of Gloucester, came upon what he interpreted to be the skeleton of a monk. Viewing these mortal relics in the light of so much money, or rather so much drink, he converted them first into one, and then into the other, and in the latter form swallowed whole the so-called ancient monk; but who, indeed, was possibly the illustrious Gloucester himself. The Priory of St. James stood outside the walls of the town, northwards from the Castle, the towers and bastions of which rose grandly before the eyes of the monks just beyond the limits of their green meadows. The conventual buildings presented an extensive and imposing assemblage.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH

St. Michael's Church, like most or all churches dedicated to that saint, stands on an eminence. The tower belongs to the fifteenth century, and is the only portion that now stands of the old church. According to a custom instituted in 1376 it was usual on Michaelmas Day for the whole Town Council, after they had dined, to assemble at the High Cross, and "from thence the new Mayor, with all the whole company, to walk honorably to St. Michael's Church, and there to offer, and then to return to the new Mayor's house, every man taking his leave of the Mayor, and to return home to their evensong." The present church was opened in 1777, and the design is one of the worst specimens in the most degraded age of Gothic architecture.

MONASTIC REMAINS

NEAR St. Michael's Church, on the site of the King David Inn, stood the Nunnery of St. Mary Magdalen. It was founded in 1173 by Eva, wife of Robert Fitzharding, who herself was the first prioress. There are a few inconsiderable conventual remains of the Perpendicular period, in the form of a winding staircase and two or three doorways which are incorporated in the present inn. The inn also includes a spacious room with a Jacobean ceiling.

The important remains of the old Dominican Priory in Rosemary Street are so hedged round by mean houses that a person might pass daily all his lifetime within forty yards of their site without suspicion that any such remains exist. If, however, his curiosity had induced him to thread the dirty avenue known as Quakers' Friars, intersecting Merchant Street towards the south-west end, he might have come upon a quadrangular enclosure of which three sides are comprised more or less of offices that belonged to the house of the Dominican or Black Friars. Just without the moat of the Castle, and almost within speaking distance of "the warders on the turrets high," whose forms they must hourly have seen in ordered march, the Friars Preachers here spent three centuries in the practice and endurance of their peculiar routine and discipline. The convent was founded by Maurice Gaunt, lord of Beverstone Castle, who died in 1230, and was here buried. On the first and third Sundays in Advent, it was customary for the Mayor and Sheriff with their "brethern" to walk to the Friars Preachers, and there hear "theire sermonde." A Lenten discourse, in 1534, by Bishop Latimer appears to have caused more excitement than any that had been hitherto preached, and proved the beginning of the end of the existence of the fraternity.

The last Prior of his house was William Oliver, who in 1537, when the depositions were taken by the Royal Commission at Bristol, was stated "to be sound on Justification," in evidence of which he collected "a cartload of cowls and other trinkets to burn." A unique relic possessed by the convent was a piece of white marble containing the last imprint upon earth of our Lord's foot. This relic the friars, by the hand of Robert of Gloucester (author of the metrical chronicle) presented to King Henry III., who placed it in Westminster Abbey, where it was long venerated.

The Friends' Meeting House was built in 1669 on part of the site of the monastic buildings. In the same year George Fox, the founder of the Quakers, was married within its walls. In 1697 the no less famous Friend and founder (of Pennsylvania) William Penn, came to Bristol, and here resided, during which period he is presumed to have arranged the buildings of the adjacent streets, which still bear the names of Philadelphia, Penn, Hollister, and Callowhill Streets. Hannah Callowhill, the mother of Hannah Penn, was a daughter of Dennis Hollister, from whom was purchased the ground on which these streets are erected.

Of the Franciscan or Grey Friars, which stood on the site of the Unitarian Chapel, in Lewin's Mead, no remains are visible.

Of St. Bartholomew's Hospital in Christmas Street there is a remarkable Early English porch that formed the original entrance of this convent. It consists of an outer and inner arch, connected by an arcade. On one side of the exterior is a mutilated figure of the Virgin and Child. The whole is in a decayed and neglected state, and unless some antiquarian zeal can be directed to its preservation, the place that has known it for more than six centuries will shortly know it no more. A deed dated 1386 shows the patronage of the hospital to have been vested in Lord de la Warr, but of the origin of the house there seems to be no particulars. It was anciently the custom on St. Clement's Eve for the Mayor and Councilmen "to walk to St. Clement's Chapel within the Bartholomews, there to hear their evensong, and on the morrow their mass, and to offer there." The house was purchased at the Dissolution for the provision of a free Grammar School, which continued here till 1769, when the scholars were removed to Unity Street, when it became the premises of the school then and since known as St. Elizabeth's Hospital. Under the date 1574 there is a charge for the erection of a scaffold "in front of the hospital in Christmas Street," for the boys to stand on, and sing and cheer Queen Bess as she passed through the street towards the Cathedral.

At the top of Christmas Street steps is the little chapel of the Three Kings of Cologne, founded in 1504 by John Foster, who had been Mayor of Bristol. By an ordination of Foster's will, a priest was to say mass daily during twelve years ensuing upon the founder's death, for his soul and the souls of his relations. The connected almshouse, which stands in a neat quadrangle, is for twenty-four poor, who receive 6*s.* a week. The almost obliterated inscription over the Sedilia, or cavities attached to the east end of the chapel is to the effect that Christmas Street Steps, otherwise Queen Street, were constructed or renewed in 1669. At a house on the steps Lambert the attorney, at the time Chatterton was first articled to him, had his offices, but the particular house is not known.

THE STREETS

WITH the gradual disappearance of numberless picturesque old buildings, there has of course been a loss of many interesting memories connecting them with remarkable persons or events. But much happily remains to awaken literary and historical associations, as well as to recall the charm of mediæval days, when every street and every house seemed primarily intended to be a study for the painter.

On entering the city from the railway terminus the visitor sees before him the fine spire of St. Mary Redcliff, of which building we have already treated. At the north-east end of the church is Pile Street Free School, a low freestone structure, where Chatterton received his infant education. This is about to be destroyed. At 13, Hill's Bridge Parade, facing the New Cut, was born (28th June, 1812) W. J. Muller, who found, like Chatterton, an early inspiration for his genius in Redcliff Church close at hand, which he delighted to picture.

The Shot Tower, opposite the west end of the church just named, was the earliest erected for the purpose of making patent shot. The patent is dated 1782, and was granted to William Watts, plumber, of Bristol, who first conceived in a dream the method since employed of causing molten lead to descend through a perforated frame from a great height into water, in which, having suddenly congealed, the particles are found in a truly spherical shape. The experiment was first tried through a kitchen colander. Close to the Shot Tower is Jones', or properly, St. John's Lane, leading to the cemetery of the early Quakers, which is enclosed on the south side by the red rock that gives name to the locality. Excavated in the base of this cliff is a picturesque Hermitage that was founded by Thomas, eighth Lord Berkeley, in 1346, with a Pointed doorway of that period. The name of the recluse who first occupied the cell was John Sparkes, but his biography seems never to have been handed down. In some "pent-up rooms on Redcliff Hill" Coleridge finished for the press the first volume of his poems. In Redcliff Street, the house of chief antiquarian interest is that known as Canyng's, now occupied by Mr. C. T. Jefferies, bookseller. It was built about the middle of the fifteenth century by William Canynge, the re-builder of Redcliff Church, and was a residence with a chapel incorporated. The exterior has been rebuilt. The chief remains are a Perpendicular hall, with a high-pitched ornamental roof, with a louvre in the centre.

OLD BRISTOL BRIDGE

IN one of the overhanging, gabled, picturesque houses, that once lined the sides of Old Bristol Bridge, was born, in 1546, Tobias Matthews, Bishop of Durham, and afterwards Archbishop of York. Among the 1,992 original sermons which he preached during his lifetime was one before James VI. of Scotland, whom he met at Berwick-on-Tweed, on his way to occupy the throne of Queen Bess. Archbishop Matthews' "misery of miseries" was his three sons, one of whom he says had grace without wit, another wit without grace, and the third was witless, thriftless, and graceless. Also on Old Bristol Bridge was born (A.D. 1613) Dr. William Thomas, Bishop of Worcester, whose father, like Matthews', here kept a linendraper's shop. He was a man of unblemished piety, was always, while his health lasted, at Cathedral service at six o'clock in the morning, and was never known to have been in a passion. When Dean of Worcester, one of his Prebendaries in chapter "fell into a sudden and violent commotion" upon no great provocation, which made the Dean say to him, "Brother, brother, God give you more patience." To which the angry gentleman replied, "Mr. Dean, Mr. Dean, God give you more passion." On the Eve of St. Bartholomew, 1687, he entertained James II. at his Palace at Worcester, and attended him over the Cathedral; the style of service maintained in which did not appear to meet His Majesty's taste, for next morning he went to hear mass at the Papists' chapel. To the gate of the chapel the Mayor and Aldermen accompanied him; and when the King invited them to go in with him, the Mayor replied, "I think we have attended your Majesty too far already." Accordingly the Mayor with his Protestant party went instead to the Cathedral. When Divine Service was ended the Bishop again waited on His Majesty till dinner came in. He then offered to say grace; but the King was pleased to say he would spare him that trouble, for he had a chaplain of his own; upon which we are told, "the good old man withdrew, not without tears in his eyes."

THE HIGH CROSS

THE curious old pargetted house, where High Street turns into Wine Street, is said to have been brought in pieces from Amsterdam and here set up. There is a grotesque bracket in the tower storey, within the shop window, bearing the date 1676. Close by stood the High Cross, at the point where the four streets centralise—a sanguinary spot, for here were beheaded (July 29th, 1398,) Scroope, Earl of Worcester, Sir John Bushey, Speaker in Parliament, and Sir Henry Green, the pernicious councillors of Richard II., Bolingbroke himself, then at Bristol, ordering them to execution. In the 3rd Act of Richard II. Shakespeare has delineated the tragic procedure. At the same spot soon after was decapitated Thomas de Spenser, Duke of Gloucester, for conspiring against Henry IV. The shop of Mr. Hayward, bookseller, at the corner of Corn Street, stands on the site of the house where Joseph Cottle carried on the business of a publisher. He had not only the distinction of being satirised by Lord Byron and in the Anti-Jacobin, but the more unquestionable honour of being accoucheur to the press of the first publications of Southey, Coleridge, and Wordsworth, who sometimes met in his parlour behind the shop, and held conversation such as we may fancy the "buried ghosts" of the talkers at the "Mermaid" might have envied.

PICKWICK AT BRISTOL

IN Corn Street is the Council House, a building of no architectural pretensions, but contains some historical portraits—Charles I. by Vandyke, and the Earl of Pembroke by the same; James II. by Sir Godfrey Kneller; Lord Ashburton, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and the Duke of Portland by Sir Thomas Lawrence. There is also a good portrait of Edmund Burke.

The West of England Bank, a building with an exuberantly sculptured frontage, stands on the site of "The Bush," in the old coaching day an inn of first importance. It was at "The Bush" that Mr. Winkle took up his quarters in his love-lorn quest of the missing Arabella Allen, who was surmised to be hidden somewhere in Bristol or its neighbourhood. It will be recollected how Winkle walked forth to view the city, its quays, ships, cathedral, &c., and how, having lost his way, he stepped into "something between a shop and a private house," over the door of which a red lamp was suspended, declaring the residence of a medical practitioner, and how, on inquiring of the professioner within, who wore green spectacles, was suddenly embraced by his old friend, Bob Sawyer, who had here set up as a "sawbones." The subsequent arrival of the vindictive and sanguinary Dowler, and the hilarious Sam Weller and Mr. Pickwick himself; with the unwearying efforts of Sam to discover traces of the lost love of Winkle; of his meditative rest on a large stone by the wayside, and revolving a plan for knocking at all the doors within five miles of Bristol, at a hundred and fifty or two hundred a day, and endeavouring to find Miss Arabella by that expedient, and the opportune appearance from a back door just at hand of Sam's own Valentine, the pretty housemaid from Mr. Nupkins, who, after sympathetic heed to a rehearsal of her lover's feeling towards herself, and having commiserated his walking about like the Wandering Jew, tells him her own knowledge of where the desiderated lady was to be found; all this and much more on the point is familiar to all students of the "Pickwick Papers." The tables of the money-changers in the sumptuous temple of Plutus, and the drawing of cheques in lieu of corks, serve little to recall the quondam hostelry that brought > all good things,

> Rest to the weary, to the hungry cheer.

THE TOLSEY

AGAINST All Saints' Church in Corn Street was formerly a covered colonnade known as The Tolsey, where merchants formerly transacted their business. The fame of the Tolsey was known to Sir Walter Scott, and in "The Pirate" the captain of the Good Hope of Bristol tells Mordaunt of the fine luck his vessel had on the Spanish main, both with commerce and privateering, and adds, "My name is Clement Cleveland, captain and part owner as I said before. I am a Bristol man born—my father was well known on the Tolsell—old Clem Cleveland of the College Green." (Chapter VIII.) The ponderous brazen pillars in front of the Exchange formerly belonged to the Tolsey. They were used by the merchants there assembling for making payments, writing letters, &c., and from their form were sometimes called "nails," which is said to have given origin to the frequent phrase, "pay down on the nail." If the pillars did not originate the saying they might well have done so. One is inscribed "Nicholas Crisp of London gave me to this honourable city in remembrance of God's mercy in Anno 1625." Another is of the same date, the third 1594, and the fourth, believed to be the oldest, has no inscription.

The Exchange, designed by Wood, was built in 1740. The street front is of the Corinthian order; the interior is a splendid quadrangle with colonnades, now roofed over with glass. The corn market is on Thursday.

ST. WERBURGH'S CHURCH

ONE of the finest of our old English street views has been lost by the recent destruction of St. Werburgh's Church in Corn Street, which is to be superseded by a bank. Here we may mention the curious identity which a Saturday Reviewer points out between the names of the churches of Dublin and those of Bristol. "The coincidence," says that writer, "might seem an accidental one, but the case is really one of cause and effect. Henry II., in his youth, received his education at the chief city of the West, and in after life showed his grateful recollection of the place by bestowing upon the burghers, among other gifts and privileges, the town of Dublin to possess and inhabit as freely and peaceably as their own English home. In the process of colonisation the parent city became the type of the adopted one, and in this way the parish churches of Sts. Peter, Werburgh, Andrew, Nicholas, Michael, John the Baptist, Stephen, and All Hallows at Bristol, were repeated in the Irish capital, St. Werburgh's being the mother church of the latter, the earlier fabric of which was burnt down in 1301. With the exception of St. Andrew's" (and we may now add St. Werburgh's) "these ancient structures are still in existence at Bristol."

SMALL STREET

SMALL STREET has to a great extent become modernised by the destruction of ancient houses to provide sites for the new Post Office, in what a writer in the Builder calls a "threadbare classic design," and the New Assize Courts in Tudor Gothic. The latter buildings are erected on the site of Colston's house, and incorporate some relics of the most ancient domestic architecture in Bristol. These remains are of the twelfth century, and may be found in the Law Library. They consist of some clustered piers with cushion capitals, of a grand Norman hall, divided by two ranges of arches. There are also three finely carved chimney-pieces of the Renaissance period. In the Norman hall just mentioned Charles I. was in 1643 the guest of the loyal Colston; while Prince Charles, with the Duke of York, lodged at a house which stood opposite.

> Oh! had some mystic writing shone,
> Like that which startled Babylon,
> On Colston's walls, and told the doom
> Of sire and sons, portentous gloom
> Had fallen on all, like deadly blight,
> And turned their sunshine into night.

The war-beaten face of Oliver Cromwell might also have been seen during many days in Small Street. In 1649 he came in splendid state to Bristol, conveyed in a coach drawn by six Flanders mares, and accompanied by a gallant body guard of eighty men, the meanest of whom was a commander or esquire, and was entertained at the house of Mr. Alderman Jackson. In 1697 Queen Catherine dined here at Colston's house, her host being Sir Henry Creswick. Charles II. and James II. lodged at No. 21, which adjoined Colston's residence, the latter being known as No. 20, until partially included in the Assize Courts. At Alderman Kitchen's house, somewhere in Small Street, Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, accompanied by the Earl of Warwick, was entertained in 1587. Leicester found his bed so comfortable that he begged it from his host.

Forming part of the Assize Courts is the Guildhall, the frontage of which is in Broad Street. Broad Street, though one of the original thoroughfares of the city, has gradually assumed a completely modern aspect, there being only the gateway and Church of St. John at the lower end to remind the spectator that it was ever ancient. The Guildhall is a structure in the Tudor style, erected in 1846 on the site of an earlier building. George Peele, the dramatist, boasts in his "Merrie and Conceited Jests" of a discreditable trick which he played the Mayor and citizens at the old Guildhall. It appears that this dissipated genius found himself at Bristol without means to redeem his horse from the inn stable by the payment of his host's bill. It happened that some players had just arrived in the town, and were staying at the same inn with Peele. The latter thereupon goes to the Mayor, and describing himself to be a "scholler and a gentleman," asserts that he has a play named The Knight of the Rodes, which he was willing to perform at Bristol if the Mayor and Corporation would attend. The Mayor, though unable to grace the performance by his presence, grants the use of the Guildhall, and gives the poet "an angel" towards expenses. Peele thereupon hires the players and proclaims the play; but when the audience was gathered and looking for the performance, he having pocketed the money (40*s.*) received at the doors, puts on one of the player's silk robes, and "after the trumpet had sounded thrice, comes before the company, and recites the prologue," which was thus:—

> A trifling toy, a jest of no account, pardie,
> The knight, perhaps, you thinke for to be I,
> Thinke on so still, for why you know that thought is free,
> Sit still a while, I'll send the actors to yee.

Instead of sending the actors, he roguishly deserts both the unsuspecting players and the spectators, and regaining his horse, departs towards London.

At the upper corner of Broad Street, on the site of the Council House, stood the destroyed Church of St. Ewen's, from the east window of which that faced the street Edward IV. witnessed Sir Baldwin Fulford, who is the subject of a pathetic ballad by Chatterton, going to unmerited execution; and under 1461 is an entry of payment (4½*d.*) in the warden's books for washing the pavement of the church "ageynst King Edward ye IV. is comyng."

In Redcross Street stands the house (No. 6) where, in 1769, was born Sir Thomas Lawrence, R.A. Such was the early aptitude of the young artist for doing every thing successfully, that a gentleman of rank remarked to his biographer, that he believed that if Lawrence had been doomed to drive geese from Bristol to London he would have managed his flock with more skill and dexterity than any other driver.

ST. PETER'S HOSPITAL

THE architectural history and vicissitudes of the picturesque old mansion known as St. Peter's Hospital, in St. Peter's Street, might worthily form the subject of a paper at the approaching Congress of the Gloucestershire Archæological Society, which is to be held at Bristol. The original mansion was erected by the family of Norton, one of whom, Thomas, who flourished about A.D. 1477, resided in the eastern part of the building, and his brother Walter in the western. According to Bishop Bale and other biographers "Thomas Norton, of Bristow," was the most skilful alchemist of his time. Here, close to the historical bulwarks of the Castle, and beneath the shadow of the dark grey Norman church, we may picture the old enthusiast, with long beard and eager glittering eye, poring over his beach coal fire, and assaying with crucible and alembic, sulphur and quicksilver, to "hatch gold in the furnace as they do eggs in Egypt." Instead, however, of being at last able to exclaim, like the hero of Ben Jonson's Alchemist:

> This is the day wherein, to all my friends,
> I will pronounce the happy words, BE RICH.
> Here's Peru;
> And there within, sirs, are the golden mines,
> Great Solomon's Ophir:

he is declared to have impoverished both himself and those of his friends who were so credulous as to entrust money to him in order to help his researches. He wrote several learned works on the Philosopher's Stone and kindred subjects. It is remarkable that so enlightened a genius of later days as Sir Isaac Newton was a believer in alchemy, and among his manuscripts are extracts in his own handwriting from Norton's "Ordinal," which was the great philosophical poem of the author's era. The street frontage of the mansion, with its succession of gables and large boards, and its profuse arabesque enrichments, evidently belongs to the Renaissance period, and is a part of the house reconstructed in 1612, which date, with some grotesque sculpture, is to be seen about the porch of the river façade. We are indebted to the intelligence of John Reynolds, Esq., of Redland, for the recent discovery that immediately over the handsome Jacobean ceiling of the chief apartment of the house there exists a fine open-timbered Gothic roof of 15th century date; no doubt constructed by one of the Nortons.

At No. 15, Queen Square, David Hume in 1734 served a brief clerkship. "In 1734 I went," he says, "to Bristol, with some recommendations to eminent merchants, but in a few months found that scene totally unsuitable to me." The traditional reason of his summary departure from this place was his presuming to correct the style of his employer's (Mr. Miller's) business correspondence. "I tell you what, Mr. Hume," said the successful merchant, "I have made 20,000*l.* by my English, and I won't have it mended." At No. 19, on the same side (the south) of the Square, once resided Captain Woodes Rogers, the narrative of whose "Cruising Voyage Round the World" includes an account of his discovery of Alexander Selkirk, the original Robinson Crusoe, at the uninhabited island of Juan Fernandez. Besides bringing home Selkirk, it is well known that Rogers, from the ransom of Guayaquil, and the proceeds of other captures, returned with a booty of 170,000*l.* value.

MODERN BRISTOL

IN the newly-risen streets may be seen specimens of every style of architectural construction, except English, only that English architecture is now every style but its own. The present broad and open thoroughfares render pointless De Foe's sarcasm that the streets here are narrow as the minds of the inhabitants. It has been a traditional practice for travellers to underrate Bristol for its contracted avenues of traffic, low situation, and tortuous river. Bristol, however, now embraces Clifton and Redland, on whose picturesque heights are the villas of the merchant princes of the place. We need only look from the green Mount of Brandon to see some of the princely works that these merchants have done in time past. We may point to such noble monuments of the aristocracy of wealth as Redcliff Church and the tower of St. Stephen's, not forgetting the lesser churches, the numerous schools, hospitals, almshouses, and other institutions. And if the Avon is rockbound and crooked, we may remember that some of the boldest of British maritime enterprises have been adventured on its tide. To mention the Merchant Venturers of Bristol and Sebastian Cabot is to suggest a volume of seafaring romance. In later days the achievements of the port by the building of such frigates as the Saucy Arethusa, and such steamships as the Great Western, the Great Britain, and Demerara, show that the old maritime spirit yet survives, even if the place has allowed itself to be eclipsed as a seaport by Liverpool. The serious decline of the maritime trade before 1848, the year of Bristol being made a free port, was owing to the high dock dues. The foreign imports from 1838 to 1847 were only 892,647 tons, as compared with 2,415,366 tons from 1855 to 1867, thus showing the great benefit derived to the port through release from import dues. At the same time the rateable value of property in the city sprang from 406,206*l.* in 1841 to 771,343*l.* in 1876. Also the increase of population between 1841 and 1851 was equal to 9 per cent., while between 1861 and 1871 the advance was 18·46 per cent. The Port and Channel Dock, opened at Avonmouth, February 24th, 1847, and its connection with Bristol by railway will no doubt encourage much additional shipping to the convenient harbourage it affords, the difficult passage of the winding river being saved. The hazardous navigation of the Avon has been the source of sad experience to many vessels, the latest being the case of the Gipsy steamer in the past May. That ill-fated vessel, having received her cargo of timber and other material intended for the Dungarvan Railway, was just departing on her outward course, and had reached an awkward bend in the river, about half-a-mile below the Suspension Bridge. Here she ran aground on the mud and rock, and, turning transversely to the stream, lay helpless till the tide ebbed, when she suddenly parted in two with a report like a cannon. For several days the channel was blocked, no vessel being able to go up and down. The steamer became a complete wreck, and was blown up with dynamite. There is a talk of dockizing the banks of the Avon, a procedure which those who love tranquil scenery more than the hoarse voice of commerce will severely deprecate. The late mishap will, no doubt, encourage inward vessels to the new harbour at Avonmouth, which hitherto has been almost unused.

One of the leading manufactures is that of foot coverings. As far back as A.D. 1657 leave was given by Government to Mr. Ellis, of Bristol, to export two thousand dozen of shoes to Barbadoes. The enormous storerooms of Messrs. Derham Brothers would have probably humbled Mr. Ellis's pride in the magnitude of his own stores. As many as a hundred thousand pairs of boots and shoes, from the heavy hobnail clump of the navvy to the daintily-embellished sandal of the ball-room belle, are constantly on hand, while about half that number are being made in the worskshops of the premises. About two thousand people are employed by that firm alone, their factory being the largest of the kind in the country. The preparation of cocoa and chocolate is a secret of trade, and therefore the vast premises of Joseph Storrs Fry and Sons are not open to curious intrusion. If the chief of the firm went abroad decorated in all his prize medals, his honours might excite envy in a hero of many fights. As early as A.D. 1192, and as late as the present day, the making of soap has been one of the chief manufactures of the place. In an extraordinary narrative, by Richard of Devizes, of a Christian boy who was sent by a certain Jew from France to be crucified by another Jew at Westminster, there is incidental mention that at Bristol every one was, or had been, a soap boiler. John Stow tells us that soap was not made in London before the sixteenth century, the city depending for her supply of this commodity upon Castille and Bristol. The heavy restrictions imposed by Government upon the trades and manufactures of Bristol, particularly upon soap, the production of which was limited to six hundred tons yearly, with a duty of 4*l.* a ton, did much to aggravate the spirit of disloyalty to Charles I. Extensive buildings show that the British Solomon's "Counterblast against Tobacco," the fume of which weed resembles the "horrible Stygian smoke of the pit that is bottomless," has not had sufficient circulation in Bristol to repress the manufacture. The industrial art of sugar refining is, owing to the collapse of Finzel's works, under a temporary eclipse. Their vast buildings, the chimney of which is a foot higher than the London Monument, cost 250,000*l.* in erection, and sold lately for 87,000*l.* Employing over five hundred persons, the late manufactory required "a fleet of between fifty and sixty large ships in the course of the year to keep it in work—manufacturing something like a thousand tons of sugar a week—and popularly said to have frequently realised as much profit in a twelvemonth as the combined income of the two great Gloucestershire chieftains—the Duke of Beaufort and Earl Fitzharding—derived from their broad lands; or, as surpassing the public revenue of the hereditary prince of the German State on which Mr. Finzel's father worked a moderate farm." So great was the elder Finzel's liberality, which was inherited by the son, that, as his means augmented, he is said to have contributed little short of 10,000*l.* a year towards the support of his countryman's (Mr. Müller's) Orphan Houses.

MULLER'S ORPHAN HOUSES

THESE Orphan Houses are one of the most interesting philanthropic establishments in England. Five large houses have been erected at cost of 115,000*l.*, for the accommodation of 2,050 orphans. These orphans rely for their daily bread upon the almsgiving of people in all parts of the civilised world, who are never asked, at least by any governing agent of the institution, to contribute towards their subsistence. One principle of the establishment is never to go into debt. The last year was commenced with a balance of 357*l.* to face a probable expenditure during the year of 18,000*l.* With unfailing faith and hope, and reliance upon charity, or as Mr. Muller would prefer to say, upon the Great Inspirer of charity in men's hearts, the necessities of each day were successfully encountered, and the end of the year showed that an income had been received during its course of no less than 41,500*l.* During forty-two years' existence of the institution "we have received," says the last report, "altogether, simply in answer to prayer and the exercise of faith, without applying to any one for anything, seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling." The average expense of one orphan during the past year was 13*l.* 1*s.* The Orphan Houses are open to visitors in the afternoon of every day of the week except Sunday and Monday.

EDUCATIONAL

THE Charity Commissioners' Report shows that 20,000*l.* yearly is yearly for educational purposes, and 12,176*l.* for the support of almshouses. Of endowed schools the Grammar School is not second to Clifton College as an educational institution. Under the headmastership of the Rev. Dr. Caldicott, the scholars have so greatly increased in number as to render the present buildings inadequate for their accomodation. Extensive premises are therefore being erected, in the Elizabethan style, on a fresh and more open site. These will be ready for occupation at the beginning of next year. The new University College is the result of a strenuous effort to afford to the south and south-west of England opportunities for higher culture, such as Owens College gives to the northern provinces. The number of students on the books is about 400, nearly half of whom are women.

The portico of the quondam Philosophical Institution (erected in 1820) now the Freemasons' Hall, has been much praised for the classic purity of its design. The general contour is adapted from the Roman Temple of Tivoli. The alto-relievo frieze is from the cunning hand of E. H. Baily, who liberally presented this fine specimen of his sculpture to the Institution. The first philosophical question put to the society is traditionally said to have been at the opening dinner by an unsophisticated alderman, who suddenly asked, "What keeps the moon up in the sky?" The question was thought by the company to be of too much gravity for prandial solution, and was, therefore deferred. At the beginning of 1871 the Philosophical Society with their treasures of nature and art removed to Queen's Road, where, in fusion with the Bristol Library Society, they now centre their activity in a spacious building known as the Bristol Museum and Library. The geological collection is one of the richest in the provinces, and the library is the largest in the West of England. In the vestibule is the original sculpture by Baily, of "Eve at the Fountain."

CLIFTON

ON our leaving the busy wharves of Bristol, the prospect of the Avon opens like a romantic vision. The wrinkled, creviced, and mossgrown heights on the one hand, where the rows and crescents of houses are piled storey upon storey like the Hanging Gardens of old Babylon, and on the other the long ranges of lofty woods broken into combes and valleys of the richest luxuriance and beauty, make together a composition that scarcely requires embellishment from fancy, and Walter Savage Landor agreed with Southey in pronouncing the scene to be of its kind unsurpassed in Europe. It is a real triumph of art that the reticulated bridge which has been woven across the chasm does not impair, but emphatically adds, to the effect of the natural view. Clifton, on her throne of rocks, is now balanced by a second Clifton on the Somerset side of the gorge, which promises to spread into that county as does the original into Gloucestershire. The defensive earthwork, or, as it is commonly called, "camp" on the Observatory Hill, together with the corresponding works on the opposite side of the Avon, are considered by antiquaries to have been thrown up by the Belgic British before the Roman conquest of the country, and in viewing them we cannot but recal the long-past day when the skin-clad Briton anxiously watched the imperial galleys coming up the yellow stream beneath, quickly to drive him and his young barbarians with their mother from their sylvan home. These works are respectively known by the names of Clifton, Bower Walls, and Stokeleigh Camps, the first being on the southern summit of the picturesque glen called Nightingale Valley, and the second on the opposite point of the same ravine. We are told by Tacitus that Ostorius Scapula (who succeeded Aulus Plautius in the government of Britain about A.D. 50), in order to keep in subjection the conquered territories, and to repel the irruptions of the tribes beyond, established a chain of fortresses between the Avon and Severn. Upon usurpation by the Romans, the camps on the Avon were made to form part of a system of military defences that stretched from Clifton forty miles N.E. to Bredon Hill in Worcestershire. Like the flying torch from Ida to Lemnos, which finally told the watchman on the palace roof of Argos that Troy was fallen, a sudden attack could be signalled by fires from Clifton to Baise Hill and Doorham or Sodbury, and onward, till assistance came to the beleaguered post. Bower Walls Camp has been recently almost obliterated to provide materials for the modern builder, the great quantity of lime in its structure being converted into mortar, and the stones pounded into gravel for roads. It was triangular in form, and protected on two sides by the natural acclivities of its elevated situation, the side open to attack being defended by a triple rampart and ditches, the outer rampire being yet, at least partially, in existence. Happily the interesting earthwork on the opposite side of Nightingale Valley is as yet untouched, and it is to be hoped that the educated intelligence of the district will be sufficient to ensure its protection.

A stranger from the region of Bow Bells would almost as soon fancy that the dome of the Observatory which crowns the height of the Clifton side was the cupola of his old friend St. Paul's, as that the suspension bridge swung across the wild gorge of the Avon was veritably the same structure that he had so often trodden over at Hungerford on the Thames. Though one notion would be fiction, the other is fact. The bridge has come down from Hungerford, though St. Paul's has not left Cheapside. The change of situation is literally romantic. How so lace-like a fabric as the bridge appears from 250 feet beneath could be plaited in upper air, is a problem that many who did not witness the process of its construction are unable to solve, unless they imagine it was done, as has been sagaciously suggested, in balloons. The history of this remarkable work dates back to the year 1753, when the sum of 1,000*l.* was placed by one Mr. Vick, of Bristol, in trust to the Society of the Merchant Venturers, to be invested until by interest it had increased to 10,000*l.*, when it was to be applied to the construction of a bridge of stone across the Avon. For eighty years the dormant legacy gathered interest until in 1830 it amounted to 8,000*l.* Plans of a bridge were then advertised for, and that of Mr. Isambard Brunel's was selected from many others. On the 27th of August, 1836, when the British Association was meeting at Bristol, the Marquis of Northampton, who was then President of that Congress, laid the foundation stone of the present pier, in the presence of innumerable spectators. The work went on slowly until the year 1843, when the funds which had been subscribed, including Alderman Vick's 8,000*l.*, amounting altogether to 45,000*l.*, were expended, which caused the work to be abandoned. For twenty years the unpicturesque abutments and piers seemed likely to serve as enduring monuments of the shortsightedness of men who had begun to build a tower, the cost of finishing which they had not beforehand sat down to consider. Fortunately for the project, in the year 1860 the materials of the Hungerford Suspension Bridge, which had been removed for railway innovation, were reported to be adaptable for Brunel's uncompleted design at Clifton. A new company was thereupon formed, with a capital of 35,000*l.* in 10*l.* shares, and a second Act of Parliament was obtained to enable them to go on with the work. The existing stone towers of the bridge, together with the ground on both sides the river, were purchased from the original company for 2,000*l.*, and the chains of the Hungerford Bridge were bought for 5,000*l.* The process of construction was recommenced, and carried uninterruptedly to completion. It was opened on Dec. 7, 1860. The engineers were Messrs. Hawkshaw and Barlow; the contractors, Messrs. Cochrane and Co., of Dudley. Each of the chains is anchored at its ends 70 feet under ground into the solid rock. The height of each tower is 70 feet. The bridge itself weighs from 1,400 to 1,500 tons, and is estimated to sustain 7,000 tons. The floor of the bridge is 245 feet above high water, and the distance from centre to centre of the piers is 702 feet.

At the Bristol Meeting (1836) of the British Association the quaint Dr. Buckland explained why no frogs or toads are to be found on the downs of Clifton, which species of reptiles have since the time of Dr. Beddoes been as scarce as snakes in Ireland since the era of St. Patrick. It appears that Dr. Beddoes, "the discoverer of Sir Humphry Davy," held a theory that the inordinate use of green tea among ladies was a prolific occasion of pulmonic consumption among that interesting sex, and to convince them of the ill effects of the practice he provided two ponds, one of pure water, and the other of green tea; then having written to a friend in Shropshire to collect frogs in abundance, about 10,000 of these were caught and enclosed in a huge hogshead, perforated with air-holes. The cask, duly directed to Dr. Beddoes at Clifton, being landed on the Quay at Bristol, fell from the crane and broke, so that 10,000 frogs overran the quay, and hopped into the Frome, an event which threatened the most dire consequences to the consigneee—the burning of his house, and perhaps of the city—because the common people being at that time very loyal, and Dr. Beddoes suspected of sinister political designs, they imagined the frogs were intended as provision for some French Jacobins concealed in the doctor's cellar, and would have proceeded to acts of patriotic revenge had they not been timely restrained and brought to their senses by the harangue of a benevolent physician, who had arrived by chance on the spot.

The basis of truth contained in this story, as reported by Dr. Buckland, appears to have been that Davy's galvanic experiments having required a greater number of cold-blooded animals than the Downs could supply, and the toads of the neighbourhood having been exterminated by the zealous pupils of the doctor, a supply was written for, and a cask of frogs sent. Through the carelessness or curiosity of the men engaged in landing it, the cask was opened, and many of the frogs were liberated, to die in the poisonous waters of the Frome.

The thermal waters and the brilliant quartz, known as Bristol diamonds, found in the limestone crags, were for several centuries fashionable attractions to Clifton visitors. Th earliest mention of the waters is by William Wyrcestre, in 1460, who speaks of their rushing from the base of the rock, the spring being then unenclosed. He, however, relates nothing of their medicinal character. Who first brought the waters into fashion may yet form a subject for Notes and Queries. An early visitor to the wells was the stout Cromwellian Bulstrode Whitelocke, who records in his diary (A.D. 1628) that leaving Bath, he "came to Bristol, where the hot well of St. Vincent had only been found a short time before, though already famed for the cure of the leprosy and the stone, if drunk in a large quantity." In 1655 we find John Evelyn searching for diamonds among the rocks of St. Vincent, which he calls a "horrid Alp," and "equal to anything of that nature I have seen in the most confragous cataracts of the Alps." Queen Catharine of Braganza was at the Clifton Wells, on July 11th, 1677, but probably she had too many real diamonds to care to search for false; and the waters possibly did her not much benefit, as she departed from Bristol on the evening of the same day. In 1739 the Bard of Twickenham visited this place; yet it is to be regretted that, notwithstanding his stay at the hot wells was sufficiently long for him to have complimented its scenery in numbers, he failed to do so. He, however, in a letter to Mrs. Martin Blount gave a careful description in prose of the picturesque scene he witnessed from the Old Hot Well House, having, no doubt, a careful eye to posterity reading the letter. Pope's habit while here was to rise at seven, drink at the well at eight, breakfast at nine, dine at two, go to bed at ten or sooner. Readers of "Humphrey Clinker" will remember that Matthew Bramble went to Clifton; but after a short stay of three weeks gladly left the place, being "sick to hear people talk of the fine air upon Clifton Down." Dr. Samuel Johnson, with his satellite, came on a flying visit to the same neighbourhood; but as he had already resolved that there was no prospect like Fleet Street, it is not likely that the "barren rocks of Bristol" would please. Consequently they are never mentioned as having been seen, though the phrase just quoted, which he used in a letter to Mrs. Hannah More, seems uttered from recollection of the hateful character of the scenery. Mr. Owen, the author of an early geological book on Bristol (A.D. 1754), speaks of the numerous company frequenting the Hot Wells, and after explaining that the principal amusements and diversions on the part of the gentlemen are that they "frequently go in pleasure boats, attended with musick" to King Road, or have pleasant rides over Leigh Down, he acquaints us that the ladies' pastimes "are pretty much confined to the Pump Room and the Long Room; not but they have besides much visiting, assemblies, balls and plays alternately, to which they are carried in coaches and sedan chairs;" while "some also take great delight in riding upon Durdham Down, for which if they have not carriages and horses of their own, there are enough to be had; and the best lady attending the Hot Well, if she does not chuse to ride a single horse, will not refuse riding behind a man, for such is the custom of the country, and numbers of what they call double horses are constantly kept for that purpose."

So curiously neglected had the Hot Wells gradually become that not only the spacious pump room has during the present generation been swept away, but the spring itself was practically lost, and it is only within the last year or two that it has been recovered and made accessible. The public at large may now freely indulge by the wayside in as much of the healing waters as they care to drink, a fountain having been erected for common use.

The romantic ascent named the Zigzag, leading from the site of the Hot Well House to Clifton Down, was a favourite haunt of her present Majesty when staying at Clifton, at the time she was Princess Victoria. On the visit of Prince Albert to preside at the launch of the Great Britain steamship, "His Royal Highness," we are told by an "Old Observer," made a point of leaving his carriage for a short run down the pathway so much beloved by his illustrious consort in her girlhood."

The Parish Church dedicated to St. Andrew was given in the reign of Henry II. by William de Clifton to the Abbey of St. Augustine's, Bristol. In the fifteenth century the impropriation was granted by Carpenter, Bishop of Worcester, to the Prebendal College of Westbury. It subsequently passed to the Deanery of Bristol, and thence to a succession of individual proprietors. It is now held by the Simeon Trustees, the present incumbent being the Rev. Bishop Anderson, D.D. The old church was small and was rebuilt, except the tower, in 1654. The present structure was consecrated 12th August, 1822. Its architectural merits it would be almost impossible to underrate, and therefore we need not attempt to describe its design, which, in a word, is half Pagan and half Gothic. The churchyard with its leafy avenue and numberless crosses is very striking. Near the church is a spacious house, erected in 1742, after a design by Isaac Ware, in whose "Complete Body of Architecture" an engraving of it is to be found. It was for many years the residence of Dr. J. A. Symonds, from whom it passed to his son, the gifted historian of the "Renaissance in Italy." "Goldney House" close by, the estate of Lewis Fry, Esq., has been lately rebuilt. The grounds are laid out with the luxuriant ornamentation of the Italian landscape gardening of the last century, and include a once famous grotto which was thought worthy to be noticed in the diaries of Mrs. Delany and John Wesley. At "Manor House," Clifton Place, John Sterling wrote an article on Carlyle, that appeared in the Westminster Review, and gave the distinguished subject of it the first clear conviction "that one's poor battle in this world is not quite a mad and futile, that it is perhaps a worthy and manful one, which will come to something yet. The thought burnt in me like a lamp for several days, lighting up into a kind of heroic splendour the sad volcanic wrecks, abysses, and convulsions of the said poor battle." The Royal York Crescent is a magnificent sweep of over fifty stately houses. At No. 3, the Empress Eugènie received her early education, the daughters of Dr. E. B. Pusey being among her schoolfellows. At No. 36, Mrs. Piozzi resided in 1820. Mrs. Hannah More's latter days were spent at No. 4, Windsor Terrace, overlooking the Avon, in which house she died. Perhaps no female name among the lettered community of the time of George III. was in the last generation better known than that of this accomplished lady. In her own day she was personally as popular as her writings, which gained her the substantial applause of 30,000*l.*, and were an inexhaustible topic of discourse in "polite circles." The brightest representatives of the wit and fashion of the period were gratified to own her acquaintance, and it may be added that she was equally pleased to own theirs. But readers of "Cœlebs in Search of a Wife" are now, we are afraid, as rare as representations of her successful drama of Percy, which, with her friend Garrick for its principal character, had on the boards of Covent Garden a triumphant run of twenty-one nights.

Manilla Hall, built (1770) by Sir William Draper, whose memory has been preserved perhaps as much by being one of the most dexterous of the fighters in "Junius's Letters," as by his capture of Manilla from the Spaniards. The mansion is now occupied by Dr. C. T. Hudson, who here conducts the chief private school of Clifton and the neighbourhood. In Rodney Place was born in 1803 Thomas Lovell Beddoes, author of The Bride's Tragedy. He was the son of the Dr. Beddoes, the early instructor in chemistry of Sir Humphrey Davy. His first publication was in 1821, a small volume of poems, entitled "The Improvisatore." The Bride's Tragedy appeared in 1822, and was favourably reviewed by Proctor in the Edinburgh and by George Darley in the London Magazine; but, like the works of the whole fraternity of the spasmodic school of which he was one of the earliest and most powerful, his writings are now neglected. At No. 4, Harley Place, abode and finally died the eloquent mystic, Mrs. Schimmelpenninck. Close at hand is Christ Church, built in 1844 in the Early English style, the scene of the great sacramental case Jenkins v. Cook. Clifton Down is the Rotten Row of the locality, and with its fine drive, long avenue of trees flanked by handsome houses and the far-reaching view of the winding river, is a noble promenade.

Near Clifton Down is All Saints' Church, a structure of higher pretensions than any other modern church in the Bristol district. It cost 37,000*l.*, and is yet without a tower and spire. The cathedral-like magnitude of the building is in keeping with the ponderous severity of its construction. The type is Continental, and was adopted by Mr. Street from a study of some large churches in which great breadth of nave is gained by the narrowing of the side aisles; the purpose of this arrangement being to afford an unbroken view of the altar from any position westward of the chancel. The result in the present instance is not an unmixed advantage. It involves a loss of the characteristic charm of Gothic architecture, inasmuch that the evolution of columns, arches, and traceried windows is sacrificed for the perspective of a spacious Byzantine hall. Moreover, the crypt-like arches of the nave, which spring from dwarfed and heavy piers, are unrelieved by mouldings, the polychromy of yellow, brown, and pale blue stones being made to serve instead the light and shade of rounds and hollows. But, taken as a whole, it is a noble and imposing building, and if as an architectural experiment it be not a splendid success, is magnificent, even if a failure. The church was consecrated June 9th, 1868. The services are High Ritual.

The extensive and picturesque buildings of Clifton College now accommodate 700 boys. It was founded in 1851, and, having gradually become one of the most important public schools in England, was recently considered worthy to be incorporated by Royal charter. The religious teaching is in conformity with the Church of England, and every boy must attend the eleven o'clock service in the College chapel on Sundays. There are five scholarships, varying from 25*l.* to 90*l.* a year. The terms are: "Tuition and school fees, 25*l.* per annum, or for boys under thirteen years of age, 60*l.* per annum." There is a junior school for boys between ten and fourteen, the tuition and boarding fees being the same as for the College. The Head Master is the Rev. John Percival, LL.D.

Near the College is the new Mansion House, a gift to the City by the late Mr. Alderman Proctor, the munificent restorer of the famous north porch of St. Mary Redcliff.

THE NEIGHBOURHOOD

THOUGH Clifton comprises in itself excellences of scenery that might require a long ramble after the picturesque to find surpassed, yet it is but the ornamental centre of a district teeming with interest and variety in objects both of nature and art. Majestic cliffs, breezy downs, romantic woodlands, monolithic monuments, fine churches and cathedrals, old manor houses, ruined abbeys and castles, baronial halls, together with places of interesting historical associations are within easiest access in every direction. Thus within a circuit of about twenty miles radius we include Cheddar Cliffs,—confessedly some of the grandest inland rock scenery in the kingdom,—Brockley, Cleve and Goblin Combes, Stanton Drew—inferior in its way only to Avebury and Stonehenge; the Roman city of Caerwent and the related camp of Sudbrook; the handsome churches or stately towers of Long Ashton, Dundry, Backwell, Yatton, Congresbury, Banwell, Wrington, Westbury, Aust, and many others; the Cathedrals of Bath and Wells; Glastonbury Abbey; the glorious banks of the Wye, with the Abbey of Tintern; Woodspring Priory; Thornbury, Berkeley, Caldicott, Farley, Hungerford, and Chepstow Castles, with the respective churches of the same localities; the attractive watering places of Portishead, Clevedon, and Weston-super-Mare, together with a diversity of other scenes and objects not necessary here to detail.

Amongst Aliens

She was silent, hiding her tear-stained face on my shoulder. In vain I repeated my question, coaxing and begging her to reply. Then I spoke more severely, asking if that were a specimen of the confidence she had seemed so glad to give me. Upon this she raised her head, and there was a look of perplexity and distress on her innocent young face which pained me greatly.

"Catherine," she said, "a promise is sacred. Do not press me with questions I cannot answer. I am bound by a promise. You would not wish me to break my word?"

"No," said I. (But I am almost afraid that I did wish it.) "Only, my dear Lucy, make no more such promises, I implore you!"

We talked a long while after that. Lucy seemed, in truth, overjoyed to be able to speak of her religious feelings to me. They were pure feelings: innocent, devout, and loving. There was not a trace of guile, or affected piety, or exaggeration about anything she said. Despite my old master's hatred and mistrust of Monsignor Chiappaforti, Signor Sandro himself would have been obliged to confess that the reverend prelate's teachings had not, at least as yet, tainted the ingenuousness of my Lucy's nature. And throughout all she said, there was not a hint at any such purpose of securing her little dowry for the sisterhood, as Signor Sandro suspected. Just before we parted for the night, I took her pretty head between my hands, and, stroking down the wavy, bright brown locks, I said, "But, little Lucy, they must not make a nun of you, and cut off all this curly wig I am so fond of."

She laughed like a child. "Make a nun of me, Catherine! Oh, my dear, you little know how far short I fall of the standard of goodness needed for that holy life. Besides, I don't think such an idea has entered any one's head."

I at once and unreservedly believed that it had not entered her head, at all events. My heart was greatly lightened when I lay down in my bed that night; and I was more than ever resolved to carry out that best of all policies, honesty, in all my future dealings. I did not desire, truly, that Lucy should become a Roman Catholic. But that idea did not inspire me with any pious horror. What had seemed terrible to me was the thought that Lucy would be weaned from her old confiding love for me. I was her only friend and guardian. Our brother was in another hemisphere, and we two alone in a foreign country; and all our strength and comfort and safeguard lay in our mutual trust and affection. To have that undermined would be almost as great a misfortune for us both as I could well imagine. But it had not been undermined, and it should not be. My mind was more serene and untroubled than it had been since the first day of my entering the Palazzo Corleoni.

CHAPTER VI.

IN the course of the past year Lucy and I had paid a short visit to Tivoli, and had been so enchanted with the place that we both greatly desired to spend a longer time there, and explore the surrounding country. We had made a plan—after due examination of our budget, and discussion of ways and means—to go to Tivoli again early in the spring and stay there at least three weeks. I was to make the jaunt pay for itself in some measure, by working at a picture which had been haunting my fancy for some time; and Lucy had looked forward with eagerness to the holiday and change of scene.

For some weeks past neither of us had mentioned the subject, but now I had a strong additional motive, besides the expected pleasure of our trip, for wishing to go away from Rome for a time, and to make a break in the habit of almost daily intercourse with the Corleonis, which I knew had strongly helped to bring Lucy's flexible nature under the Princess's influence. I proposed to my sister to make our trip to Tivoli immediately after the completion of my work for Donna Laura. I should have finished what I had undertaken to do by the end of that same week. Why should we not set off at once?

"So soon, Catherine?" said Lucy doubtfully.

"Why not? Next Saturday will be the last day but one of March. It is a lovely time for the country."

"Will it not be cold there?"

"I think not. You know we were there last year quite at the beginning of April, and the weather was delightful."

"It seems rather sudden. Why are you in such haste to go, Catherine?"

"I might answer that I want to get to work on my picture, that the aspect of the landscape at this season is precisely what I require for my background, and that I feel the change of scene would be good for my health. All these answers would be true in themselves, but yet they would not give you my strongest motive for wishing to go away at once. I shall tell you the whole truth, Lucy; I especially desire to take you for a time out of reach of the Princess, and Monsignor Chiappaforti, and their circle. If their teachings are worth anything, they will stand the test of a fortnight's peaceful and unbiassed meditation. It shall be unbiassed, so far as I am concerned, for I give you my word not to enter into the discussion of any religious subjects whatever whilst we are away."

Nothing more was said at that time. The next morning we were both employed at the Palazzo Corleoni, and in the afternoon Lucy timidly said to me that she did not think she should be able to go to Tivoli so soon as I wished.

"Why not?" I asked.

"I do not think I shall be able to get a holiday from my lessons to Francesca and Livia."

"I will see to that."

"The Princess is very unwilling that their English studies should be interrupted."

"I suppose that events sometimes happen in spite of the Princess's unwillingness. I wish very much,—very much, that you should go with me to Tivoli at the end of March. I have honestly told you all my reasons for wishing you to go. Whether the Princess has with equal honesty stated all her reasons for wishing you to stay, I don't know. But I think you will not refuse to please me, Lucy. I have not often asked you to sacrifice your wishes to mine."

"My own dear Catherine, I would do anything I could to please you, indeed, indeed. I will go, Catty. I will go—if I may."

I had an uneasy suspicion that this "if I may" did not refer solely to the Princess's consent that Francesca and Livia should have a fortnight's holiday from their English lessons. Had matters gone so far that Lucy was in subjection to Monsignor Chiappaforti's will as to her going or staying? I was resolved to keep the straightforward path I had marked for myself, and after a minute's reflection I told Lucy that I should take an early opportunity of speaking to Monsignore himself on the subject.

"Shall you, Catherine?" she said, looking at me with wide-open eyes, and an air half of alarm, half of admiration at my boldness. But she made no attempt to dissuade me.

It was very well to talk of taking an early opportunity of speaking to Monsignore, but how was I to get at him? I was not acquainted with his haunts and his habits. And nothing would be easier than for the Princess Corleoni to prevent me from meeting him in her house, if she were so minded. It came into my head that Donna Laura might help me; and the inspiration proved to be a good one, for she at once said that she believed Monsignore came to the Palazzo every afternoon, about three o'clock, on business connected with the bazaar, and that if I wished to speak with him, she would let him know it, and ask him to receive me. No sooner said than done; she walked straight into her mother's boudoir and returned in a few minutes saying that Monsignore was alone, and would be happy to see me.

I found him seated at the Princess's writing-table with a bundle of letters before him, and several packets of tickets. There were also some printed circulars respecting the great bazaar, setting forth its object, and giving a list of the ladies who had consented to patronise it and hold stalls. The reverend gentleman had apparently been correcting these forms for the printer, for the one which lay before him had several marks on the margin of it.

"Good morning, good morning, Signorina," said he, with a very gracious bow and pleasant smile. "Here I am busy at the 'great work' you see. Upon my word, I shall be glad when this affair is over. You have no idea of the amount of my time it has occupied. Let us hope that we shall do some good by it, after all. I am in good hopes for the result. Our ladies have been exemplary—exemplary, in their zeal. And I'm sure we have to thank you immensely for—— Will you not take a seat?"

He was very easy, very smiling, very loquacious. He looked at me with an unconscious, genial air, as if he had not a project in the world deeper than the selling of many tickets for the charitable Fancy Fair, nor a suspicion that I could have anything disagreeable to say to him.

"Monsignore," said I, "I know you are always busy, and I should not have intruded on your time——"

"No intrusion, Signorina," he interrupted, with a bow, and the most beaming of smiles.

"Well, I mean that I should not have asked to speak with you except from a strong and serious motive. And now you have been so kind as to give me the opportunity of doing so, I will try to spare your time and my own, by being brief and speaking to the point, without compliments."

"Admirable!" he murmured, almost as if he were speaking to himself. "Ah, my dear young lady, I wish more of your amiable sex had your good sense and consideration. I have had a long and extensive experience of the female character,—a beautiful character, full of qualities which command our tenderness and respect,—but I must own that the feminine intellect, so far as my observation goes, has a tendency to be discursive. Want of concentration, eh?" And Monsignore laughed his child-like laugh, as if he were heartily amused, although, in truth, I could see nothing specially humorous in what he had said.

"Monsignore, you have acquired a great influence over my sister Lucy. You want to convert her to Roman Catholicism. I want her not to be converted. But I am no bigot, and I do not pretend to say that I should break my heart if she were received into your Church to-morrow."

Monsignore had leant back in his chair when I began to speak, and with his hands calmly folded on the table before him, and his eyes cast down, nodded gently at each sentence, as who should say, "I am giving you all my attention." I thought the last clause somewhat surprised him, however, although the expression of surprise which passed over his features—if indeed I had rightly read it as such—was but momentary.

"That," said he, very softly, "is a weakness inherent in heresy, which you, my dear young lady, have the noble candour to acknowledge, but to which many Protestants are blind. Once cast yourself loose from the anchor of infallible authority, and you drift about in endless uncertainty. It must ever be with very different feelings from those which you own to, that a Catholic could behold one he loved leaving the true Church for any other."

"Monsignore, I have taken to heart your words about the discursiveness of the female intellect, and I mean to stick to the point."

"Brava!" he murmured very blandly. But the quick glance he shot at me was scarcely so bland.

"The point is this: I wish my sister Lucy to accompany me on a short visit to Tivoli, at the end of this month; she has expressed her willingness to do so, 'if she may;' and I, surmising her consent to be contingent on yours, have come to ask whether you mean to oppose her going, and if so, why?"

"Really, my dear young lady, you surprise me! Why should you suppose that I wish to oppose your sister's going to Tivoli? Now, why? Pray tell me! I am quite curious to know." And again Monsignore laughed very sweetly.

"It is scarcely worth while, Monsignore, to waste your time in giving all the reasons which induced me——"

"Ah now, pray tell me. I assure you I am quite in the dark. And as to wasting my time, I have now some half-hour of leisure."

"But I have not, Monsignore. I must return to Donna Laura."

"Oh, come, come, Signorina! you must not baulk my curiosity. Donna Laura is not such a tyrant. Besides, I will give you plenary absolution for robbing her of a few minutes, ha, ha, ha!"

I found there was no hope of inducing him to answer my question until I had first answered his. So, as briefly and directly as I could, I told him that I had gathered from Lucy's manner that some one who strongly influenced her opposed her going to Tivoli; that I did not believe this person to be the Princess, or at least I did not believe the Princess to be acting without superior orders in the matter;—and that I had guessed the real opponent to be Monsignor Chiappaforti, and his object to be that of preventing the impression he had made on my sister's mind from being weakened by a fortnight's absence, and by the influence of a heretical sister to whom she was attached.

"Upon my word, Signorina, you are more frank than flattering! You are making me out a sort of Macchiavelli—as you English understand Macchiavelli. Now I should have thought, Miss Wilson, that your strength of mind would have been superior to the vulgar prejudices in vogue amongst some of your countrymen. You have been thinking of me as a sort of bugbear:—the type of the 'Jesuit priest' whom your Evangelical clergymen discourse about in Exeter Hall. You surprise me;—you surprise me very much."

I believed that I had surprised him. But I did not believe that it was my opinion of himself which surprised him; nor even my bluntness in expressing it. There was evidently something else which puzzled him. And all the while he was talking about Macchiavelli and Jesuits, I felt convinced that he attached no importance to what he was saying, but had his mind full of some other thought.

"Well now, Monsignore, I have answered your question; will you answer mine? Do you mean to persuade Lucy not to go to Tivoli?"

"Tut, tut! I persuade her——! Suppose, however, I were to say 'yes.' What then?"

"Then I should be frightened; because I should take it as a proof that you were resolved to separate Lucy from me to the utmost of your power."

"You frightened! The strong-minded Miss Wilson frightened! You are pleased to laugh at me, my dear young lady."

"I am far enough from laughing, Monsignore. I should be frightened. And if I were thoroughly frightened, I should run away."

I had certainly surprised him now, at any rate. There was no affectation in the tone of astonishment with which he re-echoed my words. "Run away?" he exclaimed, staring at me.

"Run away. I should run away to England. I should give up everything here,—my lessons, my career, my studies, all that I love in Rome,—and I should go home without hesitation, taking Lucy with me."

Monsignore rose from his chair and came towards me with an amiable and sympathising expression of countenance. "My dear child," he said, "do not distress yourself. I see you really are in earnest." (I was then neither more nor less in earnest than I had been from the beginning of our interview.) "I honour your affection for your sister, and your almost maternal care of her. Lucia has told me how you have devoted yourself to her. You cannot seriously suppose that I wish to divide you from your sister. No, no; rather would it be my fervent desire to bring you with her into the safe fold. But I tell you at once that I have never dissuaded Lucia from accompanying you to Tivoli. Her going or staying does not in the least depend upon me. How should it?"

"Will you give me your authority to tell Lucy that you do not oppose her going?"

"Certainly! Freely, gladly! I believe it would be a very good thing for her. She looks a little thin and pale, don't you think so? If she had asked my advice on the subject, I should at once have said 'Go!' But she never said a word about it to me."

"If you had been so kind as to tell me so sooner, Monsignore, I might have spared you much useless talking."

"Don't think of that, don't think of that. The truth is, I could hardly, at first, believe you serious in your little attack on me! I'm not a Macchiavelli, nor a Jesuit after the model of Exeter Hall! Well, well, you will learn to know me better, one day. Meanwhile, I admire your candour, I assure you. And don't distress yourself, my dear child, about being separated from your sister. We are not monsters, we poor priests, in spite of Exeter Hall, ha, ha, ha!"

I hurried away as quickly as I could, and went straight to the schoolroom to give Lucy the news. I did not believe Chiappaforti's statement that he had never opposed her visit to Tivoli. But at least he had distinctly consented to it now, and that was the chief thing with me. I burst into the schoolroom unceremoniously. Lucy looked up, startled to see me at that unaccustomed hour. But she was not more startled than I was, when I saw Don Vittorio Corleoni seated beside her at the school table.

New Novels

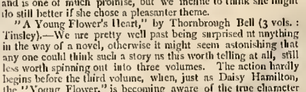
"Mine is Thine," by Laurence W. M. Lockhart, author of "Fair to See," &c. (3 vols.: Blackwood).—It is giving no bad idea of Major Lockhart's novel to say that it is eminently in keeping with the general character of Blackwood's Magazine, in the pages of which it originally appeared. Thus, it is distinctly the work of a gentleman, it is cheerful, it makes no pretensions to profundity or subtlety of thought, it is thoroughly healthy in sentiment, and it is apt to be just a little "old-fashioned" in tone. As a story, we have no fault to find with it, save this—that it strikes us we have somewhat too much of it, and that Major Lockhart would have done better to let us have it in two volumes instead of three. Not that we feel this blemish very keenly, for, in truth, the book is too good throughout to provoke the reader to impatience for the end. Though we should hardly call the author a wit, he has a very strong sense of humour, and many of his scenes are perfect little bits of comedy in their way. We may instance the French marquis's exploits in the Highland stag-hunt, and, still more, the two scenes, in the first of which the light-hearted and impecunious farceur, Tom Wyedale, driven by debt, and the importunities and menaces of a match-making and intriguing married sister, sets himself to attempt seriously to woo the heiress, Esmè Douglas, who fills the rôle of heroine; and in the second, under still direr pressure, screws himself up to making the same lady a formal declaration of his passion—a declaration about the lamest and most ineffective that has ever issued from a would-be lover's mouth. The real "love business" of the piece is by no means so successfully managed, and is in fact a little stilted; indeed, it is from first to last in the lighter scenes of his story that Major Lockhart shows to most advantage. We do not propose to say anything as to the plot, except that it hangs well together, and keeps the reader's interest alive; and, though it is complicated by details as to Scotch marriages and the failure of a great iron company—things rather of the nature of mysteries to the great majority—there is no difficulty at any point in getting an idea of it clear enough to be satisfactory. Major Lockhart tells his tale, as we have already intimated, like a well-bred gentleman, and a man who has seen much of the world, yet kept all his freshness of feeling and capacity for enjoyment; and our readers will obtain much amusement and gratification from his pages.

"Seen in an Old Mirror," by Mary Deane (Charing Cross Publishing Company).—Here we have another instance of a good story, which to some extent misses fire because it so chances that it treads too closely on the heels of one still better, dealing with pretty much the same subject. Miss Deane's picture of "The Bath," as the city on the Avon was called in George the Second's time, and for many years afterwards, and of the "humours" of the gay society that frequented it at that period, is skilfully and carefully executed, and, we should say, faithful; but it is less vivid and powerful than the representation of the same scenes we have lately had in Mr. Lewis Wingfield's "Lady Grizel," a book with which we cannot help comparing this to its disadvantage. Nevertheless, the beau monde of the day, with its outwardly fine manners, under which lay so much coarseness, littleness, and vulgarity of soul, with its riot and gambling, its greed for money, its wrangling and backbiting, is brought before us in these pages with a great deal of cleverness and power, and Dolly Chesney, the innocent country maiden, who is cast loose into this vortex of fashionable iniquity, only to have her peace spoiled by a handsome and unprincipled trifler, who wins her heart for pastime, is a very nice little heroine, who has the reader's sympathy all along. The book shows its author a conscientious worker, and is one of much promise, but we incline to think she might do still better if she chose a pleasanter theme.

"A Young Flower's Heart," by Thornbrough Bell (3 vols.: Tinsley).—We are pretty well past being surprised at anything in the way of a novel, otherwise it might seem astonishing that any one could think such a story as this worth telling at all, still less worth spinning out into three volumes. The action hardly begins before the third volume, when, just as Daisy Hamilton, the "Young Flower," is becoming aware of the true character of her feelings towards the hero, an artful cousin of hers—a character not unskilfully managed, by the way, though far from original—interposes, before he has declared himself, and persuades him that Daisy's affections are bestowed on a rival. Hence for a time coldness and misunderstandings, which terminate in the usual fashion.

"The Child of the Desert," by Colonel the Hon. C. S. Vereker, author of "Scenes in the Sunny South," &c. (3 vols.: Chapman and Hall).—The intolerably stiff, stilted, and pompous style of this novel—a style, too, far from being over-nice in the matter of grammar—would spoil a much better story than the absurd melodrama Colonel Vereker here sets before us. We can hardly suppose that any one will have patience to read the book through, but it is almost worth while being at the trouble of getting some idea of it for the sake of appreciating the general massacre of all the leading characters in which the author indulges in the closing pages. The slaughter is terrific.

In "Ten Times Paid," by Braton Bloise (Samuel Tinsley), we have a tale of slavery such as it was in the Southern States of the American Union before the War of Secession—a tale showing some ingenuity of construction, and not ill told, but not calling for further notice. There is no need now of sensational descriptions to force upon us a recognition of the evils of slavery.



Magazines

II.

In the Fortnightly Review we have one of Mr. Matthew Arnold's always fascinating essays upon "Irish Catholicism and British Liberation." The Irish Catholics, he says, who are the immense majority in Ireland, want, very naturally and reasonably, a Catholic University. "The English Ministry and Parliament may wish to give them what they demand, may think their claim just, but they cannot give it them. In the mind and temper of the English people there is an unconquerable obstacle." The policy of denial does not represent the real mind of our leading statesmen, but the mind of the British middle-class, and of the strongest part of this class, the Puritan community, controlling the action of statesmen. And "our Puritan middle-class presents a defective type of religion, a narrow range of intellectual knowledge, a stunted sense of beauty, a low standard of manners," and Irish Catholics see this, as the rest of the world sees it. "And yet it is in deference to the opinion and sentiment of such a class that we shape our policy towards Ireland. And we wonder at Ireland's antipathy to us." Of course this is but one way of putting the matter, and there is something else to be said; still it is probably the way in which the question would be viewed by Irish Catholics really in earnest in their desire for a Catholic University—we only wish we could believe that the number of these was larger than we are afraid it is. Mr. Arnold then proceeds to dwell upon what he considers the narrowness and unreasonableness of the Puritans' and Liberals' antipathy to Catholicism, and to reiterate what, with all our respect and admiration for him, we must call his craze—and a strange one it is for a thinker so clear-sighted and rational—that "the prevailing form for the religion of the future will be the form of Catholicism, but a Catholicism purged, opening itself to the light and air, having the consciousness of its own poetry, freed from its sacerdotal despotism, and freed from its pseudo-scientific apparatus of superannuated dogma," a Catholicism in fact, emptied of everything that made it a reality to its votaries, and transformed into a portentous system of "make-believe-very-much."—Mr. Morley gives us a paper, very well worth reading, on the late Lancashire Strike. He carefully abstains from pronouncing on the justice of the cause of either masters or men, but attributes the actual outbreak of the strike to defects of tact and temper on both sides. But he bids us notice that it was, after all, "an inflamed family quarrel, but no war à outrance." In spite of the passions stirred by the struggle, there was in masters and men "a counteracting consciousness of identity of substantial interest." Thus "thousands of workmen have continued to live on in cottages for which they could not pay the rent, and for which, in many cases, they never will pay the rent, although the cottages belonged to the very masters whom they were fiercely resisting. Yet such a word as ejectment was never heard."—We have from Mr. J. A. Symonds an exceedingly interesting account, written from personal experience, of a winter passed in a new sanitarium for those afflicted with lung disease—Davos, in the Grisons, a valley situated some 5,200 feet above the sea level, where the snow lies for seven months, and the thermometer frequently falls to ten or fifteen degrees Fahrenheit below zero. Antecedently one would have supposed that a winter in such a place would mean death to the consumptive patient; on the contrary it seems to mean, to say the least of it, the strongest probability of a cure. "The one thing relied upon is air. To inhale the maximum quantity of the pure mountain air, and imbibe the maximum quantity of the keen mountain sunlight, is the sine quâ non." Everything else—milk-drinking, douches, baths, &c.—is subsidiary. Medicine is very rarely used; not that the physicians have a pedantic dislike to drugs, but because they find from experience that they get on better without them. And though Davos owes its reputation to the cure of pulmonary diseases, nearly all chronic cases of debility, whether nervous or resulting from the weakening effects of fevers, are known to do well there. We can only trust that Mr. Symonds' paper may meet with the notice and attention it deserves.—Mr. Grant Duff concludes his sketch of Emilio Castelar, but does not give that general estimate of the Spanish statesman which probably most of his readers looked for from his hands; and Mr. G. Saintsbury continues his admirable series of studies of French novelists by a paper on Octave Feuillet, a translation of one of whose novels, "L'Histoire de Sibylle," was reviewed in these columns some time back.

The Cornhill is somewhat disappointing—we use the adjective advisedly—as three of its articles, "Sainte-Beauve's Critical Method," "Stray Thoughts on Scenery," and "The Tyranny of Fashion," raise anticipations which they do not satisfy. We looked for some insight into the real method of the man who has been dubbed "the prince of critics;" instead of this we have only a needless refutation of a doctrine laid down, though happily not practised, by him, that to judge of a literary work we must have a knowledge of the man who produced it—know him in his various relations of life, and so are bound to know something about his wife and children, if he had any, his father and mother, perhaps even his aunts and grandmothers. Turning to "Stray Thoughts on Scenery," we find the writer saying that "Nature can only be interesting as in some way affecting human interests, and only agreeable as affecting them for good," an assertion so astounding that we can only suppose either that he was not thinking of the meaning of his words or wished to startle by a daring paradox. It is only fair to say that such a sentence as this is no true specimen of the article, much of which has merit, though not only do we not agree with the writer's canons for estimating scenery, but doubt if he would seriously maintain them himself. "The Tyranny of Fashion" is nothing but a diatribe against the present style of ladies' costumes, well-intended, no doubt, but a mere beating of the air. If no man by taking thought can add one cubit to his stature, no woman will be led by journalistic or magazine criticism to take one inch off her train. The critic's most forcible and eloquent arguments will waste themselves in vain against the impregnable barrier of a feminine non possumus.

In Fraser we have a contribution of much interest in the shape of some letters hitherto unpublished from Coleridge, Southey, and Lamb to Matilda Betham, the daughter of the Rector of Stoke Lacy, a lady who in the early years of this century, when quite young, enjoyed for a period a considerable measure of literary and artistic success, and, as the letters prove, the intimacy and good opinion of persons of high note. Two of the letters given, one from Coleridge, the other from Charles Lamb, are eminently characteristic of the writers.—The paper on "The Constitution of Norway," the most democratic monarchical system in Europe, is also good; and so is that entitled "Among the Burmese," which gives a very lively and accurate picture of the life and ways of the curious and, on the whole, pleasing race, who, occupying a territory wedged in between the two great Empires of India and China, are so unlike the populations of either, and offer so many characteristics peculiar to themselves.

The Gentleman's Magazine contains one of Mr. R. A. Proctor's excellent scientific essays on the total solar eclipse to occur on the 29th of this month, and the unsolved astronomical problems that it will furnish an occasion of studying with most hope of profit. The eclipse will not be visible in this country, or anywhere in Europe, but only through a certain region of the North American Continent.—Mr. J. A. Farrer's paper on "Savage Modes of Prayer" brings before us some strange facts, and is well worth looking through; and Mr. James Mew's article on Bojardo, whose "Orlando Innamorata" was, we are told, in the opinion of Tasso, to be taken as forming one poem with Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso;" and Mr. Arthur Arnold's on "Malta" also deserve mention.

In Belgravia we find little that calls for remark, though Mr. H. Barton Baker's account of the miseries and indignities that were in old days attendant on the lot of the "Strolling Player," and Mr. R. R. Macgregor's notes on the old game of "Pall Mall" or "Pailemaile," form fair padding enough; whilst concerning Tinsley's Magazine it is sufficient to say that it contains the opening chapters of two new novels—"A Secret Marriage and its Consequences," by the Duke de Pomar, and "Hearts are Trumps," by Mrs. Alexander Fraser.

WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

DEAR VANITY,—I will begin my letter this week by singing the praises of a medicine which has the valuable property of curing what all the world is suffering from at this season more or less—namely, a cold in the head. Surely that complaint is one of the lesser evils that flesh is heir to, and I think the man who has discovered a sure remedy for this plague ought to be ranked among the benefactors of the human race. The other morning I woke with that most uncomfortable of feelings, a general oppression, which is the certain precursor of a catarrh. At first black despair seized me, but luckily I remembered that if taken in time the mystic contents of a little green glass bottle might save me from the prospect of many days' discomfort to myself and others. I sped to the nearest chemist's, and found the longed-for remedy, and before night was cured; it is called "Glykaline," a colourless, tasteless fluid, three drops of which taken at intervals of an hour will infallibly do away with the most obstinate of colds. All this sounds rather like an advertisement, so I beg you to understand that I have no personal or pecuniary interest in the sale of Glykaline, and only sing its praises from a wish to spread its healing properties around, and, by recommending it, confer a boon on the suffering human race.

THE RETURN OF LORD BEACONSFIELD TO LONDON

Topics of the Week

Lord Hartington's Resolution.——It is difficult to believe that the part of Lord Hartington's Resolution which relates to Greece will be cordially supported by any considerable body of politicians. Most Englishmen would be pleased if the Hellenic kingdom could be largely extended, but they also see that in the meantime, while it is necessary that the Porte should be maintained, any such extension is impossible. A happier time may come for Greece, and if it does she will have to thank England, since the Treaty of San Stefano, which England has destroyed, would have secured for ever the absolute predominance of the Slavonic race in South-Eastern Europe. Much more sympathy is likely to be felt with the criticisms which Lord Hartington and his supporters will pass on the Anglo-Turkish Convention. Mr. Gladstone probably stands alone in regarding it as "insane," but there can be no doubt that many people are genuinely alarmed by the vast responsibility we have assumed. Of course everybody wishes that we could have avoided new duties, seeing that those already imposed upon us are so much greater than the duties of any other nation. But the question is, was it possible for us to escape from the decision which has been taken? Can we afford to let Russia absorb Asia Minor, so that she may not only threaten us at the Suez Canal, but become virtually mistress of the Persian Gulf? If the answer is "Yes," then the Government cannot be condemned in too severe terms; the nation cannot too quickly back out of a perilous engagement. But "Yes" is by no means the answer returned by those who have most thoroughly studied the question. The opinion of nearly all the highest authorities both in this country and on the Continent is that if our route to India is to be maintained, and if India itself is to be safe from attack, Russia must never be allowed to go in this direction much beyond the limits she has already reached. If that is the true view, the action of the Ministry was obviously forced upon it by events, and must obtain the sanction of the country. Had no decisive step been taken, the authority of the Porte would have been sapped, Russia would have moved forward by a sort of evil destiny, and a conflict between her and England would have become inevitable. It is, at any rate, possible that such changes may now be introduced into Turkish administration as will remove from Russia all pretext for further advance. True, we may find the Pashas obstinate, but the mere fact of our protection may stimulate the population to an activity which will ultimately convince even the Pashas that a despotic policy is not, after all, the wisest.

Demobilisation of the Reserves.——The Army Reserves were called out, not so much for the purpose of meeting an actual emergency, as with the object of impressing Russia that we were really in earnest, and were determined, under certain contingencies, to fight. To what extent the Czar and his advisers were impressed by the spectacle of these five-and-thirty thousand citizens summoned to resume their weapons no one probably in this country is precisely aware, at all events the Congress of Berlin followed, and, after a certain amount of giving and taking at the expense of Turkey, any immediate likelihood of war is at an end, and the Reserve men are about to be dismissed to their homes. Apart from any political influence which it may have exercised abroad, the calling out of the Reserves, as a test of the condition of our existing military organisation, has been, on the whole, successful. The men, with few exceptions, joined the colours with alacrity, their conduct proved that civilian pursuits had exercised upon them a steadying rather than a disturbing influence, and their professional acquirements needed in most cases only a slight brushing up. Cynics may say that the Reserve men took the sixpence a day readily enough, under the belief that they would never again be summoned to the ranks, but that henceforward, on the principle of "once bit, twice shy," soldiers will prefer taking their complete discharge. We believe that this supposition will prove to be baseless, for, independent of the fact that constant pay for a probably remote contingency is of itself very tempting, British soldiers are not devoid of martial pride, and they like to feel that, though they have doffed the Queen's uniform, they are not altogether dissevered from the service. The most unsatisfactory feature of the recent calling-out has been the unquestionable misery inflicted in many instances on the families of the Reserve men. The Government is not altogether to blame for this, for, although the regulation allowances to wives and children are small, the married soldier ought to be able to spare something additional from his pay, and, what is more important, if really thrifty, he would have provided against such a contingency by laying by at least some part of the 9*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* a year which he receives as a Reserve man. Unfortunately, thrift is not a common English virtue, especially among men who have served in the Army, and anything in the shape of a pension seems to have a peculiar tendency to gravitate towards the coffers of the publican. So long as men are in the habit of living up to the full extent of their incomes, it is to be feared that the calling-out of the Reserves will always cause some families to be driven to seek parish aid.

"Unredeemed Italy."——Every true friend of Italy must regret the foolish agitation which has been going on during the last week or two. It may be natural enough for the Italians to wish that all who speak their beautiful language should be included in the new kingdom; but, unfortunately, this aspiration can be gratified only in one way—by war with Austria. It may be questioned whether it would be wise or lawful to enter upon a struggle which would cost so much blood and treasure, even if victory was certain; but as a matter of fact Italy could not hope to win the prize she ardently longs for. Austria is still a very much stronger Power, and the chances are that if it came to a fight, it would be "the unredeemed" part of Italy whose bounds would be extended. The Italians, however, have no intention of fighting; their aim is to amuse themselves by a little harmless sentiment, and perhaps to inflict some kind of vague injury on their own Government. But they are playing with edged tools. Austria watches angrily these enthusiastic meetings, and her irritation may easily reach a point at which it will begin to be dangerous. Meanwhile, the agitators withdraw the thoughts of the Italian people from the only problems which at present concern them. On the whole, the progress of Italy since her emancipation has been satisfactory; but it has been nothing wonderful; a great deal of hard work has to be got through before the State can be said to be in a flourishing condition. Brigandage must be put down; many new roads must be constructed; the railway system must be developed; the finances must be placed on a thoroughly economical basis. Here are duties enough for any nation, and Italy will act wisely if she devotes herself to them heartily, and turns her back on the people who are dazzling her by high-sounding catch-words.

Recent Crimes of Violence.——We are too apt to measure the general public interest aroused by murders by the effect produced in London. There can be little doubt that a crime, such as that perpetrated by Henry Wainwright, which is committed in London, and which is possessed of dramatic and other sources of interest sufficient to attract the eager attention of London, does also in these days attract the eager attention of the whole English-speaking world. But, on the contrary, a crime, not dissimilar in character, if committed in a remote locality, though it may excite intense interest in the adjoining district, is often dismissed in a few words by metropolitan journalists, and fails, in any marked degree, to become a true cause célèbre. For this reason the massacre of an entire family in South Wales has not caused the hundredth part of the excitement produced by the celebrated Ratcliff Highway murders of 1812, or the very similar crime committed about eight years ago at Denham, which is almost within the metropolitan radius. But in quiet country places the effect produced by such tragedies as these is deep and enduring. Thousands of women and children, left in lonely cottages while husbands and fathers are away at work, will regard every tramp with suspicion and dread for a long time to come. Happily, such purposeless slaughters are very rare. The Crayford tragedy is of a more usual type, but was accompanied by circumstances which impart to it a special interest. In this case a man, hitherto quiet and well-conducted, loses all self-control and becomes a homicidal maniac, either from fear that he had invested his savings badly, or from the discovery (which he surely might have made before he went into the business) that a beershop-keeper has to put up with very rough and blackguardly customers. We wonder whether such crimes as these are imitative, whether such a man would ever conceive the idea of cutting all his children's throats, if he had not read or heard of similar tragedies; and, if so, whether the perusal of such journals as men of his class read on Saturdays and Sundays, and which are usually full of these horrors, does not exercise a mischievous effect.

Ministers and the Nation.——The British people have some reason to complain of the manner in which they are being treated by the Cabinet. In regard to the settlement of the Eastern Question the latter has not adopted a sufficiently clear and straightforward tone. For instance, Lord Beaconsfield did not once allude, in his statement to the House of Lords, to the cession of Bessarabia to Russia. Yet he must have known that this was a matter which had deeply agitated the nation, and respecting which some explanation was urgently needed. Again, he spoke contemptuously of Batoum as a port which will hold three ships, or, if they are packed as at the London Docks, perhaps six. We have no doubt he thought he had good authority for this statement; but the fact proved to be that Hobart Pasha had found no difficulty in accommodating thirteen Turkish men-of-war, with a transport, in this despised "Cowes" of the Black Sea. As for Cyprus; it has been with the utmost difficulty that any single fact bearing on the island has been wrung from the Government. Surely all this springs from a very mistaken idea as to the proper way of guiding opinion. The result of the mystifications of Ministers is that even those who approve the general tendency of their policy are made suspicious. People ask themselves whether a Government which is so badly informed, and which wishes to conceal so many things, is worthy of thorough confidence. The true policy of the Cabinet, we believe, is to be perfectly frank. Englishmen know quite well that they have not had their own way in everything in the East; that the Government has been obliged to make important concessions in order to secure advantages still greater than those it has given up. Attempts to gloss over this fact, instead of pacifying the nation, wound its self-respect.

Bicycles.——We saw the other day, in an old magazine published some sixty or seventy years ago, an engraving of "The Gentleman's New Hobby Horse," which was exactly like a modern bicycle, with the important exception that the rider, instead of working the wheels by means of a treadle, propelled the machine by placing his feet alternately on the ground. Little did this inventor think that his discovery would slumber for so many years, and then would become, in its improved form, so popular. One of the chief charms of the bicycle, as compared with other modern locomotive improvements, is that there is a privacy and an individuality about it in which the railway and steamboat are lacking. The bicyclist is as independent as the horseman, and is in some respects his superior, for he need not watch his steed in the inn-stable lest he should be cheated of his feed of oats, and he can travel as long as his own strength holds out. One result of bicyclism is that many retired nooks and corners of our beautiful island are now more effectually explored than they ever were before; the grass-grown turnpike roads are no longer peopled only by farmers' manure-carts; and the old roadside inns, which had degenerated into rustic beershops, have begun to make provision for a more cultivated class of visitors. But the bicycle has its drawbacks. It is a very silent sort of nag, and after nightfall, if unprovided with lamp or bell, it is nearly as dangerous as an animated scythe would be. Meanwhile the bicycle interest is assuming vast dimensions. There are some 130 makers, a million sterling is invested in the business, and sixty thousand bicycles are in existence in London and the provinces. These are astonishing facts when we remember that only a few years ago the very name did not exist. The bicyclists have just been paying Mr. Sclater-Booth a visit, and asking that their vehicles should be legally recognised as carriages. The demand seems reasonable, provided they are compelled to adopt proper precautions, and the recognition would probably tend to lessen accidents. At the same time bicyclists must not blow hot and cold, as one of their fraternity has just done at Highgate. This ingenious gentleman argued that he was not liable for running over a man, because his machine was not legally a carriage. Possibly, also, when recognised as carriages, Sir Stafford Northcote may have something to say about these machines in his capacity of Chancellor of the Exchequer. If Mr. Lowe could have foreseen the importance which his hobby was destined to assume, he would, perhaps, have taxed bicycles rather than matches.

Lord Lytton and the Indian Press.——Lord Lytton has no reason to complain of the tone in which he was spoken of during the debate on Tuesday. He was treated with great respect by all the more important speakers, and especially by Mr. Gladstone, the moderation of whose speech was extremely welcome after the violent extravagance in which he has lately indulged. Then, the vote with which the debate ended must be soothing to the irritated susceptibilities of the Governor-General. All the same, however, there can be little doubt that a large majority thoroughly disapproved of his attempt at despotism, and that the Government defended him merely because it was not thought desirable to give him what would virtually have been notice to quit. Everybody admits that at a time of dangerous excitement in India even more vigorous measures would be justified; but Lord Lytton has failed to prove that there was any special need for his famous Press Act. Soon after it was passed the Imperial Government felt so sure of Indian loyalty that it summoned native troops to Europe; and this act of policy was nowhere so much applauded as in India itself. Many of the passages selected from the native press were wild enough, but most of them were probably insincere, and in any case they would have attracted little attention but for the notice accorded to them by the authorities. So long as the people of India see that we are too strong to be got rid of, there is no fear of a few noisy journalists doing us much harm; and they may even lighten the task of the Administration by occasionally giving utterance to a genuinely popular opinion. It is to be hoped that we have heard the last of rash legislation of this kind, and that by a system of judicious neglect the Press Act will be allowed to become gradually a dead letter.

SUNSTROKES.——As if to make up for the wet and chilly weather, which extended up to the middle of June, we have had thus far a very summery summer. Not so oppressively hot as the summers of 1868 and 1876, but still sufficiently warm to remind us that the sun, who is here often conspicuous by his absence, can, even in this country, at times display a dangerous degree of power. Charitable folks who take town-bred children for "a day in the country" should bear this in mind. The risk of sunstroke is, of course, nothing here to what it is in hotter countries, but then in most hot countries people know what the sun can do, and keep under cover during the full heat of the day. We do not hear of sunstrokes from Spain and Italy, where the people are descended from ancestors who have lived for many generations in the country, but we do hear of terrible slaughter from sunstroke in the United States, because the white labouring people are mostly either actual or comparative new comers from the chill latitudes of North-Western Europe, and are too apt to confront the sun by increased potations of alcohol. Here in England, we incline to think that working people are more aware than they used to be of the hurtful possibilities of the sun in summer time, many of them having been in America or Australia, they wear more sensible headgear, and we were glad to see the other day that the men repairing one of the tramways all had cabbage leaves in their hats. Next to an Indian pith helmet there is no better antidote than a cabbage leaf against the hot sun. But most important of all is abstinence from all alcoholic drinks during the heat of the day, and if the various Temperance Societies would start agencies for selling really good and cheap lemonade, fruit beverages, and iced water, they would do far more to promote temperance than they now do by speechifying and pamphleteering. Hard working men, on a hot day, must moisten their thirsty clay with something, and, if they drink beer, it is not always because they like beer best, but because beer is so much more accessible than any other pleasant-flavoured liquid.

ALLOWANCES TO ROYAL PRINCES AND PRINCESSES.——Some years ago, when Sir Charles Dilke brought forward, in the House of Commons, the question of the Queen's income, he was violently attacked by a number of journalists for venturing to pry into such a sacred mystery. Writing as we do before the discussion on the provision for the Duke of Connaught's marriage comes off, we earnestly hope that there will be no such nonsensical talk on the present occasion. Even if Sir Charles Dilke's amendment is formally rejected, the information sought therein ought to be fully set forth by the Government. The nation is not inclined to be stingy in such matters; but, considering the large number of the Royal Family at the present time, it is only fair that people should know exactly what they are paying. At the same time, when we remember how admirably the present Royal Family perform the many duties expected from them (which are not the less onerous because they are ornamental), we feel sure that the people at large, provided the matter is clearly set before them, will not grudge our Royal Princes and Princesses such allowances as are suitable to their rank, and to the many expenses which that rank entails.

BATHING PLACES.——Bearing in mind as we do how the poor suffer from heat during the hot weather in their small rooms which often lie under the roof, we feel indignant to read of batches of small boys being fined for the shocking offence of trying to cool their bodies by bathing in the Regent's Canal or elsewhere. Surely such injustice as this might be avoided by the expenditure of a little trouble and common sense. Why should not the police be empowered to permit bathing at certain spots, on the condition that all bathers should wear drawers, constables being on duty at the places in question to prevent disorder? The worst of it is that our period of heat is so brief that the bathing enthusiasm of the populace speedily abates, and so the scandal is repeated year after year. On the one hand, respectable peoples' sense of decency is outraged; on the other hand, poor lads are punished for doing that which is in itself a natural and creditable action. And yet we prate about encouraging people to learn to swim!

LORD BEACONSFIELD'S RECEPTION IN LONDON

WHATEVER may be the verdict of posterity upon the share taken by the British Plenipotentiaries in the Treaty of Berlin, there can be no doubt that the manner in which Earl Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury were welcomed back to England will be recorded in the pages of history as a proof that their efforts were appreciated by a grateful nation. There had been a preliminary reception at Dover, where the Mayor and the chiefs of several provincial Conservative Associations, met the Ambassadors on landing, and a congratulatory address was presented and responded to, but this was as nothing to the triumph which awaited them in the metropolis. Charing Cross Station, or at least that portion of it into which the special train would run, had been transformed into a huge conservatory, the platform, lamp-posts, and rafters being profusely decorated with choice flowers and plants, interspersed with flags and trophies; and upon a number of raised seats were assembled a brilliant company of ladies and gentlemen of social and political distinction, whilst outside the station, in the Strand, Trafalgar Square, and Whitehall, the expectant crowd thronged the roadway and pavement, eagerly awaiting the advent of the hero of the hour. The train arrived punctually, and the Premier, on alighting, was received by Lord Henry Lennox, and was quickly surrounded by his colleagues in the Cabinet, and other statesmen, members of both Houses of Parliament, the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, and a number of ladies, all pressing forward for the honour of shaking hands with him; the rest of the spectators meanwhile gave vent to their enthusiasm by repeated cheering. After the first greetings and congratulations were over Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury took their seats in an open carriage, with the Marchioness of Abergavenny and Lady Northcote; Lady Salisbury and her son, Lord Cranborne, following in another open carriage, and Mr. Montagu Corry, the Prime Minister's Private Secretary, in a third. No sooner did the vehicles make their appearance outside the station than a roar of applause ascended from the crowded street, and a perfect shower of bouquets came from the windows of the houses on either side, every window of which was full of spectators. The cheering and waving of hats and handkerchiefs was continued all along the short line of route to the official residence of the Prime Minister, and after they had alighted and disappeared within doors the shouting and cheering was kept up with equal vigour until at length Lord Beaconsfield was seen at the window of his drawing-room, when there was a fresh burst of applause, and he had to wait a couple of minutes before attempting to make himself heard. At last there was a comparative lull, and, amid intermittent cheering, the voice of the Premier was heard assuring his admirers that such a recognition of his labours was most agreeable to his feelings. Lord Salisbury and himself had brought back a peace, he hoped with honour, which would satisfy the Sovereign and gratify the country. The cheering was resumed as Lord Beaconsfield concluded, and when he had withdrawn the crowd turned its attention to a window in the residence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at which the Marquis of Salisbury was sitting. Presently his lordship rose, and bowing to the people, made a short speech, congratulating and thanking them, and remarking that he was satisfied that they would always uphold a Government which supported the honour of England.

CYPRUS

The publication of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, by which Cyprus is virtually annexed to the British Empire, has caused eager attention to be directed to that island, concerning which, until the other day, few of us knew more than that part of the action of Shakespeare's tragedy of Othello is represented as taking place there. Nor even now is our knowledge of Cyprus altogether of a trustworthy character; for, as with the chameleon in the fable, the island is depicted in various colours by various eye-witnesses, their views being tinged by their political predilections.

As Messrs. Clowes and Sons have published a seasonable little pamphlet, by Phil. Robinson, containing a good deal of encyclopædic knowledge about Cyprus, we need not here go into full details. The island is, compared with such dependencies as Wight, Man, or Jersey, of considerable size, being more than a hundred miles long, and from thirty to fifty broad, exclusive of a narrow horn-like promontory which runs for twenty miles at the north-east extremity. A high range of mountains, some of which are covered with snow almost all through the year, forms a backbone to the island, and the climate is hotter on the south side of this chain than on the north. The climate, in one respect, resembles that of most places lying in a similar latitude (35 deg.)—namely, that the summer is droughty and the winter very wet; but in Cyprus the summer heat is aggravated by the deserts which surround it on three sides, while icy blasts from the Asia Minor mountains render the winter somewhat severe. Thermometrical tables, however, which have been published, while showing a high range of summer heat, represent the winter as no colder than an English May. The climate generally cannot be called unhealthy, for the natives are a handsome and long-lived race; but certain spots are marshy and pestilential, and if Englishmen go there eating heartily of animal food, drinking beer and spirits, and exposing themselves to the sun, the chances are that they will get fever and die.

The worst thing about Cyprus appears to be that its harbours are little better than open roadsteads. The ancients did not feel the inconvenience of this, as their vessels were merely big boats and could easily be beached; whereas a modern ironclad on a lee-shore, with the wind Euroclydon blowing, would be in a very awkward position. It may be presumed, however, that the Government took thought of all these matters before they made their bargain. Their opponents say that the money which will have to be spent on Cyprus to render it a fitting naval station had better have been expended at Malta, which is only two days further from the Syrian coast.

Nor need we dwell here on the historical vicissitudes of Cyprus. Under Venetian rule it flourished exceedingly; the population was then nearly a million. The Turks captured the island in 1571 (the same year in which they lost the battle of Lepanto), and, owing to the mutual jealousies of the other nations of Europe, have kept it ever since. In 1850 the population was 140,000. When we remember how England, France, and other European countries have advanced in population and wealth during the last three centuries, and that, per contra, Cyprus has dwindled ever since the Turk set his foot on her neck, we have strong evidence that the Ottoman Power does not understand the art of managing conquered nations.

THE PRIZE PRESENTATION AT WIMBLEDON

On Saturday the meeting of the National Rifle Association was appropriately concluded by the presentation of the various prizes by H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught; the early part of the day being occupied by the athletic sports, which of late years have taken the place of the review and march past, with which the proceedings used formerly to close. The sports included foot races, boxing, the "tug of war," and various gymnastic competitions, besides the purely military contests, such as tilting matches, tent pitching, and tent pegging, lemon cutting by mounted swordsmen, and various contests, bayonet against sword, sword against sword, bayonet against bayonet, and the like. About five o'clock the Duke of Connaught, escorted by his aide-de-camp and some of the officers of the camp, and accompanied by Lord and Lady Wharncliffe, drove up to the daïs in front of the grand stand, where a contingent of the Queen's Westminster Volunteers formed a guard of honour. He was received by some members of the Council, and after the National Anthem had been played by the Band of the Victorias, the prize distribution was at once proceeded with. Each of the crack shots was applauded as he came up to receive his prize; but, of course, the lion's share fell to Private Peter Rae, of the 11th Stirlingshire Volunteers, the Queen's Prize winner, who was last upon the list, and in whose honour the Band of the Victorias struck up "See the Conquering Hero Comes," as he stepped forward to receive the prize, which consists of a gold medal and gold badge of the National Rifle Association, with 250*l.* presented by the Queen. It was handed to him by the Duke, with a few graceful words of compliment and congratulation.

The Queen's Prize man of this year is a native of Kilsyde, a mining village near Glasgow. He is thirty-eight years old, a joiner by trade, and is married and has a family. His reputation as a rifle shot is of long standing. In 1874 he made a level score with Atkinson, of Durham, for the Queen's Prize, but unluckily lost in shooting off the tie; two years ago he won the Henry Prize, and has frequently appeared in the smaller lists, besides having had the honour of a place in the Scotch Eight. He was a selected member of the Volunteer team to shoot against the Henry for the Donegal Cup.

The meeting which is just over is stated to be the most successful ever held at Wimbledon, both in regard to the attendance of volunteers and their behaviour in camp, the character of the shooting, the weather, and the pecuniary receipts. The increased scores are considered to be a further demonstration of the superiority of the Martini-Henry over the Snider.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE AT MALTA

We have already recorded the chief events of the Duke of Cambridge's visit to Malta, and his inspection, while there, of the native Indian Contingent, so that we need say no more than that our portrait group represents the Duke surrounded by various general officers, including General Sir Arthur Borton, the new Governor of Malta, Lieutenant-Colonel Crichton of the Grenadier Guards, the Assistant Military Secretary, Lieutenant-General Sir James Airey and Major-General Ross (Ross of Ross's Camel Corps, so famous in 1857), respectively in command of the British and Indian Divisions, and General Sir A. Horsford, Major-General Radcliffe, Colonel Bateson, and Colonel Annesley, who had come over from England with the Duke of Cambridge, and their staff. The troops in the background are taken from the 1st Bengal Lancers, 9th Bengal Cavalry, and the 10th Bengal Lancers. The Duke was enthusiastically received by both officers and men of the Indian contingent during his visit, the latter being especially flattered by the notion of the Commander-in-Chief coming all the way from England in order to inspect them. On his side, the Duke was exceedingly pleased with the appearance of the troops, and in a short characteristic speech expressed his gratification at their soldierly bearing.

SKETCHES FROM A STEAM LAUNCH AT HENLEY

"Towing."—Talk of women's rights and women's wrongs, ought not women to have the suffrage, and everything else they want, after the gallant way they are behaving here? Observe the efforts of the two dear creatures at the far end of the line. They are most ably seconding the strenuous exertions of the stronger sex to get the boat along. But ought we to use the expression "stronger sex" of the beard-growing, razor-using fraternity, when we look at the sketch entitled "A Poor Weak Mortal?" Who represents the weaker sex here—the Sybarite who was, we must confess, the envy of the racecourse, and of everybody who has a taste for rest rather than work; or that quartett of charming galley-slaves who "feathered their oars with such skill and dexterity" as to elicit universal sympathy.—"Encampment of the Thames Rowing Club." These gentlemen are evidently preparing themselves for a visit from some fair friends who have expressed a wish to breakfast with them. Hence the shaving and other ornamental processes which are going on.

THE TWO TREATIES

By aid of the map illustrating the respective alterations made in the territory of Turkey by the Treaties of San Stefano and of Berlin, even the most superficial reader will be able to gather a fair idea of the important work which has been achieved by the Congress which has just ended its labours at Berlin. On February 9th the Plenipotentiaries of Russia and Turkey signed a Treaty which, in addition to according important cessions of territory to Servia, Montenegro, and Roumania, created a large autonomous State, comprising upwards of 50,000 geographical miles, extending from the Danube on the north to a most extensive seaboard on the Ægean to the south, and from Servia and the confines of Albania on the west to a seaboard on the Black Sea ranging from Mangalia to Cape Kuri. Moreover, this great State separated the Turkish European territory into three parts, while the extension of the frontiers of Montenegro and of Servia only left a narrow military road of communication between Albania and the Bosnian provinces. By the Treaty of Berlin the Bulgarian State has been reduced to a third of its original proportions, as it now only ranges from the Danube on the north to the Balkans on the south, some 30,000 square miles of territory and a million and a-half of people being thus restored to the Sultan, who, in addition, obtains a formidable range of mountains for his frontier, with full power to garrison it as he pleases. The Sandjak of Sophia alone interferes with the continuity of his frontier defence, but even here he secures a southern spur of the Balkans, which by some is thought to be superior for military purposes than the main and more northern range. Of the territory thus restored to Turkey, however, a large parallelogram shaped district, extending from the Balkans on the north to the river Arda and the neighbourhood of Adrianople to the south, and from the Black Sea on the east to Itchiman, Tatar Bazardjik and the Despoto Dagh on the west, has been formed into a State entitled Eastern Roumelia, which is to possess "administrative autonomy," and which will be governed by a Christian Prince, who, however, will be appointed by the Sultan. The latter, nevertheless, will have the power of garrisoning the frontiers and strongholds of the province with his regular troops. The remaining portion of the territory restored to Turkey will be under the direct authority of the Sultan, who also regains a considerable portion of the territory ceded by the Treaty of San Stefano to Montenegro, although the latter obtains an increase of some 1,500 square miles, comprising a population of 40,000, together with the much-coveted port of Antivari, this latter concession, however, being qualified by the stipulation that Montenegro shall possess no ships of war, and that Austria shall be accorded a small piece of adjoining territory. Austria has also been entrusted with the occupation of the provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as the Turks themselves have proved unequal to the task of pacifying the insurgents, and as the 150,000 refugees who have so long been a heavy burden upon Austrian hospitality firmly decline to return to their homes while the provinces are under Turkish domination. The territory awarded to Servia has also been slightly curtailed, as may be seen by reference to the map, although she now gets an accession of 3,800 square miles, but no alteration has been made in the cession of the Dobrudscha to Russia for exchange with Roumania, comprising 7,000 square miles and extending from the borders of East Roumelia.—i.e., a straight line ranging from Silistria on the Danube to Mangalia on the Black Sea—to the Kilia mouth of the Danube, and comprising the Sulina and St. George's mouths of that river. Neither has any alteration been made in that portion of Bessarabia, comprising 2,500 square miles, which Russia had yielded up by the Treaty of 1856, and which she has now demanded from Roumania in exchange for the Dobrudscha—Roumania thus only obtaining a clear gain of 4,500 square miles of territory. One other country which was not named in the San Stefano Treaty obtains a mention in the Treaty of Berlin, the Turks being recommended to agree to an extension of the Greek frontier, which would give Greece a clear gain of some 5,500 miles in Thessaly, ranging from the Kalamas River on the Ionian Sea to the mouth of the Salamvria River in the Gulf of Salonica. To turn to Asia, the Treaty of San Stefano stipulated that a small portion of Asiatic territory, ranging from Makrialos on the Black Sea to a point south of Bayazid on the Persian frontier should be ceded to Russia, comprising some 10,000 square miles, including the port of Batoum and the fortresses of Kars and Ardahan. The Treaty of Berlin, however, in addition to declaring Batoum a free port, has restored the district of Bayazid on the Persian frontier to Turkey, this latter alteration being due to the remonstrances of England, who found that her great mercantile highway to Persia would be thus practically closed against her. Persia herself is also granted the cession of the district of Khotour, which had been determined by the mixed Anglo-Russian Commission as the delimitation of the Turco-Persian frontier. Thus, although by the Treaty of Berlin Turkey loses upwards of 71,000 miles of territory, she has regained a very large portion south of the Balkans, and, moreover, retains all her European territory in a ring fence, instead of having it split up in unconnected and isolated districts, as laid down in the Treaty of San Stefano. Looking at the Treaty of Berlin as a whole, we may justly re-echo the admiration expressed by The Times at "the conciliatory spirit which made it possible, and at the ingenuity displayed in finding means of compromise where a policy of give and take seemed well-nigh excluded by irreconcileable antagonism."

SPORTING

The Turf.——The meeting at Kempton Park was a great success. The course is one of the best in the country; and will be well patronised by owners and trainers, providing other arrangements suit them. The Inauguration Plate—happily enough named—brought out a good field of fifteen, and was won by Mr. Gretton's Dunkenny, John Porter, the trainer, receiving a 50 sov. cup, and Fordham, the jockey, one of 10, as memorials of the event. In the Kempton Park Two Year Old Stakes Major Stapylton's Sword-Knot gave additional evidence that he is probably the speediest two-year-old yet seen out. The Major has also another capital youngster in Salamis, who took the Queen Elizabeth and the Royal Stakes. The Cup was a gift to Lord Hartington's Rylstone, as most good judges anticipated directly the weights were published. It should be remembered that Kempton is not a mere gate-money speculation, but established in the interest of "Sport and Recreation." The present can hardly be called more than a bye-week, as it immediately precedes the great gathering of the sporting clans at Goodwood, the Huntingdon meeting, however, is not to be despised, and certes Cromwell, if still in the flesh, would have "assisted" at it this week, for the old Puritan Regicide and brewer dearly loved a bit of horseflesh, and kept brood mares of good lineage at Epsom long before the classic Downs saw any actual racing on them. Captain Machell, always formidable in Selling Stakes, scored with Ventnor in the Apethorpe, and the Duke of Hamilton had a slice of good fortune in taking both the Peel Handicap and the Kimbolton Welter with Greenback. Another double-eventer was Julius Cæsar, who won both the Portholme Cup on the Tuesday, and the Huntingdonshire Stakes on the Wednesday, And yet another, for Le Promeneur was credited with both the Oakley and Corporation Stakes on the same day. Japonica, the favourite, had to put up with third place for the Hinchingbrook Two-Year-Old Stakes, but she won the Milton Plate, turning the tables on Frivolity, who ran second in the Hinchingbrook.—For the Goodwood Stakes Norwich holds his own as first favourite, and Albert Edward has been scratched. For the Cup there is little to choose between Pageant, the French Verneuil, and the Hungarian Kinesem. The performance of the last-named will be anticipated with very great interest, as in her own country she has won, it is said, no fewer than thirty-five races without once meeting with a defeat. Mr. F. Gretton has challenged for "The Whip," now held by Mr. Crawfurd, with Pageant.—Judging from the entrances for the Derby and Oaks for 1880, there is little sign of the decadence of the Turf, 265 animals having been nominated for the former and 201 for the latter. The Derby entry is the highest since 1872, with the exception of that for next year, and the Oaks entry is the highest for the eight years, with the exception of the 216 which figured in this year's Calendar.

Cricket.——The Tunbridge Wells week has shown how well a cock can fight, according to the old proverb, on its own dunghill. Kent beat Hampshire in one innings by no less than 181 runs, the old Oxonian, Foord-Kelcey, making a pretty 105. We were glad to see that at last the Kent authorities utilised Mr. C. W. M. Kemp, who played in the Oxford team at Lord's. He made the tidy score of 17, and being an excellent field caught no less than three Hants men. We notice also that Mr. Kemp is one of the number of Kent men down for "selection" to play in the Canterbury week.—The star of Kent is just now in the ascendant, as Derbyshire has had to succumb to the famous old cricketing county, being beaten by 125 runs.—In the return match between Lancashire and Notts, the latter most unaccountably made a poor show, scoring only 43 in their first innings, and being beaten by ten wickets.—They showed very different form against Yorkshire, winning in one innings by 64 runs.—Then again Yorkshire made a grand fight with Middlesex at Lord's, scoring 143 and 309, but the Metropolitans marked 196 and 346.—Surrey has been playing two Elevens. One beat the South Wales team at the Oval, and the other Sussex at Brighton.—The Australians have had a sharp rap over the knuckles from the Cambridge men, though the latter had to put up with the loss of two of their best men. It was a one innings defeat, with 72 runs to spare.

Aquatics.——Mr. F. L. Playford, of the London Rowing Club, retains the Wingfield Sculls (Amateur Championship), Mr. A. Payne, of the Moulsey Boat Club, having failed to wrest them from him, though he made a fair try at it.

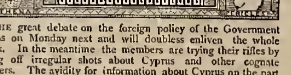
Lawn Tennis.——This is an age of championships; therefore be it known that the result of the strife at Wimbledon leaves Mr. P. F. Hadow Lawn Tennis Champion for 1878. Where is the championess in this essentially lady's pastime?

Pigeon Shooting.——We do not often refer to this exercise of skill; but again it must be recorded that Mr. Cholmondeley Pennell has had to succumb for the second time to the famous American shot, Captain Bogardus. Per contra, Captain Bogardus has had to succumb (after a tie) to Mr. Wallace, who killed 71 birds out of the 100 to the Captain's 62.

HOME.

Political Affairs.——The Earl of Beaconsfield went to Osborne on Saturday on a visit to Her Majesty, and on Monday was invested with the Order of the Garter. The other vacant Garter has been conferred upon the Marquis of Salisbury. Both of the Plenipotentiaries are to be presented with the Freedom of the City of London next Saturday, at a meeting to be held at the Guildhall, previous to the Ministerial banquet which will be given at the Mansion House on the same evening. To-day the Premier will be the chief guest at a banquet given by the Carlton Club at the Duke of Wellington's Riding School.—A number of Conservative Associations have sent congratulatory addresses to Lord Beaconsfield on the successful termination of the Berlin Congress, but the Liberals have been even more active in condemning both the results of the negotiations, and the secrecy with which they have been conducted. The Foreign Affairs Committee, in the north of England, have petitioned the House of Commons to impeach the Premier for having betrayed both England and Turkey. The Manchester Liberal Council have declared that the Anglo-Turkish Convention is an act of international immorality, a gross abuse of the prerogative of the Crown, and a violation of the Constitution. The Manchester Reform Club is equally severe in its censure, and calls on the Liberals in Parliament to resist to the utmost the grant for the necessary supplies; whilst the Darlington Liberal Three Hundred hope that, "if the present House of Commons fails to visit such conduct with formal reprobation, the Liberal leaders will at least secure that the country shall learn from the division lists by whom its conditions are approved and by whom condemned."—It is expected that the discussion on Lord Hartington's Resolutions will commence on Monday next, and the speeches of Mr. Gladstone in Southwark, and Mr. Forster at the Cobden Club dinner last Saturday are sufficient indication that the attack on the policy of the Government will be of a serious nature. Mr. Gladstone denounced the covenant with Turkey as "insane," and spoke of it as a work of duplicity, of which every Englishman should be ashamed; whilst Mr. Forster declared that we had guaranteed the continuance of the worst possible system of administration in the world.—The proposed demonstration at Birmingham in celebration of Mr. Bright having been twenty-one years a member for the borough, has been indefinitely postponed, as Mr. Bright does not feel himself sufficiently recovered from the shock he sustained at the loss of his wife, to take any part in the contemplated proceedings.—On dit that Capt. Burnaby, of Khiva fame, is to be a Conservative candidate for Birmingham at the next election; while Sheffield will be asked to return a working men's representative in the person of Mr. Joy, of Leeds, who wants Home Rule and a Commission of Inquiry into the Tichborne case.—The Essex farm-labourers have sent an address to Mr. Gladstone, thanking him for his noble and unflinching efforts to prevent the country being plunged into a war for the support of Turkey. They think the Government have forfeited the confidence of the working classes by attempting to create war, to crush the masses and place an idle aristocracy on our taxes, to be a burden to the country for their lives; and they protest against war being declared until the labourers have the vote, like other citizens.—Parliament is to be prorogued on the 20th proximo.

Miscellaneous.——The Army and Navy Reserves are being disbanded. Those of the 47th and 38th Regiment, stationed at Dublin, were discharged on Wednesday, and immediately got up a little war on their own account, fighting in the streets for more than two hours. Seven of the leaders were arrested by the police.—On Wednesday Lord Cranbrook was entertained at a banquet at Cranbrook, to celebrate his elevation to the peerage. The speeches were of a non-political character, and his lordship, in responding to the toast of the evening, expressed his satisfaction that in England, unlike the United States, politicians respected each other, whatever views they held.—The writers employed in the various Government Offices are about to establish a "Government Writers' League," the main object of which will be to agitate for an increase of pay. The present rate of 10*d.* per hour certainly seems utterly unfair, especially as the men have no chance of promotion or pension, and the most important State papers are continually passing through their hands.—The other day the Social Democratic Working Men's Club held a meeting under the presidency of Mr. Maltman Barry, to express sympathy with the German Socialists in their struggle against the German Government.—The famous Temperance orator, Mr. J. B. Gough, who has just arrived in England on a visit, was on Tuesday welcomed by the National Temperance League at a meeting held in the College Garden, Westminster, the use of which was granted for the purpose by the Dean and Chapter. Among the company were Dean Stanley, the American Minister, Mr. S. Bowly, Mr. S. Morley, and Canons Duckworth and Ellison. Mr. Gough made a speech in his old fervent manner, and with Mrs. Gough and some fifty friends was afterwards conducted over the Abbey.—A large quantity of fish have been poisoned in the Wye in consequence of the bursting of a two thousand gallon tank of creosote, which was being taken from Birmingham to Wales, and the contents of which ran overboard into the river.—On Saturday, while H.M. gunboat Bustard was on its way from Plymouth to Portland, the boiler suddenly burst. The engineer and stoker were severely scalded, and the latter died in great agony on Sunday morning. The cause of the accident is stated to be exhaustion of the water, which was not observed, owing to the water-gauge being obscured, the engine being in the habit of priming badly.—The City Press announces the death of Mr. William Foster White, who had been Treasurer of St. Bartholomew's Hospital for eighteen years, and of Christ's Hospital for six years. He was also connected with the Foundling Hospital and several other charitable institutions.



PARLIAMENT

The great debate on the foreign policy of the Government opens on Monday next and will doubless enliven the whole week. In the meantime the members are trying their rifles by firing off irregular shots about Cyprus and other cognate matters. The avidity for information about Cyprus on the part of Her Majesty's Opposition is equalled only by the inability to furnish it which is displayed by Her Majesty's Ministers. It is curious to note how political predilection colours the facts about this hitherto uninteresting island. According to the Ministerialists Cyprus is especially suited as a British naval station, and, holding Cyprus, we may laugh to scorn the ambition of the Czar. According to the Liberals, Cyprus is a sort of desert island, where it is too hot to live in the summer, too wet to walk in the winter, and which is inaccessible by sea for four days out of seven. A similar divergence of opinion exists as to the capacity of Batoum as a harbour. Lord Beaconsfield, with dangerous precision, has fixed its utmost capacity at six ships, and these he declares must be as closely packed as vessels lying in the London Docks. Earl Granville has discovered that Hobart Pasha rode at anchor in the harbour with thirteen men-of-war, not to mention transports. On being further challenged, Lord Beaconsfield admits that the description of Batoum, as holding a maximum of about six ships, appeared to him "picturesque."

These are the premature explosions of squibs, presaging the great pyrotechnic display of next week. They take place early in the sitting, and therefore the House gets to such business as is provided for it. The Cattle Plague Bill remains the pièce de résistance. It was taken again on Monday night, and afforded subject for much wrangling throughout the heat of Wednesday afternoon. Sir Stafford Northcote personally wishes it had never been conceived; and as for Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson, he frankly admits in private conversation that, for the first time in his life he understands what Sir Charles Adderley's feelings must have been when he was in charge of the Merchant Shipping Bill. There are, in fact, many points of resemblance between the two epochs of the administration of the present Government. In both cases the Bill is one which does not appeal to party prejudices. It is a business measure, dealing with an important trade, and finds its supporters and its opponents dispersed among the benches on either side of the House. In both, a well-informed, able, and persistent opposition pursue the Bill through Committee, clause by clause; and in both the Bill is in charge of a Minister who, though most amiable in intention, is wofully deficient in ability. Sir Selwin-Ibbetson, in face of the opposition, is as clay in the potters' hands. This condition of affairs is less disastrous when the opposition is drawn at a particular line in the middle of the floor of the House. The Minister may then look to his Party for support But, in the case of this Cattle Diseases Bill, the opposition is all over the House, and, as Sir H. Selwin-Ibbetson yields all round, the consequence is that both he and the Bill present a very curious appearance at the close of a long night's Committee. If he yields to the borough members, he has Ministerial supporters like Mr. Chaplin raising warning voices, and threatening that, in spite of their fidelity to the Government, their duty to their constituents will compel them to do something disagreeable. If he yields to the pressure of the county members, the borough members sweep down upon him in a steady phalanx, and utterly crush him. Thus, life is a burden to him and the Cattle Plague Bill a nightmare, and he begins to sigh for the comparatively happy times when he filled the less prominent position of Under-Secretary for the Home Department, with a chief who left him nothing to do save the routine work of the department.

On Tuesday night the House of Commons was more or less agreeably surprised by the appearance of Sir Stafford Northcote walking up the floor of the House, having first cried aloud, "A Message from the Queen!" After dimly guessing that this might have something to do with the dissolution, of which there had been some talk, hon. members at once settled down in the right direction, and felt sure that it could be nothing than a communication relating to the approaching wedding of the Duke of Connaught. Sir Stafford Northcote having arrived at the chair the Message was read by the Speaker, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice that he would move to take it into consideration on Thursday. The House was by no means enthusiastic at this prospect, though the Admiral, by force of habit, emitted a stentorian cheer. Quite different was the reception given to Sir Charles Dilke when he gave notice that he would on Thursday meet the motion by an amendment. A loud cheer burst forth from the opposite benches below the gangway, indicating that whilst all hon. members are loyal, the loyalty of some is tempered with regret at the necessity for recurrent applications for renewed professions of loyalty to the Throne.

After this Mr. Gladstone brought forward his motion with respect to the Vernacular Press Act of India, by which he proposed that all the proceedings taken by the authorities under the Act should be reported to the Secretary of State, and from time to time laid before Parliament. The debate was remarkable for five things. In the first place, for the winning eloquence with which Mr. Gladstone obtained a hearing for an unpopular subject; secondly, for the remarkable apparition of Mr. Gathorne Hardy in the person of his son; thirdly, for the speech full of rare promise by Mr. Stanhope, the Under Secretary of State for India; fourthly, for the audacious manner in which Sir Henry James, rising about midnight, proceeded to re-state in his own and less effective manner the arguments put forth by Mr. Gladstone; and fifthly, for the muddle in which the House got on the question of the division. Mr. O'Donnell entangled hon. members with an amendment to Mr. Gladstone's Address, and the forms of the House with respect to putting amendments and the main resolution being somewhat complicated nobody quite knew what they were voting for, and after one division the Gordian knot was cut by the Liberals rising in a body and walking out of the House.

Scraps

A large Picture of the Berlin Congress is to be painted for the Royal Palace at Berlin by the Court Painter, Herr Arnold.

A Statue to Rabelais is to be erected by the Municipality of Tours, which will give a grand fête on the occasion of the unveiling next year.

An "Old Paper" Society exists in the Netherlands, the members of which devote to the Pope the proceeds of the waste paper sold annually by the 1,200,000 Roman Catholics. Last year the sum thus obtained amounted to 1,000*l.*

The Latest Pedestrian Feat is that of an adventurous diver, who undertook a subfluvial walk across the Thames on Saturday evening from Greenwich to the Isle of Dogs. He accomplished his task in a quarter of an hour, and recrossed in the same fashion in twelve minutes.

A Second Arctic Expedition is about to be fitted out by Mr. James Gordon Bennett, the energetic proprietor of the New York Herald. The yacht Dauntless will attempt to reach the Pole viâ Spitzbergen, while the Pandora, or, rather, as she is now named, the Jeannette, will proceed through Behring's Straits.

The Paris International Chess Tournament closed on Wednesday, the winners of the prizes being as follows:—Zukertort (Berlin and London) and Winaver (Russia) tied for the first prize; while Bird (London) and Mackenzie (New York) tied for the fourth prize. Two matches will be played during the ensuing week to finally decide the order of the prizes.

British Visitors to Paris would do well to remember the needs of the English Orphanage at Neuilly, which requires immediate help. A collection was made last Sunday at Christ Church, Neuilly, on behalf of this institution. Some members of Mr. H. Leslie's Choir kindly volunteered their services, and sang "Judge me, O God," with great effect during the alms collection. One hundred and sixty-one English and American children passed through Miss Leigh's hands during the past five years. Of these many have been sent out to service, there being a constant demand for them, some have been claimed by relations and friends in England, and others adopted. Thirty-two now remain in the Orphanage, while five others are awaiting admission. The Prince of Wales sent Miss Leigh 20*l.* towards the completion of her church.

A successful Trial of a Flying Machine has been made at Hartford, Connecticut. According to a Transatlantic paper, the Methodist Recorder, it went up the height of fully 250 feet, past the spire of the Colt Memorial Church, and sailed until over the Connecticut river, the operator meanwhile exhibiting his power to change its altitude and direction at will. When he ascended there was but little wind blowing, and the machine appeared to be under perfect control; but gradually a breeze sprang up, and it was deemed safest to make a speedy return, as there were indications in the sky of a gathering storm. The machine turned and made its way back in the teeth of the wind, until directly over the base-ball ground, whence it had ascended, and then alighted within a few feet of the point from which it had started.

London Mortality further increased last week, owing to the high temperature, and 1,787 deaths were registered against 1,589 during the previous seven days, an increase of 198, being 123 above the average, and at the rate of 26·1 per 1,000. There were 339 deaths from diarrhœa (an increase of 90), which always becomes fatal when the Thames temperature rises above 60 deg., and last week it was 67 deg., 19 from small-pox (an increase of 8), 13 from measles (a decline of 3), 21 from scarlet fever, 8 from diphtheria, and 19 from different forms of fever. There were 2,364 births registered against 2,394 during the previous week, being 6 above the average. The mean temperature was 66·8 deg., and was 4·2 deg. above the average in the corresponding week of the sixty years, 1814-73. The duration of registered sunshine was 56·4 hours, the sun being 112·2 above the horizon.

The Well-known Italian Poet, Senator Aleardo Aleardi, the prisoner of Josephstadt, died in Rome on the 18th inst. of apoplexy. A correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette writes concerning him:—"He was one of the worthiest of Manzoni's disciples. Poetry and patriotism were with him inseparable terms; but while Manzoni's poetry and prose breathed resignation, Aleardi spurred on the youth of his time to be up and doing, to spare no sacrifice in order to create a country. Up to 1849 his fame was confined to his native Venetia; but the publication of his chief poem, "The Seven Soldiers," rendered him famous throughout Italy. A staunch Republican in those days, he was sent by Manin to Paris, where he became intimate with Lamennais. Returning to Italy to translate thought into action, he was imprisoned by Austria in Josephstadt, and only liberated after the war of 1859. The share taken by Piedmont in that war modified the poet's political sentiments, and he rallied at once to the banner of the House of Savoy, victorious on the battle-field of St. Martino."

The Motive Power of Niagara Falls.——Dr. Siemens has already suggested, says the American Architect, that the Falls of Niagara could be turned to practical use for manufacturing purposes, by causing the stream to work dynamo-electrical machines, which could transmit the force to towns at a distance. The Buffalo Commercial now states that a company has been formed who are going to use the Fall to make compressed air, which is to be the means of transmitting motion to a distance. In this scheme the canal built by Mr. Day at a cost of about a million dollars will play an important part. "It is 33 feet wide by 11 feet deep, and leads from a point just above the rapids a mile across to the bank below. At its lower end is a large basin 70 feet wide and 800 feet long and 11 feet in depth. From the basin a flume 300 feet long is digging to the edge of the precipice. At the mouth of the flume will be a massive iron gate with an 8 foot opening. The water from the flume will pass into the reservoir, which will be connected with the air receptacles below (iron cylinders 6 feet in diameter and 70 feet long) by means of large pipes siphon-shaped. Attached to the cylinders will be a requisite number of large automatic valves, to let the water run out of the cylinders after the compressed air has been allowed to escape. The practical working of the machinery will be briefly as follows: After the water in the reservoir on the top of the bank is high enough to reach the bend of the siphon it will escape down the pipe to the air cylinders below. The pressure thus obtained very soon closes the automatic valves. There being no escape for the water which continues to pour into the cylinder (each has its own feeder), the air which it contains is compressed by the volume of water from above, until it has as much expansive power when released as steam. The capacity of the reservoir and of the cylinders is so arranged that the reservoir will be exhausted by the time the desired compression has been obtained below. While the reservoir is again filling with water, that in the cylinder is escaping, so that when the bend in the siphon is reached the contents of the cylinder is exhausted, and it is ready for another charge. Thus the operation is repeated at regular intervals in each cylinder, and there being several of them, a continuous charge of highly compressed air is secured.'

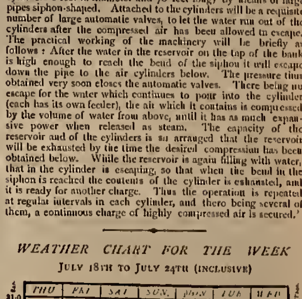
July 18th to July 24th (inclusive)



Explanation.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

Remarks.—The week under notice has been on the whole very fine and warm. The thermometer has risen to over 80° almost every day, and on Friday, the 19th instant, was as high as 85°, while the minima registered during the nights have been also high. The winds were light from the eastward during the first few days, and the sky almost cloudless; but on Monday, the 22nd instant, the weather began to change, and on Tuesday, the 23rd instant, a steady falling barometer was accompanied by much cloud and a considerable decrease in temperature. Wednesday, the 24th instant, was also comparatively cool, and at about six p.m. a sharp thunderstorm, with very heavy showers, passed over London. On Thursday morning, the 25th instant, rain fell for some hours. The barometer was highest (30·34 inches) on Thursday, the 18th instant; lowest (29·68 inches) on Wednesday, the 24th instant; range, 0·66 inches. Temperature was highest (85°) on Friday, the 19th instant; lowest (55°) on Wednesday, the 24th instant; range, 30°. On Wednesday, the 24th instant, rain fell to the amount of 0·05 inches

Lucy had accompanied me, and we had eaten our luncheon there, sitting under a gnarled olive-tree, and looking over the matchless panorama.

AMONGST ALIENS

By FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE

AUTHOR OF "A CHARMING FELLOW," "AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE," "BLACK SPIRITS AND WHITE," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

Don Vittorio had receded into the dim background of my thoughts. I had satisfied myself that whatever admiration he had felt for Lucy was a mere passing fancy, and that he had soon grown tired of bringing English letters to the schoolroom to be translated. And my mind had been too full of the subject of Lucy's conversion to have room for him. All the more was I startled and vexed to find him seated familiarly at my sister's elbow.

Lucy's face was covered with a deep, sudden blush. Don Vittorio rose very calmly, and made me his usual formal bow, with his heels drawn together. The two little girls stared at me. No doubt I looked anything but a pleasant-humoured visitor; although the instant before, while my hand was still on the lock of the door, I had been feeling cheerful enough,—and even a little triumphant. Now my triumph was very effectually damped. I briefly and drily stated my object in coming to the schoolroom: namely, to tell Lucy that Monsignor Chappaforti approved, and even advised, her going to Tivoli. And then I stood still, in an attitude of expectation.

That which I was waiting for soon happened. Don Vittorio took his departure, with another bow to me, a trifle haughtier than the first one. As he turned away, little Livia pulled him by the coat. "Vittorio, Vittorio," she cried, "don't forget to ask Laura for the ultramarine! And she promised me some more gold paper. Francesca has had twice as much as I."

Livia was the youngest of the family, and was supposed to enjoy the honour of being her brother's favourite. He certainly permitted her to be more familiar and exigent with him than any of the others, whom he kept at a cool distance.

On this occasion he carelessly stroked the child's hair, and answered, "I have something else to do, you monkey, than run on errands all day between you and Laura. I am going out now. I have brought you Laura's message, and wasted five minutes in doing so. You mustn't ask anything else of me for a month." And with that he went away.

He had brought Laura's message! Was that the real reason for his presence in the schoolroom, or a mere excuse? He had certainly looked at me as he spoke, as who should say, "I hope you are satisfied as to the reason of my being here?" And why should that not be the simple truth? Was I not growing morbid and suspicious, and imbibing some of that universal mistrust which poisoned the social atmosphere around me, and which I had frequently proved to be unfounded? No doubt I had shown my chagrin and surprise very plainly in my face, like a "blunt barbarian," as Signor Sandro had called me. And no doubt Don Vittorio had understood my emotion;—it was entirely within the compass of his intelligence. And having understood it, and being too proud to offer anything like an explanation to me, was it not natural that he should take this indirect method of conveying to me that he had no personal inclination to visit the schoolroom, and that he considered his stay there to have been five minutes "wasted"? Yes, certainly; very natural. And yet——.

I was so absorbed in my own reflections that I scarcely comprehended the children's noisy and eager appeals to me, in their imperfect English, to look at the illuminations they had been doing, and to pronounce between gold and silver for the bordering of a bright scarlet letter B. I did comprehend, however, that Don Vittorio had really brought them a message from their elder sister,—something concerning the all-important bazaar, of course,—and further gathered that Don Vittorio had good-naturedly charged himself with the message, because I happened to be absent at my interview with Monsignore, and Donna Laura had no one else at hand. Nothing could be clearer or simpler. I was ashamed of myself for not feeling quite easy. But——I could not feel quite easy.

Lucy began to question me about Monsignor Chiappaforti:—What had he said to me? Was he not amiable and sweet-tempered? Why had I supposed he would object to her going to Tivoli? I was still absent-minded and gave her short answers. When we were alone in our own lodging that evening, I told her that Monsignore had declared that she (Lucy) had never consulted him at all about our projected holiday, nor had spoken to him on the subject.

"Neither did I," she replied at once.

"You did not?"

"Certainly not. Why should you look so astounded? Did you suppose Monsignore was telling you a wilful and deliberate falsehood?"

I was obliged to confess that I had thought so, and to submit humbly to a lecture from my younger sister on the blindness of Protestant prejudice and the uncharitableness of Protestant judgments. It was impossible for me to doubt Lucy's sincerity. I must then conclude that it was not Monsignore's influence which had made her so reluctant to leave Rome.

"Then I suppose," said I, "it was the Princess Olympia who set herself so strongly against letting you go."

"She does not like the children's lessons to be interrupted, as I told you, Catherine. And,—and I think, myself, that we shall find it cold at Tivoli at this time of year."

She had turned away her face from me as she spoke the last sentence, and dropped her voice timidly. I could not bear to see her seem afraid of me. There was nothing I dreaded more than to make her shrink shyly from confiding all she thought and felt to me. And yet I had resolved to be perfectly candid and straightforward with her. My mind was painfully tossed backwards and forwards from one course of conduct to another. Monsignore had talked of my "strength of mind;" and Lucy believed me to be quite terrible in my inflexible force of will. If they had but known how wavering and helpless I really felt!—how much in need of courage and wisdom!

We went to Tivoli at the end of that week; but, oh, how different a visit it was from that to which I had so long looked forward! Lucy was—not sullen; that could not be, but—often sad. Monsignore's observation on her pale looks and thinness was a just one. She was looking almost painfully delicate. But I expected day by day to see the colour tinge her cheeks again, and the old gay light come into her eyes. I looked in vain. The sweet country air, the loveliness of the scenery, and the peaceful serenity of our outward lives, seemed to be vain medicaments for my Lucy's melancholy. And it was not alone that she was melancholy;—she was secret, silent, strangely reserved with me. I had given my word not to discuss with her any question touching the Catholic creed during our absence from Rome, and therefore on that subject the lips of both of us were sealed. But in a hundred ways I felt that the old familiar confidence between us was at an end. Would it ever return? Just one year ago I had been looking out over the same wondrous landscape that lay now beneath my eyes,—just one year, and how much was changed for me!

I had my Art still. Signor Sandro would have grimly told me to be thankful, and mind nothing else. Other persons had talked to me in more high-flown terms, saying that Art was sufficient to the true artist; that the goddess would accept no half-hearted sacrifice; that one must cheerfully offer up all the human part of one's life to her, if need were;—and the like tinkling phrases. But I could never cheat myself with words. All this talk, as if "Art" were some dim, monstrous abstraction served by creatures all hand and eye, and ignorant, from long disuse, of human sympathies, and weaknesses, and disgusts, and disappointments, seemed to me mere rhapsodical stuff. Perhaps, if I had been a genius, I might have found Art all-sufficient. (Although, to be honest, I doubt it; having noticed in all the accounts of men of genius with which I am acquainted, that their sensitiveness to mundane troubles,—even such vulgar ones as poor pay for their work, or hostile criticism of it,—was in nowise blunted by the favour of the Muses.) At all events, not being a genius, nor anything near to one, I required several other things besides Art to make me happy. And yet I was not unthankful for those two good gifts of Heaven, Imagination and Labour. Nay, I had never valued them so highly as when I found in them a consolation for sorrow and a refuge from care. To me they were both, at this time.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE BENJAMIN DISRAELI, EARL OF BEACONSFIELD.

LORD BEACONSFIELD is the most striking exemplification of Sidonia's theory that the Hebrew is the governing race of the world, and at no period of his life has he regarded his Hebrew descent otherwise than with pride. And well might he do so. In the graceful and touching memoir of his father prefixed to the edition of the "Curiosities of Literature," published in 1848, Lord Beaconsfield refers to the fact that the race from which he springs is the most ancient upon earth. There are Hebrews who can trace their pedigree unbroken for interminable generations, but there is only one caste—the Sephardim—who can with justice boast that their ancestors were always of gentle blood. Of those Sephardim, almost the last unmingled representative is the Earl of Beaconsfield.

The grandfather of Benjamin Disraeli came to England from Venice in 1747. Up to the end of the fifteenth century his family had lived in Spain, where, as we learn from "Coningsby," the Jews "were treated with tenderness and consideration" until "the Inquisition appeared." Amongst those who were driven from Spain were the ancestors of the present Lord Beaconsfield They settled in Venice, and under the mild and tolerant rule of that Republic for more than two hundred years they traded in peace. Towards the middle of the eighteenth century the altered circumstances of England attracted many Hebrews to this country, amongst whom was Benjamin Disraeli. He was naturalised soon after the failure of the second Stuart rebellion, and was then eighteen years of age. When seventeen years later—in 1765—he married he was already a man of fortune. In the words of his grandson he "settled near Enfield, where he formed an Italian garden, entertained his friends, played whist with Sir Horace Mann, who was his great acquaintance, and who had known his brother at Venice as a banker, ate macaroni which was dressed by the Venetian Consul, sang canzonettas, and, notwithstanding a wife who never pardoned him for his name and a son who disappointed all his plans, and who to the last hour of his life was an enigma to him, lived till he was nearly ninety, and then died in 1817 in the full enjoyment of prolonged existence."

The son was Isaac Disraeli, the well-known author of so many volumes of literary history, criticism, and research. He was born in 1766, educated in a desultory fashion, partly in England, partly in Holland, and after scandalising his father with his violent Rousseauism, his devotion to literature, and his contempt for trade, settled down to the life of a man of letters very early in the present century. His son says of him that "he was a complete literary character, a man who really passed his life in a library. Even marriage produced no change in these habits; he rose to enter the chamber where he lived alone with his books, and at night his lamp was ever lit within the same walls. . . . He disliked business, and he never required relaxation—he was absorbed in his pursuits. In London his only amusement was to ramble among booksellers; if he entered a club it was only to go into the library. In the country he scarcely ever left his room but to saunter in abstraction upon a terrace; muse over a chapter, or coin a sentence. He had not a single passion or prejudice. . . . He not only never entered into the politics of the day, but he could never understand them." Such was the father of the future ruler of the destinies of England, and father and son appear to have been alike proud of each other. When towards the evening of his life Lady Blessington had made Gore House the centre of all that was famous in art and literature, the Disraelis were by no means the least conspicuous figures there.

BENJAMIN DISRAELI IN 1837

THE YEAR OF HIS MAIDEN SPEECH IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, FROM A DRAWING BY COUNT D'ORSAY

Isaac Disraeli married in 1802 a sister of George (Joshua) Basevi, the well-known Hebrew architect, to whom Cambridge is indebted for the fine "Fitzwilliam Museum." She lived to the age of eighty-two, dying in 1847, one year before her husband. To them were born four children, the eldest, Sarah, on the 6th December, 1802; Benjamin, the present Earl of Beaconsfield, on 21st December, 1804 not 1806, as usually given; Ralph in 1809, and James in 1813. These dates, we may remark, are taken from Picciotto's "Sketches of Anglo-Jewish History," and as they are copied from the registers of the Portuguese Synagogue in Bevis Marks, with which Isaac Disraeli was then connected, it may be assumed that they are correct. As became the son of a Hebrew, Benjamin was received into the covenant of Abraham by Daniel Abarbanel Lindo, a relative of his family, and a Portuguese merchant of high standing. With that event, however, his practical connection with Judaism comes to an end. Isaac Disraeli had, as we have seen, returned from the Continent saturated with the theories of Rousseau and Voltaire, and Mr. Picciotto tells us that his attention to his religious duties was always extremely lax. As a matter of course, he was a member of the Synagogue, and as such paid a finta, or assessment, of 10*l.* a year. In 1813 he was elected to the office of Parnass, or Warden, an office which, as he never went near the Synagogue, he very naturally declined to fill, his letter of refusal being dated from the King's Road, Bedford Row. Upon this refusal the Mahamad (Wardens) fined him 40*l.*, which he promptly refused to pay. Summoned to a meeting of the Wardens he wrote a somewhat forcible letter declining to submit to the yoke which it was sought to place upon him, and the matter remained in abeyance until 1817, when further pressure having been put upon him he wrote to say that he was "under the painful necessity of insisting that his name be erased from the list of members as Yehedim (contributing members) of the Synagogue." His brother-in-law, George Basevi, followed his example, and although for the sake of securing the certificates of his marriage and of the births of his children he paid up his subscriptions to 1817, he was practically at no time a Jew, otherwise than by blood, after his return from the Continent. Under the care of some of his mother's connexions, and at the instigation, it is said, of Samuel Rogers, the banker poet, Benjamin Disraeli was baptised at the parish church of St. Andrew, Holborn, on the 31st of July, 1817. The register records that he was then "said to be about twelve years old."

The house at Enfield seems to have been given up at an early date. Isaac Disraeli was one of the most constant frequenters of the library of the British Museum, and for convenience of access took a house, in or about 1809, in the King's Road, Gray's Inn—then an almost rural spot, and very different from the crowded locality it has since become. Later on—in 1825—he removed to an estate which he had bought at Bradenham, in Bucks, and with that event commenced the connexion of his illustrious son with the county which he has so aptly designated "the county of statesmen." From Bradenham House the prefaces to the early works and election addresses of the younger Disraeli were regularly dated; the removal to Hughenden Manor not occurring until after his marriage.

As regards Mr. Disraeli's education, the particulars accessible are singularly meagre. It is known that he was placed at an early age at a boarding school at Winchester, and, shortly afterwards, under the charge of a Dissenting minister at Walthamstow. With those two facts the record ends. No public school can boast of having taught him; no University is proud to enrol his name amongst those of her sons. Even the names of his tutors are forgotten, if we except that of his father, to whose varied erudition and brilliant scholarship he unquestionably owed much. At an early age, in compliance with the wish of his father, he entered the office of Messrs. Swain and Co., the attorneys, of Frederick's Place, Old Jewry. His stay here was, however, very short, and his place was filled by his brother, who afterwards obtained one of those offices for which a legal education is an indispensable qualification. He was never articled, and from the first evinced an aversion to "the desk's dull wood," preferring, according to one account, to read works of imagination rather than to fill his mind with precedents and formulas. It is to this fact that we must ascribe the ridiculous fable with which some writers have amused the world that "Vivian Grey" was written when its author "was a copying clerk in a lawyer's office." As a matter-of-fact Isaac Disraeli was always a man of easy fortune, and at no period of his life has his illustrious son felt the burden of poverty which so frequently cramps the flight of aspiring genius.

There is a story of this period in Mr. Disraeli's life to the effect that he was the editor of, or if not the editor one of the principal contributors to, Mr. Murray's short-lived evening paper, The Representative. For this belief there is, however, no foundation. Abundant internal evidence is afforded by the dulness and ferocity of its articles that the brilliant author of "Vivian Grey" had nothing to do with the work, but the matter is absolutely set at rest by a letter from Lord Beaconsfield himself, dated 1861, and published in the Athenæum, in which he distinctly contradicts "the constantly repeated story of a newspaper called The Representative, in which," he says, "I never wrote a single line, and never was asked to write a single line." It is worthy of remark that in an article in the Edinburgh Review for 1852, the fable is repeated with a "circumstance." Mr. Murray is there said to have declared that he lost 20,000*l.* wholly through the "Alnaschar-like visions of young Disraeli." It has been further stated that at this period Lord Beaconsfield's contributions to periodical literature were somewhat numerous, but it is extremely difficult to discover upon what such a notion can be based.

"VIVIAN GREY"

"Vivian Grey" made its appearance in two instalments, the first of three volumes being published in 1826, when its author was in his twenty-second year, and the second of two in 1827. It appeared anonymously, but it fairly took the town by storm. Its popularity continues to this day. Its faults are the faults of youth and inexperience; its merits those of genius of no ordinary kind. As soon as it appeared society set itself to appropriate the characters of the novel to living personages, and a pamphlet called "A Key to 'Vivian Grey'" reached its tenth edition before the end of 1827—a proof of the astonishing popularity of the book. It may be interesting to recall some of the persons thus gibbeted in this precocious work. The studious father of the hero, who never interferes in politics and who "hopes the urchin will never scribble," is, of course, sketched from Isaac Disraeli; while the son, educated at a private school, and full of wit and cleverness, is also undoubtedly designed in the elements of his character for the author himself. Amongst other members of society may be found the Marquis of Clanricarde figuring as the Marquis of Carabas; Mr. (afterwards Lord) Brougham as Mr. Foaming Fudge; Mr. Canning as Mr. Charlatan Gas; Lord Eldon as Lord Past Century; Prince Esterhazy as Prince Hungary; Mrs. Coutts as Mrs. Million; Lord William Lennox as Lord Prima Donna; Lady Caroline Lambe as Mrs. Felix Lorraine; Theodore Hook as Stanislaus Hoax; the Marquis of Hertford as the Marquis of Grandgout; Prince Leopold (afterwards King of the Belgians) as the Prince of Little Lilliput; the Miss Berrys as the Miss Otrantos; Horace Twiss as Vivacity Dull; Metternich as Beckendorf; Abernethy as Dr. Spittergen; and Lord Burghersh as Lord Amelius Fitzfudge Boroughby. The list might be indefinitely extended. There must, however, have been something better than mere personalities to secure enduring popularity for a book which is by the confession of its author "as hot and hurried a sketch as ever was penned." "Vivian Grey" is in short a work of genius, of genius immature and erratic it may be, but genius all the same. It is full of thought, full of wit, marked by the most astonishing vivacity, and of singular interest merely as a novel of incident.

The author of "Vivian Grey" awoke to find himself famous, and with astonishing self-restraint fled from his newly-found honours to mature his mind by farther travel and observation. Ere he departed he gave to the world another work, this time conceived in a different vein. This was the a brilliant satire on the manners and customs of 1828. It has never been reprinted, and is now exceedingly scarce, but it deserves a better fate. The scene of the adventures is the Isle of Fantasie, and in the still stranger island of Vraibleusia, the capital of which is the city of Hubbabub. When it is mentioned that the last name means London, the second England, and the first Ireland, the nature of the satire will probably be understood. The manner in which it is carried out is admirable. In style it is worthy of the author of "Gulliver" himself, and it is surprising that it should have been allowed to drop into obscurity. The young author had already visited the Continent, but he now entered upon a more extended pilgrimage. "Captain Popanilla" was published early in 1829, and by the autumn "Disraeli the Younger," as he delighted to be called in those days, was on his way to

THE MYSTIC NEST

His travelling companions were his sister and her betrothed, a Mr. Meredith, who unhappily died before the time appointed for their marriage. With them Mr. Disraeli spent the winter at Constantinople. In 1830 he was in Albania; in the following year in Syria; and there he appears to have parted from his sister, who, returning to London, falls out of the story of her illustrious brother's life. On the death of Mr. Meredith she became her father's constant companion and trusted amanuensis, and will best be remembered in the future by the touching verses to her preserved in the "Curiosities of Literature." Of his various journeyings Lord Beaconsfield has preserved no direct record, but the hints and allusions scattered throughout the long series of his novels afford distinct proof that they were as numerous and almost as erratic as those of Sidonia himself. In Syria, the cradle of his race, he evidently passed no small part of his time. Egypt and the Upper Nile he explored at a period when Cook's tourists were not, and the expedition was not the winter holiday it has since become. At Janina he found himself in the midst of a dangerous revolt of Albanians; at Jerusalem he nearly lost his life in an attempt to penetrate the Mosque of Omar. At one period we hear of him as on the coast of the Adriatic; at another as exploring the ruins of Rome; at another as visiting Granada and the Alhambra. "On the plains of Troy," as he tells us, he conceived the idea of his

a fragment of which only has appeared, published at a later period, when the author was already entering upon that great political career which has eclipsed even his literary reputation. The leading idea of the work is, as he explains in his preface, the fact that it is the duty of the poet to endeavour to embody in his work the spirit of his time. Thus an heroic age produced an Heroic Epic—the "Iliad;" the consolidation of the most superb of Empires, a political Epic—the "Æneid;" the Revival of Learning and the Birth of National Genius, a National Epic—the "Divine Comedy;" the Reformation and its consequences, a Religious Epic—the "Paradise Lost" of Milton. The spirit of his own time was Revolutionary, and "for me," said he, "remains the Revolutionary Epic." The composition of this work occupied its author during a portion of his stay in Constantinople, and it was partially resumed in London. In his preface "Disraeli the Younger" expresses more diffidence than was his wont. "Whatever may be their (the public's) decision," he says, "I shall bow to it without a murmur; for I am not one who finds consolation for the neglect of my contemporaries in the imaginary plaudits of a more sympathetic posterity. The public will then decide whether this work is to be continued and completed; and if it pass in the negative I shall without a pang hurl my lyre to limbo." The public did so decide. The "Revolutionary Epic" was received with but little enthusiasm, and posterity has endorsed the contemporary verdict. In plain truth the genius of "Disraeli the Younger" is not distinctly poetical. The fragment of verse here submitted to the public abounds with splendid and most eloquent passages, but their qualities are those of rhetoric and not of poetry.

Besides this work, begun rather than matured, Disraeli the Younger sent home from the East to his publishers in London the manuscript of "The Wondrous Tale of Alroy"—a prose poem, which we should be inclined to class with Hope's "Anastatius," and which had it stood alone would have secured for its author a very high place in the Republic of Letters—and "Contarini Fleming; or, The Psychological Romance"—a title which he assures us "is of bibliopolic origin, and means nothing." His own criticism on the latter work deserves quotation. "I published 'Contarini Fleming' anonymously," he says, "and in the midst of a revolution. It was almost still-born, and having written it with deep thought and feeling I was naturally discouraged from further effort. . . . Gradually 'Contarini Fleming' found sympathising readers: Goethe and Beckford were impelled to communicate their unsolicited opinions of this work to its anonymous author, and I have seen a criticism on it by Heine, of which any writer might be justly proud."

The "discouragement from further effort," of which Lord Beaconsfield here speaks, applies, of course, only to effort in the direction of literary labour. A mind of such energy and versatility could not long remain inactive. Naturally enough he turned his attention to politics very speedily after his return from the East. During his absence an enormous revolution had been accomplished, not wholly without bloodshed, and the Whigs, having carried the Reform Bill, were masters of the situation. They had concentrated the representative power in the hands of the middle classes under the pretext that the lower were unfit for political rights, and they had placed the government of the country practically in the hands of a few of the great families. Such at all events was the view which Mr. Disraeli took, and which Lord Beaconsfield still holds. In 1831, as he has himself said, he found "an oligarchy substituted for a kingdom, and a narrow-minded and bigoted fanaticism flourishing in the name of religious liberty." This he traced to our carelessness in not distinguishing between the excellence of a principle and its injurious or absolute application. "The feudal system," he goes on, "may have worn out, but its main principle that the tenure of property should be the fulfilment of duty is the essence of good government. The Divine Right of Kings may have been a plea for feeble tyrants, but the Divine Right of Government is the keystone of progress, and without it Governments sink into police, and a nation is degraded into a mob."

Filled with these ideas, and exasperated almost beyond bounds by the practical ascendancy which had been gained by the Whigs during the struggles for reform of the last years of the "twenties," Benjamin Disraeli presented himself in 1831 to the electors of

HIGH WYCOMBE

He came before them as an independent candidate, and, as independent candidates usually do, he relied upon the fusion of certain very opposite interests. The best description which could be given of his political attitude in May, 1832, would probably be that which was given by one of his enemies during the debates on the Reform Bill of 1867. He was a "Democratic Tory." His election address was dated, like the "Revolutionary Epic" of later days, from Bradenham House, and was somewhat vague in its wording. Of positive principle there was not too much, whilst both the great political parties in the State met with sharp reprehension. He refused to join the Tories because he found them "in a state of ignorant stupefaction." His objection to them was however, less their ignorance than the fact that they were "haunted with a nervous apprehension of that bugbear, the People—that bewildering title under which a miserable minority contrive to coerce and plunder the nation." The meaning of this was clear enough, it may now be thought. The young aspirant for Parliamentary honours distrusted the Tories of his day, but he hated the Whigs with a perfect hatred, and he thought that success was to be obtained by uniting the extreme parties against the middle, trusting to time to prove that the Tory party were the best friends the lower classes could have. Unfortunately the electors of High Wycombe preferred the rival candidate, Colonel Grey, a brother of the then Premier.

Ere many months were past Lord Melbourne's first Administration crumbled into the dust, and High Wycombe was once more called upon to exercise the right of electing a Parliamentary representative. Again Mr. Disraeli came to the front, only again to be defeated, though by eleven votes only. But no one can regret the conflict, for it brought from him a speech full of wit and wisdom. On the strength of the support he had obtained from Messrs. O'Connell and Hume he might have been considered a Radical in some quarters, but in this speech—afterwards published with his name under the title of "The Crisis Examined"—the trumpet gives no uncertain sound. It is the voice of a Tory—a Reformer, if you will, but still a Tory. He will repeal the Malt Tax for the relief of the agricultural interest. He is disposed not to "reform" so much as to "improve" the Church by abolishing pluralities. He would maintain the Irish Church, but he would not despoil her for the benefit of a Whig aristocracy. "I remember Woburn," says he, "and I profit by the reminiscence." He would concede the claims of Dissenters so far as Marriage and Registration are concerned, and would seem to be ready to meet them half-way about Church rates, but he would on principle maintain the Church of England. The point of the speech lay in the peroration, which is, we venture to say, one of the finest things of the kind ever achieved. All the greater men had vanished from the first reformed Cabinet except Lords Melbourne, Palmerston, John Russell, and Brougham. The men who had made it really illustrious were all gone, whereupon "Disraeli the Younger" turns the whole thing into the most exquisite ridicule. Lord Durham had withdrawn "on account of ill-health; he generously conceded this plea in charity to the colleagues he despised;". "Lord Grey and Lord Althorp both retire in a morning and—in disgust." Then comes a picture of "the Lord Chancellor (Brougham) dangling about the Great Seal in post chaises, spouting in pot houses, and vowing that he would write to the Sovereign by the post." And thus it had come about that the great Reform Ministry had collapsed.

Nothing could have been better in its way, but High Wycombe was not to be weaned from its Whiggism by wit, and the heir of Bradenham was once more left in the cold. A vacancy offering itself in April, 1833, at he issued an address in which he described herself as one who "sought the support of neither of the aristocratic parties." It was in the course of his candidature on this occasion that he made the famous retort when asked "upon what he stood." "Upon my head," was the reply. The metropolitan constituency was as implacable against him as the rural one which he had previously courted, and in spite of his modified acceptance of the Radical nostrums of Triennial Parliaments and Vote by Ballot, he found so little support that he refrained from going to the poll. Various other efforts were vainly made in the same direction, one of which is recorded in that farrago of libels, hints, insinuations, and half truths—the Greville "Memoirs"—under date December 6th, 1834.

Once more he attempted to enter Parliament—this time in April, 1835—at TAUNTON.

Lord Melbourne had made Mr. Labouchere Master of the Mint, and when, in accordance with the usual custom, he went to his constituents for re-election, he found Mr. Disraeli ready to oppose him. The contest—which resulted in the defeat of the latter by 130 votes—was more than commonly acrimonious—not without reason. O'Connell had at that time just entered upon his notorious alliance with the Whigs in spite of the fact that the Whigs had heretofore treated him as one almost out of the pale of civilisation, had denounced him as a traitor, and had covered his demands on behalf of Ireland with contempt. In their despair of being able to maintain their hold on office and its emoluments by other means they had sought the support of the "Liberator" and his "tail," and he, knowing that nothing was likely to be obtained from any other party, had accepted their overtures. So flagitious a piece of factiousness naturally excited Mr. Disraeli to wrath, and in a speech which he made during the election he animadverted in no very gentle terms upon the defection of the Irish chieftain. The

which followed, is amongst the most amusing episodes of political history. In his Taunton speech the latter had called his opponent an "incendiary" and a "traitor," and in reply O'Connell delivered one of those addresses which delighted the idolators of the "Liberator," and shocked the genuine friends of Ireland. He was kind enough to style his opponent "a liar," and to say that his life was "a living lie." There was a good deal more of the same sort, and in the end, with dubious taste, but some wit, he described his opponent as possessing "just the qualities of the impenitent thief, whose name," he added, "I verily believe, must have been Disraeli. For aught I know," he went on, "the present Disraeli is descended from him, and with the impression that he is, I now forgive the heir-at-law of the blasphemous thief who died upon the cross." Just at that time another personal insult of the grossest kind, uttered in a similar fashion, had induced Lord Alvanley to call upon O'Connell to give him "the satisfaction of a gentleman." O'Connell, who had already "killed his man," refused the challenge, but it was taken up by his son, Morgan O'Connell. Mr. Disraeli, therefore, called upon Mr. Morgan O'Connell, to resume his vicarious office of yielding satisfaction for "the insults which your father has so long lavished with impunity upon his political opponents." The challenge became the subject of an inquiry before the magistrates, and Mr. Disraeli was bound over to keep the peace. He, however, had his revenge. The Times published his letter to O'Connell, and anything much more severe has seldom appeared in its columns. "Mr. O'Connell," it begins, "although you have long placed yourself out of the pale of civilisation, still I am one who will not be insulted, even by a Yahoo, without chastising it." For a moment the strife of party was hushed by the death of William IV., in 1837, and the accession of Her Majesty. In accordance with constitutional custom, the accession of the new Sovereign was followed by a general election, at the close of which Mr. Disraeli found himself the junior having for his colleague Mr. Wyndham Lewis, and for his defeated opponents Colonel Thompson and Mr. Erskine Perry. It is said that Mr. Disraeli's chances on this occasion would have been by no means favourable had it not been for the attempts of the Whigs to represent the Sovereign as pledged to the support of their party.

MEMBER FOR MAIDSTONE,

Parliament met on the 15th of November, and before three weeks were over Mr. Disraeli had made his MAIDEN SPEECH.

It is the fashion to represent this oration as a failure, as the presumptuous effort of a too ambitious boy, and so forth. Even those who have chosen to assume the rôle of apologists for the orator have assumed that the report of his enemies is the true one. As a mere matter of fact, however, the first speech of Mr. Disraeli was anything but a failure. The reports of it occupy five and a half pages of "Hansard" and a column of The Times, and though the former report adds an explanation to the effect that the noise and confusion prevented a great part of the speech from being heard, the latter shows very clearly that a great portion of the House at least were thoroughly in accord with the speaker, and relished his wit and sarcasm in no common degree. The explanation of the matter is simple enough. Mr. Disraeli's maiden speech was on the Irish Election Petitions. It was in direct reply to O'Connell, and consisted in the main of a series of attacks upon him and his policy. The mot d'ordre had gone forth, and the "tail" of the "Liberator" set to work to hoot down the audacious assailant of their idol. Such an assault cannot be said to have produced a "failure." Nor did it. When the member for Maidstone sat down he said:—"I have begun several things many times, and I have often succeeded at last. I will sit down now, but the time will come when you will hear me."

How true those words were, and how remarkably they have been fulfilled, it is hardly necessary to point out. For a time, indeed, it appeared as though the factious hootings of the "Pope's Brass Band" had drowned his voice. Yet Mr. Disraeli spoke, and spoke with effect, even during his first Session.

AFTER THE ADJOURNMENT,

the vexed question of the repeal of the Corn Laws was once more brought before the House, and Mr. Disraeli made a brilliant and characteristic speech on the subject. "Whose interest," said he, "is it to have the Corn Laws repealed? Only that of certain manufacturing capitalists who have contrived to raise a large party in favour of that repeal on the specious pretext that it will lead to a reduction of the rents, and by obtaining the co-operation of a section of this country who are hostile to a political system based upon the landed interest." On the subject of copyright he also spoke well and effectively, though not at any great length, and in the same way he made his voice heard when such subjects came on for discussion as the Irish Municipal Corporation Bill and the removal of Lenten restrictions on the London theatres. On the last subject, indeed, he made a rather brilliant hit. The then Bishop of London had given in his adhesion to the scheme for the wholesale suppression of cathedral canonries for the purposes of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—purposes which were in those unbelieving days said to consist chiefly in the enlargement of Bishop's palaces and the increase of non-residential prebends, and accordingly when Mr. Disraeli felt called upon to rebut the charge of enmity to the Church he professed himself more her friend than the Bishop who had assented to the schemes of the Commission. He spoke also on education, and on the extension of the suffrage, and on both in much the same sense as his later utterances. On education he professed his aversion to a centralised system of State education such as that which prevails in "China, Persia, Austria, and Prussia;" he eulogised the individual and corporate efforts which have been the pride of England, and he foreshadowed in no unintelligible way that theory of Young Englandism of which he was so soon to become the leading exponent. In relation to this subject it is interesting to compare this speech, which was delivered on the 20th June, 1839, with that delivered to the working men of Edinburgh eight-and-twenty years later. The advocates of political consistency could scarcely need any further vindication of Lord Beaconsfield's career.

Apart from the mere question of Education, however, this speech is remarkable as striking the keynote of

"YOUNG ENGLAND"

Five years later in "Coningsby" Mr. Disraeli announced the faith that England must be saved by its youth—a belief which he has since repeated on several occasions—and the creed of the youth to whom he there refers may be traced in this speech of 1839. Referring to his opponents, he said with much energy that with them "it was always the State, and never Society—it was always machinery, and never sympathy." The whole speech is, indeed, remarkable and interesting, but its main value is, after all, in the light which it sheds upon the character of the "Young England" party in whose name he spoke. Upon that party it is the fashion in many quarters to pour down abundant ridicule. They are represented as believing that the first article of an Englishman's duty was "to wear a white waistcoat, and to part his hair down the middle." The feeling which underlay the movement was, however, something very different. It was, briefly, the natural revulsion of young and generous minds from the hard, cold, and cruel mechanicalism of Bentham and his followers. Those who professed this novel creed had been out into the world, and had seen the effect of the selfish materialism which had been preached for a couple of generations as the Evangel of the nineteenth century and their souls revolted alike from it and its effects. The state of the country was, indeed, such as to force thoughtful men to earnest reflection. There were Chartist riots, agrarian outrages, bitter outcries against the severities of the New Poor Law, and a widespread feeling of disaffection. The Whigs found measures of coercion necessary, and they relied upon the known attachment of the Tories to law and order to help them. In giving such help the political Ishmael, "Disraeli the Younger," resolutely refused to join. Lord John Russell had brought in a Bill for the creation of a police force for Birmingham on the plea that the country was in a state of armed insurrection. Against that proposition Mr. Disraeli made a daring and most vigorous stand, and though he did not succeed in carrying the House with him he did succeed in finding out the weak places in the harness of the Government, and in sending shafts of wit and irony to pierce them. So in like manner when the working of the Poor Law was in question Mr. Disraeli used both tongue and pen with immense effect on behalf of the poor. More than all, he succeeded in getting the House to listen to him, and making himself recognised as a power in it.

Whilst thus slowly winning his way in Parliament, Mr. Disraeli's pen had not been idle. His

at this time were incessant, in spite of the "horror" which he was accustomed even then to profess for "journalising and, indeed, writing of all description." In 1835 he brought out a pamphlet of some two hundred pages—a "Vindication of the English Constitution in a Letter to a Noble and Learned Lord." The noble and learned lord was Lord Lyndhurst, to whose "political courage, versatile ability, and masculine eloquence," as well as to his "tenderness of disposition, sweetness of temper, and ripe scholarship," Lord Beaconsfield has elsewhere paid worthy tribute. It was not, however, only with such grave subjects that his pen was occupied at this time. In 1837 he published two novels, "Henrietta Temple" and "Venetia." Unlike most of his other writings, these were not political, but as he himself says of them, "They commemorate feelings more enduring than public passions, and they were written with care and some delight." No one can read those stories without sharing the delight of the author. "Venetia" was less successful. With questionable taste, Mr. Disraeli introduced amongst his dramatis personæ whole-length portraits of Shelley and Byron. To this period belong also the famous "Letters of Runnymede," never formally owned by Lord Beaconsfield, but always ascribed to him, and, as most critics consider, with excellent reason. The collected edition of these "Letters," which originally appeared in The Times, is inscribed to Sir Robert Peel in language which seems at this date somewhat extravagant, especially when it is remembered that only a few years later Mr. Disraeli became Sir Robert's bitterest opponent. In 1836 and 1837, however, "Runnymede" was undoubtedly justified in regarding Peel as "the only hope of a suffering island," and in his pride in the Minister's "splendid talents and spotless character."

In 1839 an event occurred which unquestionably affected Mr. Disraeli's future in no ordinary degree. When at the time of his election for Maidstone the former member for the borough, Mr. Wyndham Lewis, stood with him, it was evident that his race was nearly run. Parliament opened, but Mr. Lewis scarcely appeared, and never spoke. Three or four months later he succumbed to the painful disease from which he had long been suffering, and some two years afterwards Mr. Disraeli his widow. Mrs. Disraeli, who as all the world knows, afterwards became Lady Beaconsfield, was the daughter of Captain Viney Evans, R.N., and is understood to have brought to her husband a very considerable accession of fortune. Happily also she brought something else—practical wisdom, sound sense, no ordinary accomplishments, and profound attachment to her brilliant husband. Lord Beaconsfield has on all occasions borne testimony to her admirable qualities—notably when at a harvest home at Hughenden he declared that he had "the best wife in England," and when he dedicated "Sybil," to "the most severe of critics, but a perfect wife."

From the time of his marriage his upward progress in

was marked and striking. The times were hard, and the pressure on the working classes well-nigh intolerable. The Whigs were still in the ascendant, and Mr. Disraeli could see no national salvation in the "Morison's Pills for the Evils of Society" which that party put forward. The views which he expressed in the speech on Education to which reference has been made were substantially those with which he regarded all social questions. Just as he preferred to trust to individual effort rather than to State machinery for teaching the children of the poor, so in other matters he looked to Society rather than the State, to sympathy rather than to machinery. In this year of his marriage he startled his friends and enemies alike by an open plea for the Chartists, and in the year following he followed up this act by a still more striking speech in the House when the clemency of the Crown was invoked on behalf of Lovett and Collins. It is hardly necessary to say that he had no sympathy with disorder, but he declined also to shut his eyes to the facts that the Chartists had grievous social wrongs of which to complain, and that although their agitation was political in form it was really designed to bring about social improvement. How deep and real has been Lord Beaconsfield's sympathy with the poor may be seen in the pages of "Sybil," but the fact of his assuming the position of public defender of their leaders at a time when such a course was almost equivalent to political ostracism is hardly less striking. One at least of his protégés has not been ungrateful. Thomas Cooper, the Chartist, having completed his noble poem, "The Purgatory of Suicides," whilst undergoing imprisonment in Stafford Gaol, procured through Mr. Duncombe an introduction to Mr. Disraeli, and has described in very striking terms the remarkable kindness with which the future Minister treated him, the generosity with which he devoted valuable time to his service, and the pains which he took to procure a publisher for his work. It is worthy of remark, as indicating the spirit and temper of Mr. Disraeli at this time, that it was by his especial advice that Cooper, in spite of the dogmatic injunction of Mr. John Forster, refused to cancel the word "Chartist" on the title page.

In the course of his account of his first interview with Mr. Disraeli Mr. Cooper mentions that his host said to him, "I wish I had seen you before I finished my last novel—my heroine, Sybil, is a Chartist." The fact is that during these eventful years Mr. Disraeli's pen had been extraordinarily busy, and to it the literature of England is indebted for three political romances—a trilogy as their author describes them—which are amongst the most perfect things of their kind in existence. These novels are

"CONINGSBY," "SYBIL," AND "TANCRED"

The first is devoted to Young England. The object of the party may best be given in the author's own words. It was, he says, "To change back the oligarchy into a generous aristocracy round a real throne; to infuse life and vigour into the Church as the trainer of the nation by the revival of Convocation, then dumb, on a wide basis, and not, as has been since done, in the shape of a priestly section; to establish a commercial code on the principles successfully negotiated by Lord Bolingbroke at Utrecht, and which, though baffled at the time by a Whig Parliament, were subsequently and triumphantly vindicated by his political pupil and heir, Mr. Pitt; to govern Ireland according to the policy of Charles I., and not of Oliver Cromwell; to emancipate the political constituency of 1832 from its sectarian bondage and contracted sympathies; to elevate the physical as well as the moral condition of the people by establishing that labour required regulation as much as property, and all this rather by the use of ancient forms and the restoration of the past than by political revolutions founded upon abstract ideas." Sharing these sentiments, and associated with him in the effort to carry the policy which they embodied into actual practice were several friends, two of whom Lord Beaconsfield has singled out for especial mention. These were George Smythe, afterwards the seventh Lord Strangford, and Henry Hope of Deepdene, to whose influence and suggestions "Coningsby" was, as its author admits in his dedication, largely owing. In its way "Coningsby" was as great and as startling a success as "Vivian Grey." It has been very heartily abused; it has been praised almost as heartily. It has been condemned for relying for its attractiveness on the most ephemeral qualities, and it is still popular enough to yield a good income to its publishers. It is accused of personality, and in spite of the fact that the greater number of the persons satirised are dead, the caricatures survive. At this distance of time no harm can be done by recalling a few of those whose idiosyncracies are thus hit off. The hero is of course Lord Lyttelton; Rigby is said to have been intended for escaped the microscopic analysis to which "Vivian Grey" and "Coningsby" had been subjected. They were perhaps hardly less personal, but the personalities were more carefully veiled, or the critics had tired of the task of identifying them. "Sybil" is a story of singular power, and is full of those touches of higher art of which in some quarters the author is believed to be incapable. The accuracy of the story is avouched by the fact that the author made a special pilgrimage to the scenes of the Chartist disturbances. "Tancred" completes the trilogy. In "Coningsby" we have the picture of the aristocracy, in "Sybil" the actual working classes, and in "Tancred" the mystic influence of religion.

Mr. John Wilson Croker. Lord Monmouth, Coningsby's grandfather, is a faithful portrait—not in oil—of Lord Hertford, while the Duke and Lord Henry Sidney stand respectively for the Duke of Rutland and Lord John Manners, Lucian Gay is of course Theodore Hook, and Mr. Gladstone significantly figures as Oswald Milbank. Lord and Lady Everingham stand for the Earl and Countess of Clarendon; Lady St. Julian's for Lady Jersey, and the Duke and Duchess of Agincourt for the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham and Chandos. Taper and Tadpole are said on less authority to stand for Mr. Ross and Mr. Pringle, whose names were once familiar to the political world, but who are now forgotten.

"SYBIL" AND "TANCRED"

Whilst Mr. Disraeli was thus engaged in the pursuits of literature his had taken place. Lord Beaconsfield has been accused of personal motives in his change of attitude with regard to Sir Robert Peel, and is said to have attacked him because, when Peel constructed his Cabinet in 1841, he positively refused to include Mr. Disraeli amongst its members. It is just possible that this may be the case. The fact nevertheless remains that Peel's tergiversation had rendered it impossible for not a few of his warmest allies to act with him, and that, in thus rupturing the ties which bound them, Mr. Disraeli was acting in a manner perfectly consistent with all his previous professions. If any vindication of his consistency were necessary it might be found in the famous speech on the Repeal of the Corn Laws—a speech which fills twenty-six columns of Hansard, and occupied more than two hours in its delivery There the Protectionist policy is fully expounded, and there also an overwhelming attack is made upon Peel. "Sir," said Mr. Disraeli, "the right hon. gentleman has been accused of foregone treachery, of long-meditated deception. . . . of always having intended to abandon the opinions by professing which he rose to power. Sir, I entirely acquit the right hon. gentleman of any such intention. I do it for this reason—that when I examine the career of this Minister, who has filled a great space in the Parliamentary history of this country, I find that for between thirty and forty years, from the days of Mr. Horner to the days of the hon. member for Stockport (Mr. Cobden), that right hon. gentlemen has traded on the ideas and intelligence of others. His life has been one great Appropriation Clause. He is a burglar of others' intellect. . . . There is no statesman who has committed political petty larceny on so great a scale." Peel's reply was the insinuation about Lord Beaconsfield's anxiety for office in 1841, which drew from him a distinct denial that he had ever asked for place in any way. He did not, indeed, say that he would not have taken office had it been offered, but he stated what is obviously the fact, that whatever had been done and said had been the work of "another gentleman, whom he supposed to be in the right hon. baronet's confidence." The defence was universally felt to be feeble and incomplete in no ordinary degree. People recalled how in 1819 Peel had appropriated the proposals of Mr. Horner for the resumption of cash payments; how after consistently opposing Catholic Emancipation he had suddenly become its advocate; how, when the enlightened Romilly had struggled to mitigate the rigour of the criminal code, Peel was his ardent opponent, until in 1826 he found an opportunity of associating his name with a measure of humanity; and how, in 1846, after supporting the Corn Laws for twenty years, he became the advocate of their repeal, and appropriated to himself the credit of the work which Mr. Cobden had done. There can be little wonder that the Ministry fell, and that the nation generally attributed no small share of the odium which it incurred to the speeches of the Tory Chief.

During the six years which followed the repeal of the Corn Laws Lord Beaconsfield's position became thoroughly consolidated. The Tory party was split into sections, and whilst Mr. Gladstone, who had been hailed by Macaulay ten years before as the rising hope of the "stern and unbending Tories" cast in his lot with Peel, Mr. Disraeli became the trusted ally of Lord George Bentinck, and the leader of the real Tory party in the House of Commons. The alliance was of infinite service to him, and was commemorated after the untimely and mysterious death of the noble lord by the publication of a biography which, in spite of the critics, is probably the best of its kind in the English language. In 1847 the reward of so many years of labour came to Mr. Disraeli—he was formally recognised as the

and in that capacity was put up to express the views of the Opposition on the Address. No amendment was moved, but, in a luminous and most statesmanlike speech, Mr. Disraeli surveyed the foreign policy of the Government, and expressed the views of the party of which he was the head on the question of the Spanish Marriages, and the extinction of the free state of Cracow by Russia in violation of the Treaty of Vienna. The view of foreign policy which Mr. Disraeli then put forward is not without its interest at the present time. "He had not," he said, "the common jealousy of the influence of France in Spain and Russia in Germany. To suppose that great Powers like France and Russia would not have their own ambition to develope, as England had hers, was to expect the impossible. But what was the use of the power of England except to combat those influences, whether in Spain or elsewhere, if they found them aiming at an inconvenient preponderance? He often heard that peace could only be maintained by a cordial understanding between England and France, or a secret understanding between England and Russia; but peace could be maintained by England alone if she understood her position and did not underrate her power." For the rest of the Session, and indeed up to 1852, Mr. Disraeli played a part by no means conspicuous in the House of Commons. He showed himself a Protectionist indeed, but a Protectionist of a very moderate type, the key-note of his political economy being in effect that, however good and valuable Free Trade might be, it was not a one-sided freedom, and that the producing classes of England were not hampered by extraordinary privileges conferred on foreigners.

The year 1848 ended his career as member for Shrewsbury, for which borough he had been elected on his retirement from Maidstone. Thenceforward the Tory chief was to be —a seat which he held almost without contest until his elevation to the Peerage. Parliament met in September, 1848, with all the din of Continental revolution and insurrectionary movements at home ringing in its ears. France had in part accomplished the third of her revolutions, and Louis Napoleon, whom Mr. Disraeli had with astonishing foresight hailed as Imperator (in a letter to Lady Blessington two years before), was already struggling for the lofty position which he afterwards obtained, though but to lose it at Sedan. At home the Chartists were preparing for war, and Irish disaffection, stimulated by the braggart patriotism of O'Connell and Smith O'Brien, and nourished by domestic miseries of no ordinary kind, seemed ready to break into flame. The misfortune of the country was that the Government was not strong enough for the place. The times were critical, and Lord John Russell was hardly statesman enough to meet them. His reliance was partly on the influence of the Manchester school of politicians, and partly on the prestige of the Whig families. It can hardly be a matter for wonder if such a Ministry should in spite of its numerical majorities have gradually melted away, especially when the Opposition to it was so brilliantly and so ably led. During this period Mr. Disraeli was mainly occupied in building up his own party, and in attacking the Manchester school.

MEMBER FOR BUCKINGHAMSHIRE

The autumn of 1851 witnessed a

GENERAL DISRUPTION OF THE WHIG PARTY

Lord Palmerston, somewhat to the surprise of his friends, had consented to serve with Lord John Russell. The ultimate downfall of the Ministry, however, was less the result of its inherent weakness than of the circumstances connected with the retirement, or rather dismissal, of Lord Palmerston in the autumn of this year. The coup d'état of the 2nd December, 1851, had not been approved by our Government, but it appeared from the statements of Lord John Russell in the House at the opening of Parliament that Lord Palmerston had conveyed through Lord Normanby an assurance of the moral approval of Louis Napoleon's policy by England, upon which Lord John Russell had insisted upon and obtained his colleague's resignation. This was unquestionably the beginning of the end, but another cause was at work in the failure of Lord John Russell's Ecclesiastical Titles Bill—the off-shoot of his famous "Durham Letter" of the past year. The Ministry was in fact rapidly going to pieces, and all Lord John's efforts to maintain his hold upon the country failed. A week later a Ministerial crisis arose on the Militia Bill. The Government had brought in a Bill on this subject of a purely local character, and to such a limitation the House would in no wise submit. On a division on this point the Government was left in a minority of eleven, and Lord John Russell at once resigned.

LORD DERBY

was therefore summoned by her Majesty, and undertook the formation of a Ministry, which came into office in March. In point of ability this Government was essentially a strong one, but the wounds which Peel had inflicted on the Tory party were too deep to be healed so soon, and the seeds of discord were evidently planted when Lord Derby first expounded his policy in the Lords in February. Yet an Administration which included Lords Derby, Lonsdale, St. Leonard's, and Salisbury, the Duke of Northumberland, and Mr. Disraeli, might, it was thought, have held out longer than through one Session, especially when its first proposal was carried in so triumphant a manner. This was a Bill for the national defence by a militia enrolled on principles diametrically opposed to those of the late Government. The attention of the Government to matters of domestic legislation was also favourably received by the country, but the influence of the more extreme economists was thrown into the scale against the Administration. Mr. Disraeli, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, brought in his Budget on the 30th of April, and found it was generally approved, though the Whig organs assured the world that there was nothing in it but the propositions of the Free Traders foisted upon the country by a Protectionist Ministry. The prorogation came before the financial propositions of the Government had been completely discussed, and was immediately followed by a general election. Parliament reassembled in November, but the state of parties appeared to be little altered. The conflict was still between Free Trade and Protection, and on those principles the proposals of the Government were submitted to the severest scrutiny. The debate lasted for four nights, and on the 16th December Mr. Disraeli rose to wind it up on behalf of the Government. His speech was masterly in its grasp of the subject, and displayed powers of dealing with detail of the very highest order, but it was unsuccessful in attaining its great object—the acceptance of the financial policy of the Government by the House. Mr. Disraeli evidently felt as much. The peroration of his speech is an eloquent and indignant refusal to adopt the suggestion of the coalition of the Whigs and Peelites, which then formed the main body of the Opposition, that he should alter his proposals.

That the coalition was successful is a matter of history. That it lasted longer than Mr. Disraeli anticipated is equally certain. On the night to which we have referred Mr. Gladstone followed his rival with one of those objurgatory speeches in which he excels, and having scolded him through a page of Hansard, set to work to demolish his finance. The result was seen in the division list. There was a strong whip on both sides, but the Government could muster only 286 supporters against 305 of their opponents. Lord Derby announced in the House of Lords on the following Monday the resignation of the Government, and Lord Aberdeen was "sent for." All the calculations of the Tory party had been disappointed. They had reckoned upon the support of the Irish brigade and of the independent members, which would together have sufficed to give them an absolute majority in the House of Commons. They had failed, and the consequence was that Coalition Cabinet, which, with a few modifications, carried the country into and out of the Crimean War, and kept the Tories in the cold shade of Opposition until 1858.

During his exile from office Lord Beaconsfield attended diligently in his place in the House, he allied himself with no faction, he gave a loyal and generous support to Lord Palmerston when patriotism required it, and when Dr. Bowring had plunged the country into the costly and useless war about the Chinese Lorcha, Arrow, Mr. Disraeli was one of the strongest opponents of the Ministry. It is true that the appeal to the country reversed the verdict of the House of Commons; it is no less true that the principles for which Mr. Disraeli contended in that debate have become in the main those which regulate the intercourse of this country with her barbarian allies.

THE YEAR 1858

opened somewhat gloomily. The country was only then recovering from the shock of the Indian Mutiny, following as it did close upon the heels of the Crimean War. Parliament, in accordance with a custom which has of late fallen into undeserved desuetude, had met in the autumn, and reassembled on the 4th of February. A few days before Paris had been the scene of a grievous crime—the Orsini conspiracy against the Emperor The Paris press was particularly loud in its declamations against the perfidy of England in allowing conspirators to carry on their nefarious work upon her soil, and the French Government, by allowing these complaints to be reproduced in the Moniteur, appeared to countenance them. On one of the earliest nights of this Session Lord Palmerston had moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws relating to conspiracy to murder, and the notoriously disturbed state of the public mind in France rendered the English public extremely sensitive on this subject. Suspicions were openly expressed in many quarters that the Government intended to sacrifice the dignity of this country to the demands of the French Government under the pretext of a reform of the law, and regardless of the fact that only some six years before a portion of the Press had cried out for a law of precisely this kind, the proposals of Lord Palmerston were from the outset extremely unpopular. On the introduction of the Bill, Mr. Disraeli expressed his opinion that the proposals of the Government were both clumsy and feeble, but at the same time he expressed his intention of voting for the measure, on the ground of its being a mark of national good-will towards France. By the time that it came on for its second reading popular opinion on the subject had intensified itself in no common degree, and when Mr. Milner Gibson, with the support of all the more distinguished members on both sides of the House, moved its rejection, Mr. Disraeli found that he could, without inconsistency, support the motion. When he spoke on the former occasion France had to blame herself only for some acts of indiscretion, for which the Emperor had expressed his regret. Since that time the attitude of the French Government had become one of positive menace to England, and the position of the Government of this country was consequently, in his eyes, one of unworthy subserviency. Lord Palmerston in vain tried to stem the current; a division was called for, and the Government found itself in a minority of 19 in a House of 449. Such an indication of popular feeling could not be evaded. Lord Palmerston at once resigned, and when the House reassembled on the 1st of March, Mr. Disraeli once more took his seat on the Treasury Bench as CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

Lord Derby was Premier; Lord Stanley (the present Earl Derby) had the Colonial Office, and Mr. Walpole the Home; Mr. Henley was at the Board of Trade; Sir Fitzroy Kelly was the Attorney General, and Sir Hugh (now Lord) Cairns Solicitor-General. All the members of the Administration were comparatively unknown men, and displayed their appreciation of their position by abstaining from startling acts of legislation, and by efforts after administrative skill. Mr. Disraeli's budget was of an eminently practical and business-like type. The Income Tax then stood at at 7d. in the pound; he reduced it to 5d., and expressed a strong hope that this impost—which Liberal financiers had described as most "unjust, unequal, and inquisitorial," and which was confessedly a war tax—might eventually be got rid of altogether. To supply the deficiency of revenue thus created he imposed the penny stamp on bankers' cheques, and equalised the duty on spirits, besides making some alterations in the arrangements relating to Exchequer Bills—proposals which even Mr. Gladstone approved. Next after the Budget the most important measure with which Mr. Disraeli was concerned in the Session of 1858 was the Bill for the future government of India. Lord Palmerston had made one attempt at legislation, and his Bill was still before the House. The Government measure (India Bill No. 2) was no more successful than its predecessor, and when the House met after the Easter recess it was evidently doomed. Almost without discussion, and certainly without any opposition from Mr. Disraeli, the House determined to proceed by resolution. The Cabinet accordingly drew up a series of fourteen resolutions, which were proposed by Mr. Disraeli, and which eventually formed the basis of the great measure by which the government of India was vested in the Crown.

THE SESSION OF 1859

opened on the whole favourably for Ministers. The position of the Ministry was indeed far from being a secure one, but it had held its own during the preceding Session in a way which had surprised even its friends and supporters. The state of things was pretty much the same as when Mr. Disraeli and his colleagues came into office in 1852. On all sides there were signs of administrative debility and executive feebleness. When they retired they had certainly spent a considerable amount of money, but they left England strong where she had been weak, and respected by those who had despised her. Of that former tenure of office it is worth while to recall one fact—when Mr. Disraeli became Chancellor of the Exchequer for the first time he found England with an artillery force of fewer than forty guns; when he went out she had a siege train of 200 pieces of artillery, and it was with it that the Crimea was conquered. In the same way we may recall the fact that when he took office for the second time he—treading in the footsteps of his exemplar Pitt—materially reduced the burden of taxation, aided in the resuscitation of our foreign prestige, and gave material assistance in that consolidation of our Indian Empire which was completed on the 1st of January, 1875. Other causes were, however, at work to drive the Conservative party from office. The Liberal chiefs assumed that a further extension of the suffrage was necessary, and a had in consequence been going on for some time. Mr. Disraeli and his chief determined on making an attempt to end the agitation. It would, perhaps, be more correct to say that the Reform Bill of 1859 was the work of Lord Derby, but be that as it may it was the ruin of the Government by which it was introduced. It caused dissensions in the Cabinet, and at a very early date two of its most popular members—Messrs. Henley and Walpole—seceded. On the last day of February Mr. Disraeli brought in his Bill, and it was at once felt that the fate of the Government was sealed. The Bill was not planned on the infallible system of counting heads, and of placing every elector upon a footing of perfect equality with his neighbour. Instead of doing this the Government proposed to give votes to an immense number of persons hitherto excluded from the franchise, and to make that privilege dependent upon such qualifications as the possession of 10*l.* a year in the funds; 60*l.* in a Government Savings' Bank; the receipt of a pension for naval, military, or civil services; a University degree; and the fact of being a minister of religion, a member of a learned profession, or a schoolmaster. In the counties the qualification was to be reduced to a 10*l.* franchise so as to place the rural and urban electors on the same footing. The object of the Bill was in short, as Mr. Disraeli expressed it, to make the representation a mirror of the mind of the country, its agriculture, its manufacturing industry, its commerce, and its professional ability.

THE SECOND READING

came on upon the 21st of March, and the Debate was protracted over seven nights. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer came to sum up before the division he evidently felt that all was over. He defended his Bill, but with the air of one who leads a forlorn hope, and he closed his speech with a calm and dignified recapitulation of what Lord Derby and his colleagues had done for the country during their twelve months' tenure of office. The division which followed showed that the Opposition had a majority of 39 votes in one of the fullest Houses ever known. A of course followed, but when Parliament reassembled it was evident that the Ministry were doomed. No time was lost by the leaders of the Liberal party. The debate on the Address was made the occasion for testing the strength of parties in the House. An amendment was therefore moved by Lord Hartington, and seconded by Mr. Hanbury, which brought up Mr. Disraeli at once. He made a most luminous and brilliant speech in defence of the policy of the Government, but from the first he failed to carry the House with him, and when he sat down it was equally clear that the debate, in spite of the declared anxiety of the Opposition to avoid useless talking, had only begun. Three long nights were spent over this matter, and on the 10th of June, in a House of 613 members, the division was taken, with the result of leaving Ministers in a minority of 13. Eleven days later the Chancellor of the Exchequer formally announced the resignation of himself and his colleagues, and Lord Palmerston took his seat on the Treasury Bench. The new Ministry, like that which Lord Derby had displaced at the beginning of the year, was a Coalition, and included amongst its members both Whigs and Peelites, as well as a small infusion of the more advanced Liberal element. Such as it was, however, it was strong enough to maintain its position with sundry changes for seven years—from 1859 to 1866. On that period it is unnecessary to dwell. Lord Beaconsfield continued to lead the Opposition, but made few speeches of importance, and carefully abstained from all appearance of factious hostility to the existing order of things. His principal efforts were by way of criticism of Mr. Gladstone's financial policy, and in opposition to the form of the commercial treaty with France negotiated by Mr. Cobden and Sir Louis Mallet.

which was based upon a 6*l.* borough franchise. Mr. Disraeli moved the rejection of the Bill in a pungent speech, in which those who care to read between the lines may trace the germ of his own more successful proposals. Unfortunately for the Tory party Lord Beaconsfield's conduct was interpreted by the country generally as implying what he himself had always been most careful to avoid—a distrust of the people—and this fact, coupled with his opposition to Mr. Gladstone's financial policy, with his support of the Lords in their rejection of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duty, with his known antipathy to the unity of Italy, and last but not least with his notorious want of sympathy with the Confederate States in the American Civil War, tended to make him for about four years one of the most unpopular of English statesmen. With consummate wisdom and self restraint, however, he refrained from ad captandum appeals of every kind, and only regained the popularity he had once possessed when, in June and July, 1864, he assailed Lord Palmerston's Government for its apathy with regard to Denmark. On that occasion the policy of the noble lord was affirmed by a majority of 18—"a strict party vote" in American phrase—but there could be no question on which side popular feeling went.

presented few opportunities for active political exertion, the most memorable incident in connection with Mr. Disraeli being the noble and touching tribute which he paid to the memory of his great opponent, Mr. Cobden—a tribute which was the more noticeable from the fact that from the days of the Anti-Corn Law League the Tory chief had never failed to bear witness to the ability and integrity of the leader of the Manchester school.

The question of Reform still blocked the way, and when the Session of 1866 opened the Queen's Speech announced that the Government of the day had prepared a measure, which was eventually brought forward by Mr. Gladstone on the 12th March. The principal features of the Bill were a 14*l.* county franchise; a borough franchise for every person who could show that he had had 50*l.* in a Savings Bank for two years—on the principle of Mr. Disraeli's much-abused "fancy franchises,"—a 7*l.* rental franchise, with provisions for the compound householders and the lodgers. Such a Bill, it was obvious from the first, must fail to satisfy the country, and no little time was wasted over discussions which were notoriously maintained by members who cared little, if anything, for the issue at stake. At last a stand was made upon a question of principle. The Government pinned its faith to a rental franchise, while the Opposition were as strenuous in their support of one based upon rating. An amendment to this effect was brought forward by Lord Dunkellin, and on a division the Government found itself in a minority of 11. It was natural that such a defeat should be accepted by the Administration as the signal for retirement. The death of Lord Palmerston in October, 1865, had practically left the Cabinet of which he was chief without a head. Lord Russell resigned, and was succeeded by Lord Derby, who proceeded to form a very strong Cabinet. Such names as those of Mr. Disraeli, Lords Stanley, Carnarvon, and Cranborne (now the Marquis of Salisbury), General Peel, Sir John Pakington, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Gathorne Hardy, and Sir Hugh (now Lord) Cairns would be a tower of strength to any Government, but it unfortunately happened that the general election of 1865 had given to the Liberal party a small accession of strength, and thus it came to pass that for the third time Mr. Disraeli found himself compelled to take office with a minority to support him in the popular assembly. Outside the House a set of unscrupulous agitators threw every difficulty in the way of good government, and when the Session closed it was with the echoes of the Hyde Park Riots ringing in the ears of a disturbed and uneasy people.

The agitation continued through the winter, and when Parliament met on the 5th of February, 1867, no one was surprised to find that a very prominent place in the Queen's Speech was occupied by the question of the

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE

A week later Mr. Disraeli announced that the Government had determined to proceed by Resolution, and would not by bringing in a Bill make it one of those questions which should decide the fate of the Cabinet, for the simple reason that all parties had attempted to deal with it, and all had alike failed. As a matter of course he was bitterly assailed, members like Mr. Lowe and Mr. Bright forgetting their differences in their vehement opposition to the Government. To add to the perplexities of the Cabinet, three of its most able members, Lord Cranborne, Lord Carnarvon and General Peel, retired on this question, leaving the Ministry (which in this connexion meant Mr. Disraeli) to carry on the arduous work alone. The House having refused to proceed by Resolution, a Bill embodying the substance of those offered by the Government at the opening of the Session was brought in. Every detail was submitted to the severest scrutiny, and if the opponents of the measure agreed in nothing else they were tolerably unanimous in their determination to prevent the passage of the measure if possible. It is, however, unnecessary to go into detail on this subject—suffice it to say that by dint of consummate generalship and judicious concession, by an unwavering courtesy, and by the acceptance of small amendments to which their proposers attached an overweening importance, Lord Beaconsfield succeeded in getting that unhappy obstruction to practical legislative work out of the way, and in passing a popular measure.

Before the end of the Session the question of the

loomed menacingly in the future. Just as after the Reform Act of 1832 the Whigs, so to speak, monopolised Ireland, so now that a fresh arrangement of the franchise had been decided upon, they with their more advanced allies adopted the same tactics. All through the Long Vacation the excitement was kept up. Meetings were held throughout the country, and the utmost was made of the Fenian agitation in Ireland. Lord Russell helped on the movement by the publication of a pamphlet in February, 1868, in which he advocated the concurrent endowment of the Roman and Presbyterian Churches in Ireland and the reduction of the revenues of the Protestant Episcopal Church to one-eighth of their existing amount—an extension of the proposal which he had already made in the House of Lords. In the midst of all the difficulties thus springing up in the path of the Tory Government it received at the close of February what many persons considered its death blow, by the resignation of Lord Derby, in consequence of failing health. In announcing the fact in the House of Lords, Lord Malmesbury stated that Mr. Disraeli had received Her Majesty's commands to form a Ministry, and accordingly on the 27th of February, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had an audience of the Queen, and kissed hands as

FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY

Sundry changes in the constitution of the Ministry were made, notably the substitution of Lord Cairns for Lord Chelmsford in the Chancellorship, and on the 5th of March the new Premier made his first public declaration of policy. He announced that in matters of foreign politics the Government would always seek for peace—not peace at any price, but a peace worthy of a great nation whilst in home affairs he and his colleagues would pursue a liberal policy, "a policy that will not shrink from any changes that are required by the wants of the age we live in, but we will never forget that it is our happy lot to dwell in an ancient and historic country, rich in traditionary influences, that are the best security for order and liberty, and the most valuable element of our national character and our national strength." The new Government had, however, very little opportunity of showing what it could do, for on the 23rd of the same month Mr. Gladstone gave notice of his intention to move the famous three resolutions on the Disestablishment of the Irish Church. The Government protested, and Lord Stanley moved an amendment to the effect that the question was one which ought to be reserved for the consideration of the new Parliament, but to no purpose. The debates commenced on the 30th of March, and were continued with more than common acrimony on both sides until the 3rd of April, when Mr. Gladstone's resolutions were affirmed by a majority of 56. The House went into Committee upon them; public excitement was stimulated to fever heat by meetings in favour of the resolutions, and for the purpose of expressing sympathy with the threatened Church. On the 8th of May the Committee reported, and on the 13th Mr. Gladstone brought in his Bill, suspending for the time the exercise of patronage in the Irish Church. The Government, in spite of the enormous majority against it—a majority which used its power without much mercy in dealing with the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills—refused to abandon its position until it had an opportunity of appealing to the country, and as that appeal could not be made until the sister kingdoms had obtained the advantages of an extension of the franchise, Mr. Disraeli was compelled, sorely against his will, to carry on the Government by a minority. No other business was possible than that implied by these measures, and on the 31st of July Parliament rose. The Queen's Speech was read by the Lord Chancellor, and announced that the dissolution took place thus early in order to enable the country "to reap the benefit of the extended system of representation which the wisdom of Parliament had provided" at the earliest possible date.

All through the later summer and early autumn of this eventful year the excitement continued. Meetings were held throughout the country, and the greatest enthusiasm prevailed on both sides. During the delay rendered necessary by the registrations under the new Acts, the various candidates put forth their election addresses—Mr. Disraeli amongst the rest. This address is more of a State paper than is usual in such cases, and is devoted chiefly to a review of the Irish Church Question.

This address was followed up by a similarly eloquent speech at the hustings, but the fate of the Irish Church and of the Ministry which defended it was sealed. By the end of November it was seen that the Liberal majority was more than double what it had been at the opening of the last Parliament—122 against 60—and on the 2nd of December the resignation of the Government was announced. Mr. Disraeli thus found himself once more in Opposition.

Relieved from the immediate cares of Government the Tory leader returned for a while to his first love, and produced after a long interval of silence the latest and certainly not the worst of his novels. "Lothair" was from the first an unusually successful novel, partly no doubt from the ease with which its readers fancied that they could identify the hero with a well-known Marquis of enormous wealth, who had recently joined the Church of Rome, and partly from the haste with which other so-called "personalities" were detected, but principally from the light which it cast upon its author's views of general politics. The point upon which he insists is the distrust and even aversion which he considers ought to be excited in the mind of every rational Englishman by the advance of the Roman Church and the growth of the Secret Societies. The heroine—Lady Corisande—very early in the story says to Lothair:—"I look on our nobility joining the Church of Rome as the greatest calamity that has ever happened to England; irrespective of all religious considerations, on which I will not presume to touch, it is an abnegation of patriotism, and in this age, when all things are questioned, a love of our country seems to me the one sentiment to cling to." This may fairly be taken as the key note of the story so far as religion is concerned. In like manner the aim of "Lothair" with reference to the Secret Societies is equally clear. The author pays due homage to the purity of motive by which the leaders of the Revolution are animated. He has no reproach for Garibaldi; hardly even a word of severity for Felice Orsini; but he is none the less strenuous in his condemnation of those secret organisations by which the politics of Europe are complicated.

As time went on the

of Mr. Gladstone increased, until about the beginning of 1872 it appeared to have reached its culminating point, especially in the North of England. In Lancashire and Cheshire the policy of the Tory party had indeed always been more or less popular—much more so indeed than was commonly believed—and opportunity was taken by the local party leaders to invite the chief of the Opposition to pay a visit to the Capital of Cotton for the purpose of expounding his views and policy. Mr. Disraeli accordingly visited Manchester, and encountered such a reception as seldom falls to the lot of a public man in this country. On arriving in the city on the afternoon of Easter Monday—a day which is all but universally observed in the manufacturing districts as a holiday—he was welcomed by a multitude of some thirty or forty thousand persons, chiefly working men, who filled the railway station, and lined the road from it to the house of Mr. Romaine Callender, afterwards the Conservative member for Manchester, in the outskirts of the town. The enthusiasm of the crowd was overwhelming. The horses were taken from the carriage and some hundreds of men took their places. On the Wednesday—the intervening day having been occupied in receiving addresses from the various Constitutional and Conservative Associations of the county, numbering some half-million of electors or more—Mr. Disraeli delivered amidst the most astonishing enthusiasm one of the finest orations he ever uttered, to a crowded audience in the Free Trade Hall. The main point of the speech was to counsel patience to his followers. After a scathing denunciation of the tactics of the Ministry and of the party which it represented, and after stating for the first time in public what is now known to be an undoubted fact—that the Crimean War would never have happened had Lord Derby remained in office in 1852—Mr. Disraeli reviewed the conduct of Mr. Gladstone's Government in submitting to the breach of the Treaty of Paris, "and in the form of a Congress guaranteeing their own humiliation." The future policy of the Conservative party was briefly indicated. "If I may venture to give such a hint," said the speaker, "let us take care not to allow ourselves to be made to any extent the tools of the ambition or of the discontent of extreme politicians on either side. I will tell you what I mean. It may very likely be the game of the Radical party to try and turn out the present Ministry if they can, and to put a Conservative Government in its place, that Conservative Government being in a minority, hoping that by so doing they shall be able to reconstruct their own party upon a new platform pledged to more extreme and more violent measures, and then to have a Cabinet formed of the most thoroughgoing Radicals. These may be their tactics, but just because it is their game it ought not to be ours."

The event proved the wisdom of the Tory policy as thus expounded.

THE SESSION OF 1873

opened with a Speech from the Throne, in which a prominent place was given to the question of Irish University Reform. When the Bill was introduced it was found to embody all the clauses to which objection had been taken on former occasions together with a few new ones, apparently designed to gratify the rapidly increasing ambition of the Irish Ultramontanes. The governing body of the institution which was designed to take over the endowments and the charter of Trinity College was to become co-optative in the course of a short time, and elaborate arrangements were proposed by which the majority would speedily be composed of the nominees of Cardinal Cullen; whilst for the further conciliation of the Roman Catholics it was proposed to curtail the University curriculum by the omission of Mental and Moral Philosophy. Naturally such a proposal was received with the greatest possible dissatisfaction, not merely by the Conservative party, but by those advanced Liberals who are mainly solicitous to divorce Education from Religion. Of this latter party Professor Fawcett, until that time an earnest supporter of Mr. Gladstone, made himself the spokesman, and when, at two o'clock on the morning of the 12th April, the House divided on the second reading, the Government was left in a minority of three. Mr. Disraeli made on this occasion one of his most brilliant speeches. Having analysed the Bill in some little detail he taunted Mr. Gladstone with having mistaken the voice of the Nonconformists for the voice of the nation, and went on:—"You have now had four years of it. You have despoiled Churches, you have threatened every corporation and every endowment in the country. You have examined into everybody's affairs, you have criticised every profession and vexed every trade. Nobody is certain of his property; nobody knows what duties he may have to perform to-morrow." The result was what might have been anticipated. At the morning sitting of the 13th Mr. Gladstone announced his resignation, while Mr. Disraeli, as he was entering the House, received a summons to Windsor. In his subsequent explanation he stated that he had expressed his readiness to form an Administration, but that in accordance with the views he had more than once expressed he would not attempt to do so with a House of Commons in which his party would be distinctly in a minority. In the end Mr. Gladstone was informed that the Opposition would not attempt to form a Government, thus throwing upon his shoulders the onus of the inevitable general election. A dissolution of Parliament at the close of the Session was consequently looked for on all sides. Mr. Gladstone and his supporters had been so bitter in their criticisms upon Mr. Disraeli's assumed unwillingness to go to the country in the spring that some difficulty was found in understanding the delay on this occasion. The only feasible explanation appeared to be that the Liberal party had nothing upon which to go to the country besides the Irish University Bill, and were afraid to risk their existence upon so unpopular a proposal. Mr. Disraeli himself held his peace, only breaking silence in the month of October, when, on the occasion of the Bath election, he addressed a letter to Lord Grey de Wilton, in the course of which he said that "for nearly five years the present Ministers have harassed every trade, worried every profession, and assailed or menaced every class, institution, and species of property in the country. Occasionally they have varied this state of civil warfare by perpetrating some job which outraged public opinion, or by stumbling into mistakes which have been always discreditable and sometimes ruinous." An attack of this kind naturally brought down a storm of vituperation on the head of the Tory chief, who, as usual, maintained a strict silence until he could speak with effect.

In November of this year he was chosen by the students of Glasgow University to fill the office of and received in that city a welcome second to none save to that which had been given to him by Manchester eighteen months before. The usual address to the students was wholly non-political in its character, and was such as might have been expected from a veteran littérateur.

Throughout the autumn and early winter the signs of an impending dissolution became more frequent. Changes in the Cabinet were numerous, and when towards the close of the year a batch of four new peers was announced it was felt that the beginning of the end had come. Nothing, however, was done until the 24th of January, 1874, when Mr. Gladstone, to the surprise of everybody, issued an address to his constituents—which was first given to the world in the Sunday papers—announcing the immediate dissolution of Parliament as the result of the Cabinet Council of the day before, and promising to abolish the Income Tax. Mr. Disraeli's address to the electors of Buckinghamshire appeared two days later, and struck the key-note of the innumerable election addresses which were forthwith issued all over the country. He began by a sarcastic reference to Mr. Gladstone's "violation of constitutional law" in persisting in retaining for several months a seat to which he was no longer entitled; he went on to complain of the unprecedented and inconvenient course adopted by the Government in calling Parliament together for the despatch of business, and then dissolving it before its meeting; he criticised Mr. Gladstone's "prolix narrative" with gentle sarcasm, and promised more attention to foreign affairs and less vigour in domestic interference; whilst in conclusion he expressed his opinion that it would be desirable to await the working of the Reform and Ballot Acts before venturing upon that scheme of lowering the county franchise which Mr. Gladstone had borrowed from Mr. Otto Trevelyan.

THE GENERAL ELECTION OF 1874

was carried on with unusual vehemence, but on all sides it was evident from the first that the sympathies of the country were on the side of Mr. Disraeli. For the first time in his life he found himself in the position of a really popular leader, and that without having sacrificed one iota of principle, or deviated from the programme which he had laid down for himself at the commencement of his long political career. His election speeches were lively and vigorous, and as we glance over them after an interval of more than four years we can see that they are full of the consciousness of approaching triumph. Nothing in this way is more amusing than his bantering attack upon his persistent assailant, Mr. Lowe. "Were it not for me," said Mr. Disraeli at Newport Pagnell, "the London University would not have had a member. Everybody was opposed to it. My colleagues did not much like it; the Conservative party did not much like it; but more strange than anything else the whole Liberal party were ready to oppose it. But I, with characteristic magnanimity, said to myself, 'Unless I give a member to the London University Mr. Lowe cannot have a seat.' It was then impossible for him, and probably still is, to show himself upon any hustings with safety to his life. I said to myself, "There is so much ability lost to England,' and I pique myself always upon upholding and supporting ability in every party, and wherever I meet it; and I also said to myself, 'One must have an eye to the main chance. If I keep Mr. Lowe in public life—and this is his only chance—I make sure that no Cabinet, if it be brought into power by an overwhelming majority, can long endure and long flourish if he be a member of it,' and, gentlemen, I think what took place perfectly justified my prescience." This speech will probably suffice to prove that Mr. Disraeli's humorous faculty is at least as great as his wit. In the hour of triumph the latent humour breaks out. For that hour came at last. The struggle which began in 1832 ended with the General Election of 1874. On the 17th of February, without waiting for the assembling of the new Parliament, Mr. Gladstone at last gave up the seals of office, and Mr. Disraeli becomes once more but this time with a majority of more than 50 at his back. For two years he led the House of Commons with consummate tact and discretion. His wonderful knowledge of human nature—a knowledge exhibited not less in his novels than in the events of life—had enabled him to gather around him a body of Ministers, many of whom were wholly new to official life, but all of whom have by what they have done since their appointment fully approved his choice. The fatigues of leadership, however, told upon him considerably. It might be possible to withstand the direct attacks of opponents, but the tactics of the Opposition wearied and disgusted him. No one was therefore greatly surprised when it was announced two years ago that, although retaining his place as First Minister of the Crown, the House of Commons would know him no more, and that, resigning the leadership of that House to Sir Stafford Northcote, he would take his place as Lord Privy Seal in the Upper Chamber. The title of which he adopted were in every way appropriate. All his life long he had loved the "county of statesmen," and his speeches to his constituents have seldom failed to contain allusions to its greatness and to the associations bound up with it. The former title had, too, a special attractiveness in it that it had been borne during the last few years of her life by her whom he once described as "the most severe of critics, but a perfect wife," whilst the latter was specially appropriate from the fact that Hughenden Manor had been his home for many years.

Although retired to the comparative seclusion of the Upper House, Lord Beaconsfield has exercised a very visible influence over the conduct of affairs in the Lower. His lieutenants there have seconded him with rare ability and devotion, and the result is to be seen in the fact that although opposed with a factiousness and an unfairness for which it would be hard to find a parallel in the history of party, the position of the Government is actually stronger now, after well nigh five years of office, than it was on the day when for the first time in his life the First Minister of the Crown found himself in office with a sufficient majority. Into the details of his policy on the Eastern Question it is not necessary now to enter. The facts have been too recently before the world to need any elaborate recapitulation. It will suffice, therefore, to remind the reader that when the Session of 1876 was rapidly waning the news of the severities used in the suppression of the Bulgarian insurrection reached this country. The stories told were unquestionably very terrible, and they were forthwith taken up by certain impulsive politicians, who accepted the wildest tales as veritable gospel, and who denounced the more cautious Minister as an incarnation of all that was heartless and insensible, because he supported the servants of the Crown, and refused to alter the policy of the Empire at the orders of a statesman out of office, and of one or two energetic newspaper correspondents attached to the opposite party. For a while all the old and undeserved unpopularity of the great chief of the Tories seemed to have returned. On all hands his name was coupled with disparaging epithets and his personal character assailed with the grossest calumny. Even the journals of his own party—confessedly not the most intelligent organs of public opinion in existence—wavered in their allegiance and when he announced plainly that the "interests of England" held the first place in his mind, there was a general outcry against his insensibility to the enthusiasm of humanity. Gradually, but certainly, however, public opinion veered in the direction of the statesman who has best in this century exemplified the truth of Mr. Carlyle's favourite proposition that if "speech is silvern silence is golden." Without any striving or crying out, without any public meetings or letters to the journals, or post cards to anxious constituents, Lord Beaconsfield succeeded in winning the people of this country over to his side. By a policy equally bold and prudent, he secured the support of the nation, and when the prospects of an amicable settlement of existing difficulties appeared to be darkest, he took a step which drove from his side the two weakest members of his Cabinet, and left him free to pursue the courageous line of action which has given to this country the greatest treaty since the Peace of Utrecht—a Treaty which assures the interests of England in the Ottoman Empire, which provides for the safety and good government of the Christian subjects of the Porte, and which guarantees as never has been guaranteed before our Indian Empire against Russian aggression. His Knighthood of the Garter has been honourably earned.

An achievement such as this is perhaps enough to establish the fame of any one statesman. But Lord Beaconsfield has even higher claims on posterity than even this great work implies. He began life under almost every conceivable disadvantage. He was the representative of an unpopular race and the advocate of an eminently unpopular political creed; he was in matters of literature unfortunate from his association in early life with a thoroughly and deservedly unpopular clique; in later years he has been in opposition to two of the most popular of English statesmen; and yet in spite of every difficulty he has contrived to live down his opponents, and by dint of patience, courage, inexhaustible temper, and knowledge of the world to reconstruct the old national party of England, and to restore her waning prestige. Still it may be open to question whether posterity will recognise him by the title which he has adopted. Bacon is Bacon to the end of the chapter, and never Lord Verulam; the Great Commoner is Pitt, and never the Earl of Chatham. So probably will it be now. His country will remember the Earl of Beaconsfield by the name by which he was known during so many years of struggle and of difficulty, rather than by the title with which he strove to identify himself in the eyes of his neighbours with his "perfect wife." The desire to do so was unquestionably natural, but to the people of that country which he has served so faithfully and loved so well the chief of the Tory party will be always not LORD BEACONSFIELD, but BENJAMIN DISRAELI.

THE READER

"EARLY HISTORY OF VICTORIA," by F. P. Labilliere (2 vols. : S. Low and Co.).—It is hard sometimes to realise that eighty years ago the very coast-line of Australia was rather guessed than known; that the question whether what is now Victoria did or did not form one peninsula with the adjacent island of Tasmania, was still among the unsettled problems of geography. Cook had sailed eastward up the coast, and left the difficulty still unsolved. Furneaux, discoverer of Furneaux Group, had given the weight of his name to the peninsula theory. Not till the adventurous whale-boat voyage, in which Bass met the heavy seas which could only have rolled in from the Southern Ocean, not till he and Flinders, in another year, had completely sailed around Tasmania, and Murray, four years later still, had discovered the splendid harbour of Port Phillip, could the shores of Victoria be described as thoroughly explored; while thirty years more were to pass away ere the inland ranges were even imperfectly mapped out, and the white man formed there his first permanent settlement. It is for its narrative of these early days that Mr. Labilliere's history of Victoria, from its discovery to its constitution as a self-governing province, will chiefly claim the attention of the reader. Mr. Labilliere's volumes take us at once to the fountain head—to stores of Admiralty and colonial records, ipsissima verba of first discoverers—and thus of constituting what may fairly be called our first "complete and authentic account of the colonisation of the province." Nor are these rough and early records by any means uninteresting as narratives. The log-books of Bass and Flinders, of Grant and Murray, the inland explorations of Hume and Hovell, Sturt and Mitchell, the early settlements of Henty, Batman, Fawkner, are the very types of colonial romance. Barren honour, if even that, was too often, we fear, the sole reward. Of Bass, the story goes that he died a captive in the South American mines. Flinders, for eight years a prisoner of the French, had to contest with his captors the priority of his discoveries. Murray—the "sober, capable," and illiterate—disappears wholly from our history. That constitutional timidity in high quarters which delayed, in our own time, the annexation of Fiji, and still delays—we quote Mr. Labilliere—the annexation of New Guinea, was a sad drawback for the early colonists. The two first official attempts to settle Port Phillip are soon given up. Mr. Henty, who goes there later on his own account, is rudely snubbed when petitioning for a Government grant of the land he is bringing into cultivation—he is only doing harm by "dispersing the population," and adding to the police expenses of the country. As a contrast to this, we may notice some few years later Lord John Russell's answer to the French inquiry, what portions of the Australian continent Great Britain claimed as her own—the reply of the Colonial Office being simply "the whole." With the rapid increase of emigration, not long after this date the romance of Victorian history rather comes to an end. One must be Colonial by birth or by adoption fully to enjoy the tale of the Port Phillip Association, of the separation from New South Wales, of the good deeds of Governor La Trobe, or of the years of long prosperity in which—saving the first rush to the gold-fields—the disasters of Black Thursday and of the Ballarat Riots seem, looking back, the only things noticeable.

If not a work of literary excellence, a "Search for Fortune". (Daldy, Isbister, and Co.), by Hamilton Lindsay-Bucknall, is very readable—and so full of bustle and adventure, of an Irishman's luck in either hemisphere, that few will put it down without skimming its pages for the story to the end. The author, too, to take him as he paints himself, is quite of a class to enlist our sympathies—good shot, bold rider, moderately clever, though not hard worker enough for the prizes of competition, ready to face each mood of fortune, to serve as private if he may not be officer, to do anything, in fact, but lounge at home and wait (as Irish gentlemen used to wait) for the vague promise of "a place under Government." His search, it is true, has not ended yet, though its successive stages, from wood-cutting in the New Zealand bush at five shillings a day to the possession of a concession from the Brazilian Government, on which 20 per cent. will be earned so soon as the indispensable capitalist advances the preliminary 930,000*l.*, have about them a grandiose sense of progress as good almost as money-down to an imaginative man.

A clever, kindly, restless man, inventor, when only twenty-two, of a galvanic battery, which attained great popularity as at once cheap and simply worked, surgeon of some repute, especially as an oculist, originator of the new form of printing Bank of England notes, author of at least one pleasant volume, "My Garden," and of one, "The Mind of Man," whereof few have read beyond the opening chapter, writer of letters and of pamphlets on all imaginable subjects, from the "Aphis Vastator" to "Unseaworthy Ships," Mr. Smee, the late surgeon to the Bank of England, is quite as deserving of an admiring biographer as half the subjects of our modern memoir. And in his daughter, author of "Memoir of Alfred Smee, F.R.S." (G. Bell and Sons), he has found a biographer not less graceful than affectionate. It is a pleasing memoir even for those who knew nothing of its hero, while the general arrangement—one third biography, and two-thirds selected extracts from Mr. Smee's lectures and writings—is well adapted to tell us in moderate compass all that we can possibly want to know of his position and his work in society and in philosophy.

"A Town Garland," by Henry S. Leigh (Chatto and Windus).—Everybody who admires light lyrical verse either knows or ought to know Mr. Leigh's "Carols of Cockayne." They are brimful of fun, and the verse in which they are composed trips along in the most delightful musical fashion, as if there were crotchets and quavers in every dip which Mr. Leigh takes from his inkstand. The present volume is as rhythmically faultless as its predecessor; and, although there is scarcely so much freshness in the topics selected for versification, this is scarcely to be wondered at when we remember that no man has an unlimited stock of really "happy thoughts." Some of the conceits are, however, very ingenious—as, for example, that of the clock, hitherto a model of punctuality, but which would so like to "go a little wrong." In point of versification, where all is so admirable, it is difficult to select a specimen of special excellence; but nothing in its way could be much better than "The Bard's Legacy," "Life's Playthings," "September in Town," and "Bradshaw's Guide." Mr. Leigh possesses two rare merits—he is never tedious, and never too long. He always leaves off at the right moment.

Jenkinson's "Practical Guide to North Wales" (E. Stanford).—Mr. Jenkinson, like his German compeer, Baedeker, contrives to combine fulness of detail and accuracy of facts with considerable conciseness of expression. Heretofore English guide-books have too often been compiled by local enthusiasts, who not only wrote in a flowery, diffuse, and exaggerated style, and were apt to magnify molehills into mountains, but who also neglected to impart just that very necessary information of which tourists stand in need. Hence Mr. Jenkinson's several guides to the English Lakes, the Isle of Man, and the Isle of Wight, were at once hailed with public approbation. The best compliment we can pay to the present volume is that we wish it had been published six weeks ago when we were ourselves touring in North Wales. We have examined with especial interest the portions referring to our own route, and we there find just what we then wanted to know, and which we had to pick up from hearsay, or not attain to at all. Mr. Jenkinson tells us that he has personally visited every place mentioned, and his pages bear the stamp of this self-obtained knowledge. The preliminary essays on Geology, Botany, Angling, &c., are terse and to the point, and altogether we say deliberately that this is the best Guide Book to North Wales which has yet appeared.

The New Quarterly Magazine. The accomplished writer who assumes the name of John Latouche has perhaps done more to make Portugal known to Englishmen than any other living author, and here we have from his pen a delightful description of country life in that kingdom. We should wonder how Mr. Hardy obtained such high repute as a writer of fiction were we to judge of him by the novelette here published. His heroine is a very forward puss, and, for a girl of seventeen (vide her remarks about ambition), she talks in an unnaturally stilted style, nor does the character of the young schoolmaster inspire much interest. We venture to hint to Mr. Hardy that such expressions as "to habitually think," "to heroically set forth," &c., are, to say the least of it, inelegant, and when he tells us how his hero was walking along Piccadilly "one warm fashionable day," we are reminded of the historian who described George III. as "bald but obstinate."—Mr. Arthur Arnold is well worth reading on "Socialism." He shows what is the objectionable species of Socialism—for there is a Socialism which is the very salt of the earth—and the true way of combating it.

New Novels

"JUNIA," by the author of "Estelle Russell," &c. (3 vols. : Blackwood).—This is about as essentially dismal a novel in three volumes as it has ever been our fortune to come across. Junia Berrington is, indeed, one with whom things from first to last "go contrairy," and the author displays quite a perverse ingenuity in discovering thorns to plant in her heroine's path. Even on the first evening that we are introduced to Junia in her Florentine home, a bright and beautiful girl of seventeen, we are taught to see that the shadow of coming trouble and sorrow is impending over her. First, her father loses his fortune and dies, and the lover who has gained her girlish affections proves false and mercenary. Then she goes to England, and ultimately becomes a governess, enduring all the hardships and indignities that fall to the lot of the governess of fiction. In just resentment at an impertinent familiarity on the part of the father of her charges, she throws up her situation, and, whilst seeking in vain for another, is reduced to such straits that she is nearly dying of sheer starvation. The stage presents itself as the only opening for her, and she achieves a wonderful success as a burlesque actress, suffering all the while agonies of shame and distress from outraged modesty. Then the twin brother, for whose sake she has sacrificed her life, and put from her the love she yearned for, intimates that he is about to form new ties for himself, and Junia finds that she must be content with the second place in his heart. Even when she is at last married, and things might be well with her, her husband thinks her unloving because she is abstracted, and seems without interest in his work and aims, and she only convinces him of her love to die suddenly in his arms, worn out by unhappiness and the toils of a career not only uncongenial, but detested. We quite allow that we have an intimation of what is before us even in the introductory chapter; and that the author shows no little skill in the construction of her plot, making us feel how one mischance leads necessarily to another, till a chain is forged too strong to be resisted or escaped from by a woman such as Junia Berrington, with little worldly wisdom, and with impulses of honour and rectitude that make her shrink not from actual deceit only, but even from a suppressio veri. Yet, after reading such a tale, we cannot but ask, cui bono? It is ably told; but it wants the grandeur and elevation of true tragedy—wants, that is, precisely the beauty which renders the contemplation of true tragedy purifying and ennobling, and saves it from being merely painful.

"Love or Lucre," by Robert Black (3 vols. : Bentley).—It must surely be owing to the promptings of some evil genius that Mr. Robert Black has been moved to select such a personage as Mr. Triggs, otherwise "trusty Thomas," the "self-made man," as the central figure of his story. The man is a fine animal, and not dishonest as the commercial world counts dishonesty; but this is the very utmost that can be said for him. That he is altogether illiterate and unrefined goes, of course, without the saying; but he is, besides, coarse, mean, grasping, and sordid; brutally callous to the feelings of others; ready to cringe or bully, as the occasion may require; and spiteful and cruel if provoked. Yet we are to suppose that he has gained the love, not only of the high-minded and refined little dressmaker, Leila, but of Marietta Pritt, the elder daughter of his employer, who has at least been brought up as a lady, and shows herself in the end possessed both of intelligence and true womanly feeling. In the earlier portions of the story, indeed, both she and her sister, Lurline, are as unattractive as heroines as Triggs is as a hero, being ladies who affect the songs assigned to la grande Duchesse de Gerolstein, and seem in moral tone, in respect to what Mr. Black describes as "physical warmth and exuberance," much on a par with that reprehensible potentate. At the same time, we may admit that the story, repulsively unpleasant as much of it is, is told not without some power and skill, it is readable, and there is good enough in Mr. Black to induce us to think that, with a better subject, he might do much better.

"A French Heiress in Her Own Château," by the author of "One Only," &c. (Sampson Low, Marston, and Co.).—There is much of the author's wonted thoughtfulness and grace of style in this story, though we can hardly consider it the equal of such finished compositions as "One Only" and "Constantia." It seems partly intended as an apology for the French system of marriage-making, and, of course, it is easy for the author, having full control over all attendant circumstances, to show triumphantly how in many cases it answers better that young people should have their lot in life arranged for them by those older and wiser than themselves. But, besides the French marriage which turns out so happily, there is another love affair, conducted more after the English fashion, between a young English sailor and a French demoiselle of high rank, and it is on this, perhaps, that the chief interest of the tale really hinges. The pictures we get here of the French noblesse and their ways are very sympathetically and effectively executed, and we have some charming bits of "word-painting" in descriptions of old-fashioned French towns and châteaux, and the pleasant scenery of Anjou.

"Miles: a Town Story," by the author of "Fan" (Samuel Tinsley).—This is a clever and well-written tale of artisan life, principally intended, we should imagine, for the benefit of the young; but one which many an adult may read not without some amusement and interest. The workshop scenes are given with much spirit, and seem to show a real acquaintance with the thoughts and ways of the "working man." Perhaps Miles Beeton, the good youth, is somewhat too irreproachably good, and Fred Halkett, the bad youth, too unmitigatedly self-seeking and conceited; but such broad contrasts are only what must be expected in tales like this, which have the inculcation of a moral lesson as their avowed end.

The "output" of novels—to borrow a word from the coal trade—it is well known has long been increasing, whilst neither have the years of a reviewer's life been prolonged, nor the space at his disposal enlarged in proportion. This being so, we must confine ourselves to acknowledging the receipt of the following works, which we do not profess to have examined exhaustively, but concerning which we think we know enough to entitle us to state that, though they are quite free from any offences against morality or good taste, they are none of them of a character to call for detailed notice:—

"Riversdale Court," by Mrs. Forrest-Grant, author of "Fair, but Not Wise," &c. (3 vols. : Samuel Tinsley); "Littledale," by Sejanus (3 vols. : Tinsley); "How Will It End," by the author of "Willy Morgan and Other Tales" (2 vols. : Charing Cross Publishing Company); "Ups and Downs, a Family Chronicle," by Annie S. Swan (Charing Cross Publishing Company); "The Fair Maid of Taunton: a Tale of the Siege," by Elizabeth M. Alford (Samuel Tinsley); "In Tropic Seas: a Tale of the Spanish Main," by W. Westall, author of "Tales and Legends of Saxony and Lusatia" (Samuel Tinsley); "Post Hiems Ver," by Ada Montague (Harrison and Sons); "Revenge is Sweet," by Alice Evezard (Charing Cross Publishing Company).

Author of "A Charming Fellow," "Aunt Margaret's Trouble," "Black Spirits and White," &c.

I worked hard at a study for the picture I had contemplated making, and for which I had found an admirable model. I also made several studies of landscape. One of these latter was at the ruins of the Villa of Quinctilius Varus, a mile or so from Tivoli. I used to walk thither in the early morning with no other escort than a black-eyed barefoot urchin whom I had engaged to carry my camp-stool and easel. Once or twice Lucy had accompanied me, and we had eaten our luncheon there, sitting under a gnarled olive-tree, and looking over the matchless panorama. But she found the walk too fatiguing to make it frequently;—what a pang it gave me to hear her say so, and to assure myself from anxious observation of her languid gait and pale face that it was but too true!—and so I spent many a morning there without her. She, meanwhile, passed the time of my absence chiefly in the Villa d'Este. There she was safe from intruders, and could wander about the grounds, or sit still with her book or her work in the shade. The old housekeeper at the Villa d'Este was a great friend of mine, and used to assure me, every time I gave her a small present of money proportioned to my humble purse, that my sister was an angel, and that she (the housekeeper) would not fail to look after her. Let her come to the gardens as often and stay as long as she would! I do not know what more the good woman could have said, for ten times the money.

We had been at Tivoli about a week when one morning my little model came to me in a state of great excitement. She was a girl of fourteen, and looked, to English eyes, three or four years older; a handsome creature, with glorious eyes and rich masses of coarse blue-black hair, but with a skin parched and sickly from fever, which she had suffered from severely. Her home was on the borders of the Pontine Marshes, in the very stronghold of malaria, and she had been sent to stay with a relative who lived in Tivoli, in order to regain her health. I had heard of her from Signor Sandro, who had often employed an elder sister of hers, a professional model, in Rome. My little Monica was not a professional model, but she was just what I wanted for my picture, fever-blanched skin, and all! She looked sad, pathetic, poetic; but the charm vanished the instant she opened her mouth to speak. She had the harsh, hoarse, bawling voice which belongs to so many Roman women of her class, and the matter of her speech did not compensate for its manner. She was the most ignorant and undisciplined human creature I had ever known; but probably she was not below the level of her compeers in those respects. Such as her character was, she revealed it as undisguisedly as any wild animal. Her very lies—and she never scrupled to utter one, if it suited her at the moment,—were of a wholly incredible and inartificial kind; and the detection of them embarrassed her not a whit, although it sometimes put her in a passion!

To me one morning came this unsophisticated young person in a violent excitement, as I have said. She was even paler than usual, her black brows were bent into a frown, and she clenched her sunburnt fist, and kept muttering to herself in a fierce spasmodic way.

"This will not do, Monica," said I. "If you are so restless, and put on that demoniac look, you are not of the least use to me. Sit still, and leave off frowning."

She shrugged her shoulders impatiently, but obeyed for a minute or so. Then the gesticulations and mutterings and general air of ferocity began again. I threw down my brush. "Very well, Monica," I said quietly, "you are not disposed to earn your money this morning, I see. As you please. Only pray understand that I cannot afford to pay you for wasting my time with your antics. I am not a rich Signore, but a poor artist."

Monica jumped up, and kicked over the stool on which she had been sitting, with a violent imprecation. "I care nothing for your miserable money!" she cried. "I can't sit still. My blood is boiling in my veins."

"You are extremely silly, Monica. And you don't speak the truth, either. You care a great deal for my money."

She paused in her furious tearing about the room, and stared at me curiously. My tone of cool indifference always had some influence with her,—simply, I believe, because it puzzled her. The violence of her passion had not been affected, any more than the passion of a little child is affected, whom yet one can divert from its wrath and its screams by holding up any new object before its eyes. With Monica, as with the infant, there were no inner depths of the spirit to be profoundly stirred; and consequently her storms of emotion were brief, and left no ground-swell behind them.

"Come," said I, "sit down there whilst I sketch in this background, and tell me what is the matter. Perhaps you will be able to be quiet when you have said your say."

The idea seemed to please her. "Yes, yes; I will tell you. It will take a weight from my heart. Listen, Signorina!"

Monica's "saying her say" involved so many rambling parentheses, so much violent language, and general incoherence, that I must condense her statement to me. It was this:—

Some years previously her brother—much older than she—had been sent to the galleys. He had had a narrow escape of being executed, indeed, for it was in the "time of the priests," as Monica phrased it, when malefactors used actually to be killed and made an end of. Not that Pasquale was a malefactor! By no means. He was an excellent young man, the pride of his family; but he had had the misfortune to allow his feelings to get the better of him, and,—in a word, he had attempted to murder a gentleman, and would have succeeded, but that his gun missed fire. And the gentleman had never rested until Pasquale was caged by the myrmidons of the law, declaring (with some reason, it should appear) that his life was not safe whilst that impetuous youth was at large.

At this point of her story, Monica paused, expecting sympathy. I was obliged to disappoint her, and to explain that in my country we had a strong objection to assassins.

"Assassins!" she cried indignantly, "but Pasquale was no assassin; it was a vendetta! A vengeance from jealousy,—love jealousy."

I could not say that this altered the case so as to make Pasquale an entirely admirable hero in my eyes; but I was curious to know how the gentleman (whom Monica described as a grand Signore, a great nobleman, rich, and proud, and splendid) could have been a rival to her brother, the peasant. She explained the matter without circumlocution. Pasquale had had a sweetheart whom he meant to marry some day. This sweetheart,—a strikingly beautiful girl, according to Monica's account,—had loved, or seemed to love, Pasquale, until one fine day her affections were captivated by the noble gentleman in question, who carried her off to Rome with him, and after a short time abandoned her. Pasquale, who had been for some weeks deceived and hoodwinked, both by his faithless inamorata and her seducer, no sooner discovered the truth than he tried to kill the nobleman. What could be more natural? And then Pasquale—poveretto—had been hunted for days and days by the giandarmi (gend'armes), and caught at last, and sent to the galleys. What a pity that he had not sent a bullet into the traitor's heart first! That would have been some consolation under the suffering of imprisonment; but as it was, Pasquale's case was really too hard, and calculated to awaken the deepest sympathy!

Such was Monica's story, and such her view of it.

And what, I asked, had become of Pasquale? Oh, he had escaped from the galleys after about a year and a half. But as to what he had been doing since, or where he had been, Monica either could not, or would not, give any information. He had been "in the Abruzzi," she said vaguely. Indeed, she believed he had crossed the sea to Sicily. She did not know where Sicily was, but it was a long, long way off. You see, Pasquale could not come home to his old place, because the accursed police would put him in prison again if they caught him. Poor Pasquale!

And the girl whom he had loved? Oh, about her Monica knew nothing. And the fine nobleman? Ah he, the traitor, the wretch, the miscreant, who had set on the giandarmi to hunt down poor Pasquale and put him in prison, he was alive, he was flourishing, he was brave with sleek clothes and a gold chain, and a horse that shone like satin! She (Monica) had seen him that very morning in Tivoli, as she crossed the Piazza. She was but nine years old when poor Pasquale had the misfortune to attempt his murder, but she remembered his face well,—well. Might he die assassinated!

"Then it was the sight of this gentleman that put you into such a ferment?" I said.

Truly it was. What else? But now she had spoken, her heart was lighter. She felt easier. But she did not want to see that villain again. The sight of him caused her to "make bad blood." And what could she do? Pasquale was away no one knew where. She could only hope and pray that the saints would pour down evils and misfortunes on the head of that traitor, for he seemed to be beyond the reach of earthly vengeance—more was the pity!

I mused over this story and the strange scene of Monica's violence as I walked down, a little later, to the Villa d'Este to meet Lucy, and bring her home to dinner. "What a curious savage the girl is!" thought I. And then I began to consider her from a professional point of view, and to think of making a study of her face in its unrestrained fury, and calling it "Vendetta!" It might not, however, be easy to bring her passion, on that score, up to the boiling point again. "And even if I could do it," I said to myself, "the experiment would be something like irritating a vigorous young tiger, with the view of studying him in his wrath. There's no reckoning on what she might do!"

Lucy met me near the gate of the gardens, and to my surprise I found she was not alone. She was in company with an elderly priest, who took off his great shovel hat and saluted me with much politeness.

"This gentleman,—Don Gregorio Galli," said Lucy, "is a friend of the Princess Corleoni. When he heard that we knew the Princess, he was kind enough to offer to be of service to us here."

"In any way,—in any way in my power, Signorina," said Don Gregorio. "You are strangers in Tivoli. Pray let me know if I can give you help or information of any kind. And how was Monsignor Chiappaforti when you left Rome? A man of very distinguished talent,—a shining light. Ah, Rome is his true sphere. There his abilities are appreciated. At one time there was a chance of my getting a parish in Rome myself, but circumstances have kept me here. Well, well, we must try to do our duty in our humble way. I shall do myself the pleasure to come and see you, Signorina; meanwhile I have the honour to salute you."

Then Don Gregorio walked off one way, whilst we pursued the other. He was a meagre, feeble-looking old man, with a weak, self-complacent countenance. I have seldom conversed with any one so dirty, or more urbane.

I was put out by his intrusion into our life, although I believed he was not to blame for it. I thought that I was unfairly used in having to submit to Don Gregorio's visits, which were made of course with the sole view of Lucy's conversion, whilst, on my side, I had faithfully kept my word, and refrained from trying to influence my sister's mind on the subject of religion. This vexed me, and I spoke out what I thought of it, and Lucy protested her belief that Don Gregorio merely came to see us out of pure benevolence and humanity, apart from all thoughts of proselytising; and the discussion drove Monica and her story out of my head for the rest of that day.

CHAPTER VIII.

FROM that day we were haunted by Don Gregorio. Even Lucy found his frequent company oppressive, although she would hardly acknowledge as much openly. As for me, I daily threatened to affront him past forgiveness, and so get rid of his visits, and daily found it impossible to carry out the threat; so mild, long-suffering, and impervious to the broadest hints did I find his reverence. "If he would but wash his hands sometimes!" I exclaimed in despair. And indeed his divorce from soap and water was not the least of the disturbances to my peace of mind occasioned by Don Gregorio's presence. I wondered at first why Monsignor Chiappaforti, who was certainly a shrewd, clever man, had entrusted any mission of conversion to Don Gregorio Galli: since even Lucy's charitable judgment could not but rate him low in intelligence, and even Lucy's humility must find it difficult not to look down upon, instead of up to, him. But it soon became clear to me that Don Gregorio was employed not to guide my young sister, but to watch her. And Monsignore had shown his usual acuteness in selecting him for this task. The Signor Curato's zeal was indefatigable, and his good temper (or stupidity) impregnable. Go where we might, do what we would, many hours of the day did not pass without our seeing the rusty black suit and dusty shovel hat of Don Gregorio, and bearing his long-winded complimentary speeches, the utter fatuity, formality, and falseness of which had an absolutely paralysing effect on me. I used to sit dumbly staring at his reverence's unwashed and unshaven countenance, and listening to his reverence's soul-exhausting commonplaces, with the helpless sensation of a sleeper oppressed by nightmare.

One refuge I had from him, or I believe his persecution would have driven me from Tivoli: I could get away from him to the Villa of Quinctilius, and paint in peace. That was rather too long an excursion for Don Gregorio. Perhaps, indeed, he might even have got out so far as that in pursuit of Lucy; but it was not worth his while to follow me thither. Lucy, meanwhile, passed her mornings safely in the gardens of the Villa d'Este; and though the old priest occasionally looked in upon her even there, he seemed to be satisfied to leave her for the most part in the seclusion and almost solitude of the gardens. At that time of year visitors were few, and if a stray party of tourists did appear, it was easy to avoid them.

Meanwhile I was working earnestly, sometimes at the landscape, and sometimes at the study of Monica's head. That volcanic young person was now in a period of quiescence. She had had a slight return of the intermittent fever. This had subdued her, and she would now sit still for hours, in a languid, restful attitude, which was the very thing I wanted, so that I got on famously, and began to hope that I should make a fairly good thing of my picture. The picture itself was not properly begun; but I meant to work at it when I returned to Rome, under my master's eye. What I was doing in Tivoli was merely to make studies for it. My notion was to paint a kind of personification of the wild, sad, fever-stricken, mournfully beautiful Roman Campagna, under the form of a female peasant, and to call it "A Child of the Soil," or some such name. For this purpose, Monica seemed to me a perfect model; especially when her natural savagery was only smouldering, as it were, beneath the languor of laziness and malaria. Her tiger flashes of ferocity (however interesting a study in themselves) were not for my present purpose. I therefore refrained from recurring to the subject of her enemy, the nobleman. And she seemed to have thought no more of him since the day when his unexpected appearance in Tivoli had so moved her. During some happy interval of release from the society of Don Gregorio, I began to give a brief outline of Monica's story to Lucy. But I almost regretted having done so when I saw what an impression it made on my sister. She was even uneasy at my spending hours alone with such a fierce, untamed creature.

"Her brother, you know, was a murderer in intent, Catherine," said Lucy, with a shudder. "And I fear she would not scruple to follow his example, if she were provoked."

I tried to laugh my sister out of her tremors. "I believe I am safe from assassination," said I, "unless, indeed, I expire of exhaustion after a long visit from Don Gregorio." But I was rather glad that I had not mentioned the fact of Pasquale's rival having actually been seen in Tivoli, and that Lucy had interrupted me before I had got to that point; for she was so nervous and horror-stricken at my account of Monica's code of ethics that, if she had known this circumstance, she would have been tormented by the apprehension of some scene of violence and bloodshed. Always timid and gentle, she had of late become nervous to excess. Her spirits and health were evidently being undermined by a constant anxiety and mental struggle. Sometimes, when I looked at her, I was tempted to wish that she would make the final resolve, and openly become a Catholic. Anything would be better than this doubt and suspense. Again, the project would cross my mind to give up all my studies in Rome, and return with Lucy to England, as I had threatened Monsignore I would do. In that case, farewell to all hope of future distinction and present improvement in my art. But that hope—although it was dear to me—I would unhesitatingly have sacrificed, if by so doing I could ensure my sister's peace of mind. Yes; I am sure, on calmly looking back to that time, that I would have made the sacrifice. Nor do I deem it a great boast to say so. To see Lucy anxious and unhappy poisoned all my life; and no artistic glories I could conceive of would have had power to elate me whilst she was depressed.

I come now to a strange crisis in our lives, which seemed to overtake us as suddenly as an Alpine storm; but which had, of course, been gradually prepared by many circumstances working blindly together; and by some other circumstances artfully arranged and combined to one end. The first shock of it came in this form:—

Lucy one evening received a letter sealed with a large coat of arms. Our correspondents were very few, and none of them, I need scarcely say, used such aristocratic signs of dignity as the ostentatious heraldic device in red wax which made Lucy's letter look imposing. I handed it to her with a jest about her grand correspondent. She took it with a smile, which grew brighter when she had cast her eyes on the superscription. "It is the Princess's writing," she said. "Very likely there is a letter inside from Francesca and Livia. They were to be allowed to write to me, if they could manage to achieve an epistle in English."

She broke the seal, still smiling, and I went on with some needlework that I had in hand. "Well," said I, after some minutes' silence; "is the children's English undecipherable?" and at the same time I lifted my eyes from my stitching. What I saw forced a cry of terror from me. Lucy sat there pale to the lips, with the open letter on the table before her, and a look of such frozen anguish on her white face as almost made my heart stand still!

"My Lucy," I cried, "my child; what is the matter?"

She shivered, and trembled violently from head to foot, but did not speak. When I grasped at the letter, she feebly tried to hold it back, with a little piteous moan; but I seized it without scruple. And I read it whilst she sat cowering and trembling in her chair, with her face hidden in her clasped hands.

Oh, it was a cruel letter! The Princess Olympia—for she was the writer—thoroughly understood the softness and sensibility of the nature she was minded to wound. Not a word was lost; not a sting was mitigated by one touch of pity. The Princess began at once by a direct accusation:—

"You have repaid my kindness by black ingratitude," she wrote. "You have tried to seduce my son away from me, from his duty, and from his station. Your arts appear the more hateful from being cloaked under an appearance of modest simplicity. My innocent children have revealed to me the frequent interviews which they witnessed between Don Vittorio and yourself. I am loth to sully their pure minds with such suspicions as attach to your conduct, but it will be my imperative duty to warn them against you, and to forbid them to see you, or communicate with you in any way. How far your insolent sister has been your accomplice, I know not. She is an unscrupulous and irreligious woman, the companion of revolutionary infidels, and her conduct, therefore, is not surprising. But in you I have been grossly deceived. The dreadful suspicion assails me that your desire to be instructed in our holy faith was merely a part of your plan to ingratiate yourself with my family for the basest purposes. But this idea is so truly horrible, that I fervently pray it may be erroneous. Attempt not any exculpation. It would be in vain. I know all. My son followed you to Tivoli. He has had stolen interviews with you there in the gardens of the Villa d'Este. Your reputation is destroyed for ever, if I speak one half of what I know and can prove against you. Your sister's professional career in Rome can be cut short by a word from me. What decent, self-respecting persons, even among the heretics, would countenance such dangerous and wily women, when once unmasked?

"But I would not shut the door against repentance: Heaven forbid! Repent, amend, do penance in the dust! Seek out some holy guide to the true religion. Implore the compassion of the Blessed Virgin for the evil past, and her strengthening help for the future. It is your only hope.

"OLYMPIA BASTIANI CORLEONI.

"Indulge in no self-delusions. Vittorio has confessed everything to me.
O. B. C."

This was to me so utterly unexpected, that I know not whether amazement or burning indignation were the greater as I read. But the amazement passed, and the indignation remained,——and remains. But for the moment my sole care was for Lucy. All other feelings were forcibly thrust aside by anxiety for her. I cannot describe the strange state of prostration she had fallen into. She was like one who has received a stunning blow, in the literal sense of the words. A sort of numbness seemed to have taken possession of all her faculties. It seemed a painful effort for her even to articulate a word in answer to my attempts to soothe and comfort her. She did not lament, she did not shed a tear, but just sat still in her chair, ashy pale, and shivering from head to foot like a terrified bird. I was terrified in my turn. This state of nervous prostration was something of which I had no experience, and I knew not how to deal with it. I touched Lucy's hand, it was cold and listless. I spoke to her again and again; she merely shook her head feebly, and cowered away from me in her chair with a shrinking movement of the shoulders. What was to be done? She could not be allowed to remain thus.

In the midst of my most painful perplexity, the landlady of the humble lodging came into the room to announce a visit from Don Gregorio.

"Send him away," said I; "my sister is ill."

The woman, who, though coarse and ignorant, was kindly, and, like most of her countrywomen, intensely sympathetic with illness, advanced to see what was the matter. Her experience suggested but one cause for Lucy's trembling. "She shivers," said the Signora Anna, commonly called "S'ora Nanna;" "she has the fever. Oh! it will be nothing, Signorina. Don't take on. Get her to bed, and cover her up warm and give her a dose of quinine. By and bye the hot fit will come on."

The suggestion was welcome to me, because, although I did not believe Lucy had fever—or at least not the malaria fever which the S'ora Nanna meant—yet it was evident that she was ill; and this notion of the fever furnished an excuse for having her nursed and kept quiet which would be accepted without question. And I could not say aloud, "My sister has been poisoned by venomous words." We must keep that to ourselves for a while. She submitted to go to bed. She let me undress her and cover her up with cloaks and shawls. I made her a warm drink, and though she piteously begged to be left quiet, she submitted to swallow it without much difficulty, and then lay down with her face hidden in the pillow, and her bright curls tossed disorderly about it. After a little hesitation I resolved to leave her for half-an-hour or so in the hope that she might fall asleep from pure exhaustion. "Pray God that wicked woman has not murdered her!" I exclaimed aloud in the misery of my heart as I closed the bedroom door.

In the sitting-room, standing at the window and looking out into the tangled wilderness of weeds and shrubs that they called a garden, I found Don Gregorio. The brief twilight was coming on rapidly, and he loomed large and black in it against the window-panes. My entrance into the room caused him to turn round.

"Ah, Signorina," he began, with his usual flourishing bow, "I am so grieved to hear of your dear sister's illness. I trust it is not serious, I——"

"You had better go away," said I. "I cannot talk to you now;—nor listen."

"Certainly not, Signorina. You cannot be expected to listen, I am sure. I am so sorry to hear of the Signorina Lucia's illness! Just at this time, too, when I am expecting the great pleasure and honour of a visit from Monsignor Chiappaforti. He arrives to-morrow; and he will make a point, I have no doubt, of coming to see our amiable invalid as soon as——"

I turned on him, being fairly at bay. "He shall not come here to torment my sister," I said. "I will not have her troubled or disturbed, for the Pope himself. Do you understand me? And now be so good as to take your departure. Go away. I think I speak plainly."

My words, or my tone, or my stern, angry face, or all three together, succeeded in piercing Don Gregorio's suave dulness for once, at all events. He started, stared, backed a few steps from me, and then absolutely turned round and ran away! shuffling down the stairs as fast as his meagre old legs could carry him.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The Berlin Treaty still continues to monopolise European attention, and the various countries concerned are preparing to carry out its stipulations. AUSTRIA, in particular, is anxious to fulfil her allotted task without loss of time, and notwithstanding the unwillingness of the Porte to come to an arrangement, is massing her forces on the frontiers of Bosnia and Herzegovina in order to be ready to take possession of the provinces with or without the consent of the Turks. General Philippovich expects to meet with considerable trouble, and even armed resistance from the Mahomedan portion of the inhabitants, but it is thought unlikely that the Turkish authorities themselves will offer any forcible opposition but will only maintain a protesting attitude in order to relieve themselves of all responsibility. The Austrian occupation of the Turkish provinces continues to cause the most intense excitement throughout ITALY, and meetings have been held in Rome and the other principal cities, at which violent speeches have been been made, protesting against the Berlin Treaty and the action of Austria, and clamouring for the completion of Italian unity and the redemption from Austrian rule of Trent and Trieste. In fact, the Italia Irredenta (Unredeemed Italy) party have succeeded in creating the most wide-spread agitation, and at a meeting last Sunday at Rome, under the presidency of Menotti Garibaldi, a resolution was passed, stating, amongst other things, that "Italy affirms her solidarity with the peoples sold by the Congress of Berlin, which reminds Italy that there are still Italian lands subject to foreign dominion, and that she trusts in a near future of justice and truth." Some 500 societies sent in their adhesion to the meeting, while General Garibaldi telegraphed, "Slaves have the right of rising; people of Trieste take to your mountains"—a sentiment which was received with enthusiastic cheers and cries for the liberation of Nice and Malta. One of the speakers at the meeting even announced that "war had become necessary," and another declared that "that man, named Corti, had signed his name, in company with that mountebank Beaconsfield, that trader Andrassy, and that mezzano supremo Bismarck." Demonstrations were also made before the Palace of the Austrian Embassy, whilst bands of young men subsequently paraded the streets, shouting Abasso Corti, Viva la Guerra. The Government are doing all they can to put down the agitation without entrenching upon the freedom of public meetings, and the more Conservative and moderate portion of the Press condemn the action of the Radicals, although much soreness is universally felt that Italy, who for so many years has invariably secured something for herself out of a European crisis, should have obtained nothing, while her arch enemy Austria has carried off so large a slice of plunder. To turn to RUSSIA and TURKEY, considerable satisfaction has been evinced at St. Petersburg at the definitive conclusion of peace, and preparations are now being made for the withdrawal of a large portion of the troops from Turkish and Roumanian territory. The Turks are said to have evacuated Shumla, and the Russians are preparing to retire from the suburbs of Constantinople to within the confines of Eastern Roumelia, according to the stipulations of the Berlin Treaty. In ASIA matters are not quite so tranquil, the Lazis in the neighbourhood of Batoum still hold out, and are even said to have hoisted the British flag; but the Russians have determined to take possession by force, if necessary. At CONSTANTINOPLE the greatest delight has been manifested by the Turks at the British occupation of Cyprus, and many Mahomedans, the Times correspondent tells us, have made up their minds to leave Stamboul and emigrate to the "new English island, under that Government which alone understands justice." Now that all chance of war is over, the British and Russian officers are visiting and entertaining each other; and General Todleben is holding a strict inquiry upon the recent outrage on the British flag, some Cossacks having fired upon a man-of-war's boat, and having taken the crew prisoners. The latter, however, were at once set at liberty on the appearance of officers on the scene.

CYPRUS has now been officially placed under British rule, and General Sir Garnet Wolseley, "Lord High Commissioner and Commander-in-Chief," arrived in the island on Monday and formally assumed the reins of Government on the following day by a proclamation in English, Turkish, and Greek. He will reside on board the Salamis for the present. A powerful British squadron is lying off Larnaca, under Admiral Sir John Hay, consisting of the Minotaur, Black Prince, Defence, Raleigh, Invincible, Bittern, Pallas, Foxhound, Monarch, and Coquette. A large portion of the Indian troops have been landed and have been warmly welcomed by the inhabitants, who, by the Queen's proclamation, have been promised "measures for the preservation of commerce and agriculture and the blessings of freedom and justice." "While," also, "regard will be had for the moral and material welfare of the people, attention will be paid to their wishes respecting ancient customs as far as is consistent with civilisation and liberty, which must always be upheld by those who govern in Her Majesty's name." The island is rapidly filling with Greeks from the neighbouring islands, and innumerable schemes ranging from railways and tramways to a theatre and a café chantant, are being propounded for the improvement of the island.

FRANCE.——The outcry against the Treaty of Berlin and the British occupation of Cyprus is becoming greatly modified, the very undignified conduct of the Italian Radicals contributing greatly to bring thoughtful Frenchmen to a more moderate state of mind, while explanations are expected from M. Waddington which will place matters in a different light. As it is, Lord Beaconsfield's speech, and the knowledge that it was only out of deference to French feelings that neither Syria nor Egypt was occupied, have had considerable effect; and, if we are to credit the Paris correspondent of The Times, M. Gambetta has declared himself favourable to the Treaty of Berlin as a whole, and that, in his opinion, by the changes brought about by the Congress, "the interests of England and France, already somewhat identical, have become more so." "And," he continues, "I congratulate myself, in the name of my country, on a change which I deem very fortunate and very assuring for every one." Hitherto M. Gambetta's organ, the République Française, has been most bitter against the Treaty, so that this conversion is all the more remarkable. Frenchmen, however, have not been wholly occupied with foreign affairs this week, as the numerous strikes which have successively taken place within the last few days have caused considerable uneasiness. At Anzin, where the movement commenced, the coalminers are showing a conciliatory attitude. That this is owing to the strong measures taken by the Government to repress the slightest disorder, and to the presence of a strong body of troops, is far from unlikely. At Bordeaux, the bakers have struck; at St. Chamond, the dyers; at St. Etienne, the hands at the lace, tissue, and silk factories are out; and at many other towns similar misunderstandings between employers and employed are disturbing trade. The movement is thought to be due to the instigation of foreign agitators, and in some degree connected with the Internationale.

Marshal MacMahon has been to Trouville, and M. de Marcère, the Minister of the Interior, has been visiting his constituents at Mauberge, where he made a speech strongly advocating "toleration in politics and religion," and declaring that the Republic secures for France "order, liberty, and peace." The Republicans were successful in two more elections on Sunday.

In Paris, the various Congresses continue to meet in the Palace of the Trocadéro, but attract very little attention beyond the immediate circles which they affect. The Prince of Wales left Paris on Sunday evening, having attended the three British concerts at the Exhibition, which can hardly be said to have been eminently successful, the music being not of a sufficiently lively nature for the light-hearted Parisians. Even the friendly Figaro could only praise the singing of the choir, and even then relapsed into politics at the end of the article, exclaiming "Happy England, who knows how to increase her territory and keep her Kings." Herr Rubinstein is in Paris arranging for the Russian concerts, which are expected to be exceedingly good. Before leaving, the Prince of Wales is said to have invited M. Gambetta to breakfast on Saturday. This probably might have something to do with the "young dictator's" Anglo-philo tone on Tuesday. The captive balloon in the Place de Carrousel is now inflated and ready to ascend. The only theatrical novelty is the revival of Racine's Britannicus at the Français, with Mdlle. Agar as Agrippina.

GERMANY.——The Emperor is much better and has gone with the Empress to Babelsberg. On Saturday he drove out for the first time for seven weeks, and left Berlin on Monday. He wore his right arm in a sling, and saluted the crowd which assembled at the station with his left hand. A shilling subscription is being raised throughout Germany for a memorial, the nature of which the Crown Prince will decide, to commemorate the Emperor's deliverance.—Prince Bismarck is at his favourite summer resort, Kissingen, whence he will shortly issue invitations for a Conference of all the German Ministers to be held at Heidelberg.—Much annoyance is expressed with France and Italy at their hostile criticisms on the Berlin Treaty. Italy in particular is in disfavour, and the insulting expressions used towards Prince Bismarck at the meeting at Rome on Sunday have created considerable irritation.—American commerce is making great progress in Germany, and enormous quantities of hams, sausages, stoves, glass, leather, cotton cloths, and preserved provisions are now exported from across the Atlantic, being in many cases preferred to British goods.—The Kiel Committee of Inquiry into the loss of the Grosser Kurfürst has acquitted all the officers concerned, and attributes the disaster to a mistake of the men at the wheel of the Konig Wilhelm, who, alarmed by the sudden appearance of the Grosser Kurfürst, reversed the order given by the officer of the watch. An official court-martial will now be held, which will not only make a strict investigation into the disaster, but receive evidence on the present Teutonic method of handling a fleet.

INDIA.——Rain is now at last generally reported from Madras as well as the North-West provinces and Oude, and the number on the Relief Works has fallen from 146,000 to 115,000. The Viceroy has sanctioned various projects in the North-West for light railways and canals, of which the cost is estimated at from 2¼ to 10 millions sterling.—The Allahabad High Court has decided in the affirmative and in favour of the Government on the question as to whether a cession of territory on the part of the Crown was valid without the assent of Parliament.—At Baroda the Maharanee Jumnabai has been invested with the Imperial Order of the Crown of India—the young Guicowar surprising every one by making a very pretty loyal speech to the British Agent.—A "National Mahomedan Association" for the promotion of literary culture and the protection of Mahomedan interests has been formed at Calcutta.

MISCELLANEOUS.——Almost the sole topic in the UNITED STATES appears to be the intense heat which has prevailed during the past fortnight, the temperature in the Mississippi Valley and in the North-Western States has averaged from 90 deg. to 102 deg. in the shade, and in some places has reached even 110 deg. In many cases business was entirely suspended during the day, and in Missouri and Kansas the harvesting has been done by moonlight. In St. Louis 1,500 persons have been affected by the heat, and on one day last week at Chicago there were 103 cases of sunstroke, thirty-one of which were fatal.—In SOUTH AFRICA an amnesty was proclaimed on June 28, Sandilli's sons and other leaders being excepted. All is now quiet, and Cetewayo has sent an Embassy to Sir Theophilus Shepston, repudiating the acts of the Zulus in the disputed territory.

THE COURT

THE Queen and the Princess Beatrice are now at Osborne, where Her Majesty will remain a few weeks before starting for Balmoral. On Saturday the Earl of Beaconsfield arrived at the Castle on a visit to Her Majesty, and, together with Lady Waterpark, the Hon. Horatio Stopford, the Hon. Amy Lambert, Lieut.-General Ponsonby, and Mr. Montagu Corry, dined with the Queen. On Sunday the Queen and the Princess Beatrice and the Royal Household attended Divine Service at Osborne, the Rev. George Prothero officiating. On Monday the Queen knighted Earl Beaconsfield and invested him with the Order of the Garter, and in the evening Her Majesty's dinner-party included Lady Waterpark, General the Right Hon. Sir Thomas and Hon. Lady Biddulph, the Earl of Beaconsfield, Baron Seckendorff, and Mr. Montagu Corry. The Earl of Beaconsfield and Mr. Montagu Corry left the Castle on Tuesday afternoon.

The Prince of Wales returned from Paris on Monday morning, and in the afternoon, together with the Princess of Wales, visited the London Hospital and stayed an hour in the wards. Subsequently the Prince visited the Duchess of Cambridge, and in the evening, with the Princess, went to Her Majesty's Theatre. On Tuesday the Prince and Princess, accompanied by Prince Louis of Battenburg, went down to Dartmouth to distribute the prizes to the naval cadets on board the Britannia, amongst whom are Princes Edward and George of Wales. The Prince and Princess were received by the Duke of Connaught, and were rowed on board the Britannia by a crew of the cadets, among whom were the two young Princes, afterwards returning to the Royal yacht Osborne, where they entertained a large party at dinner. The distribution of prizes by the Princess took place on Wednesday, when the Prince made a brief speech, dwelling upon the salubrity of Dartmouth. The young Princes returned to London in the afternoon with the Prince and Princess, for their Midsummer holidays. The Prince of Wales went to Sandown Park Races on Thursday, and on Friday the Prince was to repeat his visit accompanied by the Princess.

The Duke of Edinburgh, who is with his vessel, the Black Prince, off Cyprus, has lately been somewhat indisposed, and will shortly be granted a few weeks' leave of absence.—Prince Leopold is now at Windsor Castle, where he is confined indoors with a sprained knee.

CHURCH NEWS

THE PAN-ANGLICAN SYNOD.——The bishops reassembled at Lambeth Palace on Monday, under the presidency of the Primate, and would sit daily until yesterday (Friday) to consider the reports of the various committees upon the subjects assigned to them for discussion at the earlier meetings of the Synod. To-day (Saturday) there is to be a concluding service in St. Paul's Cathedral, the Holy Communion being celebrated at 11 A.M., followed by a sermon by Bishop Stevens, of Pennsylvania. It is intended to publish the reports of the committees but not the debates. The Association for the Promotion of the Unity of Christendom have presented a memorial to the Conference expressing a hope that they would issue a solemn and consentient declaration that it is the first duty of all Christians to labour and pray for the uniting in one body of all those who call upon the name of Christ and agree in the Divine authority of Holy Scripture, in the creeds, and in the decrees of the Church; and that it will recommend some practical means and mode of action whereby a consummation so devoutly to be wished for may, in God's good time, be accomplished.

VARIOUS.——Last Saturday a special Thanksgiving Service was held at the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, Bevis Marks, in commemoration of the termination of the Berlin Congress, and the conclusion of peace in the East.—On the same day a large meeting was held at the Conference Hall, Mildmay Park, the proceedings at which included addresses, singing, and prayer. The speakers urged that as increased taxation, increased prices of provisions, and increased difficulties in trade, the natural results of war, had been averted, the thanksgiving of the people should take the practical form of benevolence, and as Cyprus was now to add to the national prestige of Britain, the duty of English Christians was to promote the evangelisation of that island.—On Tuesday, Lord Penzance, in giving judgment on an appeal in respect to the Confessional and other matters in the church of St. James's, Hatcham, said that there were now only three matters in dispute out of eight—the chancel screen, the additional steps to the communion-table, and the side screen. The side screen and additional altar steps, he ordered to be removed; as to the chancel screen, he decided it should remain with the cross upon it, but the gates must be removed and the panels painted, so as not to exhibit any representations on the screen. A special order was made for the removal to be effected within three weeks.—A meeting convened by the Association for the Promotion of the Unity of Christendom was last week held at the Westminster Palace Hotel, under the presidency of the Bishop of Fredericton. Resolutions were passed similar to those adopted at the Association's recent meeting at Oxford.—The annual session of the Wesleyan Conference was opened at Bradford on Wednesday, the Rev. Dr. Rigg, Principal of the Westminster Normal Institution, being chosen President for the year.—On Thursday, last week, at a conversazione of the Christian Evidence Society, held at the National Club, several colonial and foreign bishops delivered addresses upon "the state of unbelief in various parts of the world, and on the best way of promoting the objects of the Society."—The vicar of Lower Milton Stourport, says the Echo, has taken objection to the colour of a pair of trousers which were worn by one of his curates while officiating, and the result is that the curate has had to leave. In a farewell sermon the rev. gentleman said he was sorry if he had offended any one in word, deed, or raiment.

MUSIC

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.——About the opera of Ambroise Thomas, which, notwithstanding the curtailments, is as lengthy as it is sombre, enough has been written. Our duty is limited, therefore, to a recognition of the excellence of the performance generally, and the exquisite pourtrayal, by Mdlle. Albani, of the character of Ophelia, in particular. This last, alone, would make amateurs desirous of witnessing an occasional performance of Hamlet, but that the work has any chance whatever of winning "popularity" in the strict sense of the term is, we think (and have before stated), out of the question. Mdlle. Albani's chief comrade on the present occasion was Signor Cotogni. It is an earnest and well-considered performance, bearing in some instances a certain resemblance to the Hamlet of M. Faure, besides having incontestable, if not very striking qualities of its own. Mdlle. Mantilla, one of Mr. Gye's latest acquisitions, is somewhat over-weighted in the part of Queen Gertrude, which we have seen represented by such artists as Mdlle. Titiens and Madame Rose Csillag. The parts of the King, Laertes, and the Ghost, were respectively intrusted to Signors Ordinas, Sabater, and Capponi; and Signor Bevignani conducted in the orchestra. Besides repetitions of Semiramide, (with Madame Patti), and the Huguenots (with Mdlle. Cepeda, the most recent and acceptable addition to the company of the Royal Italian Opera), there were two so styled "benefit" nights, both more or less interesting, the first especially. For the "benefit" of Madame Adelina Patti, the Sonnambula, was wisely chosen. We need hardly remind opera-going readers, that in the part of Amina, seventeen years ago, the most variously endowed among lyric artists of the day, made her first apparition among us, and won fame, so to speak, at a bound. She was then in her seventeenth year, and now that she has nearly doubled her age we welcome an Amina as young, as fresh, as ingenuous, and, where occasion demands, as impassioned, as at the beginning. That both as singer and actress Madame Patti, by dint of assiduous study and unremitting consideration of the requirements necessary to attain excellence in either department of her calling, has progressed year by year so surely as to reach the pinnacle of her aspiration is true; she could otherwise, indeed, never have reached it. Side by side with this, however, we find the youthful charm which seems to be inseparable from her artistic nature. Thus her Amina was as attractive and created as much enthusiasm as ever. Her not having played in the Sonnambula for six years, made the excitement all the greater. The evening will be remembered, in short, as the evening of the season. From the cavatina, "Come per me sereno," to "Ah non giunge," the joyous final air, it was a series of triumphs for the gifted cantatrice, who is as likely as possible, six years hence, to convince her admirers that she is not six years older. Signor Nicolini played Elvino, and Signor Carbone again Count Rodolpho. At the end of each act of the opera the favourite prima donna was enthusiastically called before the curtain, and the stage was covered with bouquets, wreaths, and coronals; but neither calls before the curtain, nor any quantity of floral tributes can add one inch to the artistic stature of Adelina Patti. For the "benefit" of Mdlle. Albani we had a mixed programme, comprising acts from Rigoletto, Lucia, and La Traviata. In the first two of these operas the charming young French Canadian—whose real name is Emma Lajeunesse, her adopted theatrical title being derived from Albany, the town in which she first essayed her talent as a dramatic singer—has been often heard and applauded in England; and to judge by her performance in the last act of the Traviata, her Violetta would be unlikely to fall short of either. On Saturday the season was brought to an end with an excellent performance of Verdi's Aida. Madame Adelina Patti, in the part of the Ethiopian Princess and Egyptian slave fairly "surpassed herself." The National Anthem, in which the leading artists added their voices to those of the chorus, followed; and then the curtain fell on the thirty-second season of the Royal Italian Opera. Mr. Gye has fulfilled most of the pledges of his prospectus. He has produced two new operas—Victor Massé's Paul et Virginie and Flotow's Alma—the first, thanks to Mdlle. Albani's graceful impersonation of the heroine, a quasi-success; the last, despite Mdlle. Albani's help, a quasi-failure. As works of art neither of them rises above mediocrity—Alma, indeed, sinking beneath mediocrity. Only one new singer has obtained general acceptance. We refer to the Spaniard, Mdlle. Cepeda, whose Lucrezia Borgia and Valentine were equally admired, and who showed herself not less proficient in the music of Meyerbeer than in that of Donizetti. This lady is a valuable acquisition to Mr. Gye's company.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.——The performances at reduced prices have given us nothing new. In the Flauto Magico, Madame Etelka Gerster took the place of Mdlle. Marimon as Astrifiammante, "Queen of Night;" and in the Talismano of Balfe, Miss Hélène Crosmond was substitute for Mdlle. Caroline Salla, as Queen Berengaria. The Trovatore offered a new chance for distinction to Madame Pappenheim, of which the German lady did not fail to make the best use. Faust, Fidelio, the Sonnambula, and the Nozze di Figaro have been repeated; and three more performances of Georges Bizet's Carmen, the most successful opera since Faust, have been given, with Miss Minnie Hauk as the petulant, capricious heroine—an impersonation in its way unique, as all the operatic world is now aware. For this evening, the last of the season, we are promised Lucia di Lammermoor, and an act of Dinorah, with Madame Etelka Gerster as the heroine in each. The performance is announced as for her benefit.

WAIFS.——The new opera, Pepita, produced last week by M. Carvalho, at the Opéra Comique, has, from all accounts, produced but little effect. It is in the old style of opéra buffa, and the music is by M. L. Delahaye, a new aspirant to lyric honours. Instead of one "Torrero" or "Torreador," as in Carmen, there are here nine of that community all in love with the heroine, who is, nevertheless, carried off by Sir George Williams, an English naval officer, stationed at Gibraltar.—Professor Rokitanski, father of the well-known Viennese bass singer, who has been engaged on several occasions at Her Majesty's Theatre, died recently. He was one of the most renowned physicians of Austro-Hungary.—Mr. Santley has returned from his short trip to America, entirely restored to health. He passed a few days at Niagara Falls, and came back by the same boat which took him out.—Mdlle. Marie Krebs, having been ordered some months' repose by her medical adviser at Dresden, will be unable to fulfil her engagement for the Promenade Concerts, which begin next week at Covent Garden Theatre.—The "Claque," as it is conventionally termed, has been abolished (temporarily, at least) by M. Halanzier, manager of the Paris Grand Opera; and the public will now enjoy the privilege of expressing its approval, or disapproval, without the aid or premonition of that senseless and intolerable nuisance. The Théâtre Français has done without it; why not, then, the Opera?—M. Gounod's Polyeucte has at length had an orchestral trial. Everything is ready for the general rehearsals, which will begin when Mdlle. Krauss, who is to play the heroine, has terminated her holiday.—Madame Adelina Patti left for North Wales on Sunday.—The beautiful Stadtheater at Frankfort-on-the-Maine has been burnt to the ground. A similar catastrophe has visited the Théâtre Guignol at Lyons.

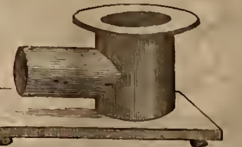
SCIENTIFIC NOTES

PROFESSOR HUGHES'S Microphone, to which we last month devoted an illustrated article, has, unfortunately, become a bone of contention between two rival inventors. Mr. Edison, of phonographic renown, claims the discovery as his, while Professor Hughes successfully proves that its birth was due to his own patient researches. There is no kind of doubt that the latter gentleman was the first to make the matter public, and, therefore, the laurels rightly belong to him. It is a great pity that hard words should have been made use of—for, granting that the two experimenters did hit upon the same discovery at the same time, there is nothing so surprising about such an event as to lead any one to assume that one had filched his ideas from the other. We have numerous precedents—in astronomy, for instance—of two separate workers attaining the same end independently of each other. And—no later than December last—the liquefaction of the so-called "permanent" gases—one of the greatest scientific triumphs of the age—was concurrently accomplished by two physicists in different countries.

From America we learn of an improvement in the Phonograph, by the substitution of a new form of membrane for the metallic diaphragm formerly used. This membrane is made of paper or parchment, and is constructed on the principle of the drum of the human ear. The quality of tone is said to be much improved by its use, while the sound-records in the tinfoil, instead of necessitating the near presence of the operator as heretofore, can be impressed upon the metal at a distance of nearly twenty feet from the speaker's mouth. Should this improvement be capable of all that is said of it, it would now be possible by means of a Phonograph in the middle of the House to record automatically parliamentary debates. This would be a great source of comfort to those unreported members who are always complaining of the injustice of the newspapers in not publishing their speeches. But to disinterested outsiders it must be evident that the Phonograph, however efficient, could not be of much service here. For the essence of good reporting is not to transcribe every word, but to know what to report, and what to reject. There have been many things said in the house lately which would hardly add to its dignity by being exactly reproduced in the Phonograph.



The year has been so prolific of acoustical discoveries that we cannot feel much surprise that an instrument has been devised for seeing sounds. It is aptly called the "Phoneidoscope," and we annex a drawing which will show its extreme simplicity. It consists of two pieces of brass piping, which are joined together in the form of the letter T. One of the three openings is closed by the mahogany board which forms the base of the instrument. The upper opening is provided with a flat flange, upon which a ring of metal holding a soap film can be placed. The remaining orifice is furnished with an indiarubber tube, terminating in a mouthpiece of the common speaking-tube pattern. Upon singing or talking into this mouthpiece the delicate film of soap is thrown into visible vibration. It describes, by reflected light, the most beautiful patterns in all the colours of the rainbow—patterns which will remain constant for one note—but which go through many changes as the scale is sung through the tube. The quality or timbre of the sounds examined also have a marked influence upon the pattern produced. The mixture for making the film is a compound of Castile soap, water, and glycerine. It is of such tenacity that bubbles may be blown with it of Brobdingnagian dimensions. Patterns in sand, on vibrating discs of metal, were long ago produced by Chaldni, and Lissajous has also shown how sound can be translated into regular forms by means of tiny mirrors fastened to the bodies in vibration. But the Phoneidoscope answers to far more delicate sounds than those dealt with by the two philosophers named, and the results achieved are far more beautiful in character.

In consequence of the great number of deaths which have lately been traced to the use of "violet powder" adulterated with arsenic, people are naturally looking with suspicion upon that luxury of the toilet, and are asking how they may know whether a particular sample is innocent, or the reverse. The question is so important that we think it worth while to give a simple test by which the poison may be detected.

Boil a small quantity of the suspected article in water to which has been added a crystal of common soda. This can be done in a florence flask over a gas flame. In another vessel place a crystal of blue vitriol (sulphate of copper) in a little boiling water, and let it stand until dissolved. Upon mixing these two solutions together a bright green precipitate will be thrown down if arsenic be present. This precipitate is the pigment known as "Scheele's green," which is used sometimes in staining wall papers and textiles, to the prejudice of their owners. The colour can be recognised by touching the suspected material with a drop of ammonia, which immediately turns it blue.

In a lecture recently published, Dr. Siemens gives us some comfort with reference to the threatened exhaustion of our coal-fields. He tells us that a time may come "when our descendants will look upon the indiscriminate users of coal with something like the same feeling that we look upon the users of flint and bronze instruments." He argues that we should make use of water-power as our forefathers did. But, whereas they had no means of transporting such power to any distance, we can do so by means of dynamo-electric machines and copper wires. He calculates that the amount of force which is constantly being wasted at the falls of Niagara, for instance, represents an aggregate of 16,800,000 horse-power. To make the matter more plain, he states that to find sufficient power to represent this lost force, i.e., to pump the water back again, we should require an amount of coal equivalent to the total coal consumption of the world.

Faraday's great discovery that the simple approach of a magnet to a coil of wire created a current of electricity in that wire, led to the invention of a host of magneto-electric machines for the wholesale production of the subtle fluid, and Dr. Siemens is the inventor of the latest and most perfect of them. We may therefore be quite sure that he is an authority upon the subject of which he treats. The dynamo-electric machine transforms motion into electricity. We now want some practical engine for again turning this electricity into motion. When this result is attained we can in a great measure dispense with steam power. There is no doubt that the electric machine will play a great part in the world's future.

THEATRES

THE music-halls enjoy for some unexplained reason a sort of license in the matter of personal satire which is not permitted to the theatres where, above all, it is strictly forbidden to personate on the stage living celebrities. There has been performing lately, for example, at more than one music-hall, a kind of political squib in which the same actor appears successively made up so as to resemble closely Lord Beaconsfield, Count Andrassy, General Ignatieff, and Midhat Pasha. But no well-informed playgoer will have expected to find in the little piece entitled The Congress at Paris, at the OLYMPIC Theatre, any attempt to caricature the distinguished plenipotentiaries whose names are appended to the recent Treaty of Berlin. The "Congress" in this case is of a more fanciful and picturesque kind, being simply a polyglot assemblage who are supposed to meet in the Chinese house of the Great Exhibition for the purpose of settling, once and for all, the disputed question of what is the nationality of a certain young lady distinguished as Polly, and pleasantly represented by Miss Lizzie Coote. Polly, who was born at sea, happens to have had for her grandfathers a Frenchman and a German, and for her grandmothers an Englishwoman and a Spaniard; and hence pretexts are found for dispute on the point referred to. The linguistic attainments of the Congress being, however, strictly limited to their own mother tongue they are compelled to engage the services as interpreter of one of those marvellous foreign waiters who profess to speak every language under the sun; but as this person is somewhat of an impostor, and beyond a few phrases here and there really knows no tongue but his own native English, new difficulties arise; and affairs become complicated when Polly, discovering in this unduly boastful person an old sweetheart, turns her back on her grandfathers and grandmothers, preferring his society. After exciting the anger of the Congress the British waiter is finally enabled to make his peace by employing his small scraps of foreign phrases to extricate them from the grasp of a detective, whose suspicions have been excited by their eccentric proceedings. A Congress at Paris is an extravaganza enlivened by songs and hornpipes, and rendered still further amusing by the confusion of tongues which characterises its dialogue. Mr. Procter, who is new to the stage of the Olympic, plays the waiter in amusing fashion, and other parts are represented with spirit and whimsical humour by Messrs. Beerbohm Tree, Miss Cleeve, and Miss Lavis. The production of this trifle necessarily tends to enliven the programme of the Olympic, which, since the production of Nancy Sikes, has been of a somewhat depressing character.

Mdlle. Beatrice, with her company, will make their first appearance in London since last year at the OLYMPIC Theatre on the 5th of next month. The accomplished lady will bring with her an Anglo-French drama, entitled A Woman of the People, in which she has successfully appeared in many provincial cities. The advent of this play is just now heralded by placards on the hoardings of London, in which the letter of a penitent person who is supposed to have been converted from the error of his ways by witnessing a single performance, is printed at full length, with its original orthographical errors by way of evidence of scrupulous regard to authenticity. In like way it used to be customary to support the claims to notice of Lillo's George Barnwell. Mr. Tom Taylor's Ticket of Leave Man—too admirable a play, by the way, to need the recommendation of reformed rogues—has been credited with similar and equally satisfactory influences over sinners among the audiences. Should the Woman of the People prove to be a piece of this wholesome and beneficial class there will, of course, be ground for rejoicing, but it must be on condition that its merits as a play with an interesting and well planned story shall be no less incontestable.

The weekly record and critical commentary on the stage, entitled the Theatre, is henceforth to take the form of a monthly review. The Theatre has been ably conducted, and has kept its readers well informed in the matter both of dramatic literature and of acting at home and abroad. A strong list of contributors, and a variety of interesting features are announced for the new series, the first number of which—to appear next week—will contain portraits of Miss E. Terry and Mr. Irving.

It is announced that the ST. JAMES'S Theatre has passed into the hands of Lord Newry. The interior is to receive the complete renovation and redecoration which are certainly not unneeded. Originally built by Braham, the singer, and opened under his management in 1835, this house has rarely proved a successful venture; but there is really no reason why it should not be a prosperous theatre if once it should find a capable management; for it is more commodious than the Court Theatre or the Prince of Wales', and its situation is certainly more convenient.—The part of the innocently convicted hero in Proof, at the ADELPHI Theatre, is about to be undertaken by Mr. Henry Neville, to whose style of acting it is better suited than to that of Mr. Charles Kelly—excellent actor though he is. This is one of the best romantic dramas which have appeared on our stage for some time, and had it received a thoroughly adequate interpretation it could hardly have failed to achieve complete success.

THEATRICAL BUSINESS IN POMPEII, which has been at a standstill since the eruption of Vesuvius, A.D. 79, appears, the Theatre tells us, to be looking up, judging from the following announcement of Signor Luigni:—"After a lapse of more than 1,800 years, the theatre of this city will be reopened with Figlia del Reggimento. I solicit the continuance of the favour bestowed on my predecessor, Marcus Quintus Martius, and beg to assure the public that I shall make every effort to equal the rare qualities displayed during his management."

LEGAL

THE PICK TESTIMONIAL.——Our readers will remember that not long since a lady named Pick was committed for trial on a charge of picking pockets at St. James's Hall, and that the case was never tried for the simple reason that the Grand Jury threw out the bill. We commented on the hardship of the case at the time, and we are glad to find that some attempt is now to be made to compensate Dr. and Mrs. Pick for the actual pecuniary loss which they suffered in consequence of the prosecution, and in respect of which they have no legal redress. These expenses amounted, we understand, to nearly 300*l.* Among the many prominent persons who have joined the Testimonial Committee are the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Countess Russell, and Miss Nightingale, and subscriptions may be sent to the London and County Bank; to the hon. secretary, Mrs. Jeffryes, at the Langham Hotel; or to the secretary, 1, Adam Street, Adelphi.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——A military tailor, who visited Lord's Cricket Ground the other day for the purpose of sketching the latest fashions, was arrested by an over-zealous policeman, who mistook him for a pickpocket. He was, however, more fortunate than Mrs. Pick, as he was released from custody as soon as the magistrate had heard the charge.—Mr. Cooke, the Marylebone magistrate, in dealing with a cab dispute the other day, incidentally remarked that when a cabman, in response to the query, "How much have I to pay you?" said "I leave it to you," the passenger need not pay anything at all, and that if any one were brought before him for refusing to pay under such circumstances he should dismiss the summons.—Somnambulism is getting both fashionable and dangerous. The other night, at Headley, in Hampshire, a young woman got up in her sleep, and with a carving-knife cut off the heads of twenty fowls, killed five rabbits, and stabbed a favourite donkey. She is to be examined by an eminent London physician.—A man named Gaylor has been committed for trial for a series of curious frauds upon the Hearts of Oak Benefit Society, from which, while in good health and full work, he managed to draw no less than 18*l.* 12*s.* as sick pay, besides 1*l.* 10*s.* on the strength of a forged certificate of his wife's accouchment. Emboldened by success, he made out a certificate of his own death, which he presented at the Society's office, saying that he was a friend of the widow, and thus brought about his own detection. He had obtained the blank certificates from a printer's where he was employed, and he had apparently planned a similar fraud upon

The relatives of the clerk and driver have been awarded compensation under the Peace Preservation Act. The mother of the clerk, Meekham, who claimed 2,000l., gets 700l.; and the father of the car-driver, Buchanan, who asked for 1,000l., is to have 200l.—Last week, at the Limerick Assizes, a man named Cronin was tried for killing a man at a fair in March last. It was shown that there had been a fight, and that the deceased, after being beaten to the ground by Cronin, died within ten minutes. The jury, however, found him "not guilty"—a result which elicited from the judge the remark that they were the only twelve men in court of that opinion, and that it was no wonder there were widows and orphans in the country where jurors returned such verdicts. The prisoner seems to have cared little for his escape from the gallows, for he is said to have left the dock muttering "Devil thank ye."—A Spanish sailor, named Garcia, has been arrested and committed for trial for the wholesale murder in Monmouthshire. He had only just been liberated from gaol, and, although the evidence against him is mainly circumstantial, it seems very strong. He was seen skulking about near the place, and in his possession were found various articles of clothing which have been identified as belonging to the murdered family. The five victims have been buried in one grave in the parish churchyard.—Another shocking tragedy is reported from Crayford, in Kent, where the dead bodies of a man and three children were last week discovered in a wood. At the inquest it was shown that the adult body was that of a man named Sands, formerly secretary of the Burlington Fine Arts Club, who, it seems, had spent the whole of his savings in the purchase of a beer-shop at Greenwich, and had fallen into a despondent state of mind in consequence of the business not answering his expectations. On Thursday last week he went out with three of his children, saying that they were going for a walk in the park; but, instead of doing so, he went by rail to Crayford, where, in a secluded spot, he first cut the throats of his children, and afterwards his own. The verdict was wilful murder, and suicide.

INTERESTING LETTER from a Lady 77 years of age.

Ball's Pond Road, Islington,
December, 1877.

SIR,—I wish to inform you I have taken your PARR'S LIFE PILLS for forty seven years, and no other medicine, and as I have always found them to do me good, I have recommended them to all my friends; and to prove the truth to you I have sent you a few lines, inclosed, which I composed and sent to one of my sons, with a box of your valuable Pills, begging of him to try them. I am now in my 77th year, and hearty and well, but unfortunately lost my dear husband five years since; but my dear children are my preservers, and I am as happy as my old mind. If you wish to make use of these lines in any way you are at liberty to do so.
E. J. CATLIN.
To Messrs. Roberts and Co.

A CONVINCING PROOF that PARR'S LIFE PILLS is the BEST FAMILY MEDICINE.

THE GRAPHIC SUMMER NUMBER,

which was entirely sold out on the day of publication, has now been re-issued, and a few copies still remain unsold.

The numerous readers of THE GRAPHIC who were disappointed in not being able to procure the number at the earlier date would do well to make immediate application to their newsagents, as, after the copies now remaining are disposed of, there will be no further re-issue.

THE GRAPHIC SUMMER NUMBER.

"Nothing better of the kind, whether as regards the artistic merit or its literary attractions, has ever been issued—and we are thinking of productions which cost a good deal more than a shilling—than the Summer Number which the enterprising proprietors of The Graphic have published at that price. It stands, indeed, in some respects, entirely alone."—Manchester Examiner.

"We may embrace this opportunity of saying that The Graphic people have excelled even themselves in their Summer Number."—Greenock Telegraph.

"The most entertaining number of The Graphic yet issued is the Summer Number for 1878."—Leeds Express.

"From its novel and interesting character great success is anticipated."—Bilston Herald.

"A popular number, that will assuredly secure a great demand."—Daily Chronicle, June 25, 1878.

"Is a novelty in newspaper literature."—Warrington Guardian.

"Which is likely to meet with a very favourable reception."—Bradford Telegraph.

"The coloured engravings, which are numerous, and finished in a very superior style, hit off in a happy manner the peculiarities incident to life at the seaside, the more humorous features receiving special notice."—Bradford Chronicle.

"The number is certainly the best yet issued by The Graphic, and that is saying a great deal."—Preston Herald.

"Will excite general interest."—Eastern Morning News.

"Having read your notice of The Graphic's Summer Number, I hasten to examine for myself this artistic and wonderful production. I can with confidence recommend my readers, residents, or visitors, to procure for themselves copies of this admirable paper, feeling sure that they will derive much genuine pleasure from an inspection of its contents."—Scarborough Weekly Post.

"Christmas is no longer to have a monopoly of good things in the way of literature and art. To The Graphic belongs the credit of invading the 'old Father's' time honoured demain."—Brighton Herald.

"A charming special Midsummer Number of that inimitable journal, The Graphic, whose varied and unique illustrations are a marvel of the printer's art, and exhibit a great advance in colour printing. We have seldom seen a better shilling's worth."—Staffordshire Advertiser.

"Demands a word of praise for the excellent taste and artistic beauty of its illustrations, the majority of which are coloured by a process which the proprietors were the first, we believe, to employ for the purposes of popular periodical literature."—Manchester City News.

"Holiday numbers of the lighter monthlies are by this time almost an institution, but a 'summer number' of an illustrated weekly is a rather novel idea. It is an idea, however, which is likely to be heartily welcomed by many people in the form given to it by the publishers of The Graphic. The accuracy of some of the views is noteworthy, while the spirit and humour displayed in all would not have discredited John Leech's Punch."—Scotsman.

"Is one of the most artistic productions that has lately been published. A very pleasant day indeed might be spent on the sea shore with no other companion than the summer number of The Graphic."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Sufficient light reading to wile away a few hours very pleasantly."—Midland Counties Express.

"Its novel and interesting character will doubtless render it a marked success."—Belfast Northern Whig.

"Is delightfully fresh and breezy. The number is a highly creditable one, and is full value for a shilling."—Sheffield Post.

"It contains a large number of coloured engravings, the subjects of which will excite general interest."—Leeds Mercury.

"A great many of the drawings are given to phases of life at Scarborough, and several to those of Harrogate."—Hull Express.

"The views are most amusing, and true to life. We commend the Extra Summer Number of The Graphic to our readers."—Shields Daily News.

"Affords us greater pleasure than almost any such venture which we can remember. How such a work could be produced at the price charged for it we are utterly unable to explain."—Bath Herald.

"The special numbers of The Graphic are always good, but the present one is the best which has been yet produced."—Observer.

"Will be the source of considerable amusement, illustrating the life and habits of various classes of seaside visitors."—Staffordshire Sentinel.

"This number has a true holiday air about it, and is almost redolent of the sweet breath of kine, and bracing with the briny air of ocean."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"Admirable, and the illustrations of our babies among the buttercups and on the sea-shore will find their way into many a scrap book."—Sunday Times.

"Will be of special interest to Yorkshire readers because of its coloured illustrations, numerous and effective, of Mr. Chumley's Holidays at Scarborough."—York Herald.

"By far the most elaborate thing of the kind that has ever been issued in newspaper form."—Banbury Guardian.

"During the height of the season is admirably pourtrayed. It should have an immense sale."—Doncaster Gazette.

"This splendid holiday number of The Graphic is sure to sell by tens of thousands. Everybody at the seaside or at inland resorts, famous for their medicinal springs, is bound to buy this number; and no one buying it will fail—unless he is afflicted with a very severe attack of mental blindness—to discover her own or his own portrait. . . . This summer number will prove, we hope, the prelude to many more equally good."—Weekly Times.

"Redolent of the seaside. The number is an admirable one, both in a literary and artistic sense."—Liverpool Evening Express.

"Is a surprise of a most pleasurable kind, a budget of fun, and brimful of the pleasantest, brightest, and funniest coloured seaside sketches ever gathered together in such a form."—Liverpool Albion.

"Is resplendent in gorgeous colours, and they must indeed be fastidious who are unable to derive pleasure from its bright and amusing sketches. The Graphic, as a high-class journal of art, is always an acceptable element of our current literature, but there is a peculiar charm about the present issue which is calculated to make it particularly welcome at the commencement of our Scarborough season."—Scarborough Daily Post.

"The coloured supplement, 'The Last Bit of Scandal,' is alone worth the cost of the number."—Eastern Daily Press.

THE GRAPHIC SUMMER NUMBER

"It is one of the most attractive of the special numbers of this enterprising journal yet offered to the public. Just the thing, in fact, for a companion on the sands, the steamboat, or the coach."—Doncaster Chronicle.

"Full of pictures, most of them coloured, and chiefly relating to the seaside and fashionable life thereat, and mostly humorous. There is an abundance of capital stories likewise, and also a large, fine, coloured separate plate, entitled 'The Last Bit of Scandal.'"—Halifax Courier.

"There is an appropriateness about the treatment of these pictures which is charming. We can say no more than to advise our readers to purchase and peruse The Graphic for themselves, and they will admit that it is a perfect treat."—Leeds Daily News.

"The coloured scenes of life at the seaside, as illustrating 'Mr. Chumleigh's Holidays,' are cleverly drawn."—Shrewsbury Journal.

"It is a wonderful gathering of all manner of pictures of out of door amusements and occupations, colour illustrated in a humoursome manner."—Bradford Daily Post.

"The reading matter is amusing, interesting, and thrilling. We anticipate a great popularity for this most charming number."—Liverpool Weekly Albion.

"We cannot recount a fiftieth part of the attractions of the number. Our readers should see and enjoy it for themselves."—Sunderland Weekly Echo.

"A splendidly illustrated summer number."—Waterford Weekly News.

"It will be welcome everywhere, but especially in the northern counties. 'Mr. Chumley's Holidays' were at Scarbro', and when he went to that delightful watering-place he took his sketch-book with him. He worked well."—Hull Packet.

"As a specimen of literature it is unsurpassed; and as a specimen of art it is most exquisite."—Blyth Weekly News.

"Is a splendid contribution of a light literary kind, suitable to holiday life. . . . The pictures show society in all its seaside forms: on the sands, in the ballroom, flirting in appropriate places, and a great variety of other pretty scenes, the truth of which will be apparent to all who have enjoyed their holidays in our watering places."—Western Daily Mercury.

"The number is one of great beauty and interest, and the stories are of a class which will well repay the time devoted to their perusal."—Paisley Daily Express.

"It is by far the best shilling's worth of holiday literature and art that we have ever had the pleasure of looking at. Our fear is that the supply will hardly equal the demand."—Devon Weekly Times.

"Perfection in illustrated newspaper art."—Newcastle Chronicle.

"The enterprise which could produce such an extra number for a shilling deserves commendation and countenance."—Hereford Journal.

"Is one of great interest. . . . The letterpress is very enjoyable."—Edinburgh Daily Review.

"Will, from its novel and interesting character, be a great success."—Chester Chronicle.

"The extra number issued at Christmas was of a novel and interesting character, admirably illustrated in colour, and when it is understood that the number under notice is intended as a companion one to that, a good idea of it will at once be formed."—Northampton Herald.

"Is one of the prettiest things we have seen for a long time."—Liverpool and Southport Daily News.

"Contains some thirty or forty pages of illustrations and prose as amusing as anything of the kind that has come under our notice. A cheaper shilling's worth for the seaside, or the country holiday, it is not within our power to recommend."—Brighton Gazette.

"A really wonderful shilling's worth, both in respect of quality and quantity, and far excels in attractiveness the extra number issued at Christmas, successful as that was."—Darlington and Stockton Times.

"This remarkable companion to the last Christmas number seems quite as marvellous at the price. In fact, we may say, without fear of contradiction, that this is the most extraordinary shilling's worth ever given to the public."—Hawick Advertiser.

"The present number will, we are certain, find a place on drawing-room tables without number."—Freeman's Journal.

"No one going out on a holiday should be without a Graphic Summer Number. Children, especially, will be delighted with it."—Sussex Daily News.

"We venture to predict it will give general satisfaction both to old friends and new patrons of that very excellent journal."—Newark Advertiser.

"Scenes common at watering-places, but which do not usually attract attention until presented in this way, have supplied abundant material to the skilful draughtsman employed."—Western Morning News.

"The number is certain to prove a most agreeable companion for those who like to take their summer holidays easily."—Nottingham Daily Guardian.

"Will, from its novel and interesting character, be a great success."—Chester Courant.

"The novelty of the publication consists in several pages of admirably-executed coloured illustrations, representing the various recreations and amusements indulged in by visitors to our fashionable watering-places."—Christian World.

Topics of the Week

The Debate.——From a merely oratorical point of view the defence of the policy of the Government in the course of the great debate has not been nearly so strong as the attack. Lord Hartington led off with a very moderate and effective speech; and Mr. Gladstone spoke with a fiery eloquence that he has not surpassed for many a day. Yet there can be little doubt that on the whole the nation is rather with the Government than with the Opposition. Of the Treaty of Berlin it is not necessary to say much. Mr. Gladstone was indignant at the manner in which it had been brought about, and he charged the British Plenipotentiaries with persistently discouraging the aspirations of the various populations for liberty; but even he seemed to be tolerably well satisfied with the Treaty itself. It was against the Anglo-Turkish Convention that he directed the real force of his argument. He failed, however, to grapple with the primary question whether it is necessary to our safety that Russia should be prevented from advancing further into Asia Minor. On this point the majority of Englishmen are undoubtedly agreed. Whether rightly or wrongly, they have made up their minds that the Russians must not be allowed, if we can hinder them, to step a mile beyond the limits they have already reached. It only remains, therefore, to consider whether, in the event of our doing nothing, they would be likely to try to extend their power in Asia Minor, and whether we have adopted the best means of discouraging their encroachments. On the first point Mr. Gladstone was very dogmatic; he saw no reason why we should suppose that the condition of the Asiatic provinces of the Porte would ever offer any temptation to Russia. But his mere statement is not enough to settle the question. We have already considerable experience to guide us, and that unquestionably leads to the conclusion that with a feeble central authority the populations of Asia Minor would be more than ever liable to disturbance and intrigue. About the other point—the means we are about to take to avert this danger—there is more difficulty. The Government have never yet defined their position with perfect precision. It is certain that if the task of reform is to be undertaken solely by the Pashas it will not be executed in a manner satisfactory to this country; yet our promise of protection has been given on condition that there shall be good government. The Ministry ought to let the world know by what measures they propose to effect all those fine results about which Lord Sandon spoke with so much enthusiasm. There is a growing suspicion that they have not given such serious attention to this subject as it requires, and that although England may hereafter have to fight for Asia Minor, she will not do so in the interests of the Porte.

The Premier and the Ex-Premier.——Personalities may be regrettable, but they rarely fail to arouse interest, and, just as a very small joke raises a laugh during a particularly solemn trial in a court of justice, so, amid the protracted discussion of the recent foreign policy of the Government, the passage-of-arms between the Premier that was, and the Premier that is, has stimulated the flagging attention of the public. Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone have for long been political foes, but of late their mutual hostility appears to have deepened, on one side, at least, into downright personal dislike. For some time after he quitted office Mr. Gladstone was too busy with the Papal Infallibility Question to pay much attention to his ancient Parliamentary rival; but, as soon as the Bulgarian troubles turned the attention of all men to the East, he left off pummelling the Pope, and devoted all his energies to attacking the policy of the Government. As the Prime Minister was, confessedly, the inspiring genius of the Cabinet, and has latterly, since the secession of two of his colleagues, exercised almost absolute power there, these attacks have gradually assumed more and more of a personal complexion. Mr. Gladstone may deny that he called Lord Beaconsfield "devilish," but when one of his adherents asks him "How are we to get rid of this Mephistopheles?" and he replies by giving an elaborate prescription for the purpose, it is clear that he thought Mephistopheles, or, in plain English, Devil, not a misplaced epithet for Her Majesty's chief public servant. The Premier has far more power of self-control than the ex-Premier, and so he waited for his revenge till the banquet of Saturday night, when, in reply to the criticism that he had entered into an "insane" Convention, he delivered that elaborate definition of his opponent which will probably become historical. Closely examined, there is nothing unjustifiable or even untrue in this description. Even his warmest admirers must admit that Mr. Gladstone is diffuse, and that his eloquence often runs away with him. The fact is that the polysyllabic structure of the passage makes it sound far more terrible than it really is, and we incline to think that the Premier has borrowed a weapon from the armoury of a doughty combatant, with whom he had many a rude brush in days gone by, namely, the late Daniel O'Connell. Mr. O'Connell, it is well-known, reduced an apple-woman, famed for her slanging propensities, to silence by pelting her with such astonishing epithets as "parallelogram" and "isosceles." Lord Beaconsfield has been less fortunate than the "Liberator," for, although he has uttered a stinging phrase which will dwell in men's memories, he has certainly not managed to make Mr. Gladstone hold his tongue.

The New Governor-General of Canada.——It is a long time since any public appointment has been so well received as that of Lord Lorne to be Governor-General of Canada. He himself is believed to have some qualities which eminently fit him for the post, but it is the presence of his wife at Ottawa which will give its special character to his term of office. There used to be a prevailing impression that England did not much care about her colonies, and would be heartily glad when she could get rid of the burden they impose upon her. The present Government has made it one of the main objects of its policy to combat this notion, and it could not have hit upon a happier device than that of sending out a daughter of the Queen to the very colony which, in the event of a war with the United States, it would be most difficult to defend. She will probably be all the more popular because of the Republican institutions across the border, and will help the Canadians to realise more vividly than ever their relation not only to England but to the whole Empire of which England is the centre. It is to be hoped that the Government will be able to give fresh applications to the idea it has so happily struck out. Why should not the Duke of Connaught represent the Queen in Ireland? And might it not be possible to make Prince Leopold Viceroy of India? If the members of the Royal Family were employed in this way, a certain lustre would be shed on the great offices at the disposal of the Crown, and a good answer would be provided to ill-natured questions as to the uses of princes.

Reformatories.——The moral atmosphere of a reformatory is, we should trust, superior to that of the gaols of former days, where old and young, convicted and unconvicted, hardened and repentant, were all huddled together. Still, remembering what mischief a few viciously-disposed lads can effect in a school where the children come well-tended from home, how low must be the general tone in a school where every boy is more or less unsound in morals! It is true that the discipline is stern, far sterner than in a school of ordinary boys, who can in many respects be trusted to look after one another, and probably to lads who come from wretched drunken parents, or from the semi-starvation of the streets, the reformatory may even seem a haven of rest. But the ordeal must be a very severe one to lads who have had all the advantages of a good home, but who have forfeited these advantages by the commission of thefts. The question then arises whether such boys as these are benefited or injured by being incarcerated in company with those who, unlike themselves, have been brought up from babyhood amid brutality and debauchery. Children feel misery very keenly, and there is doubtless a vast deal of misery hidden away from the public eye in these establishments. Hence, and mingled no doubt with the boyish love of adventure,—the mutinies which occasionally take place in reformatories—and of which an instance occurred last week. One almost pities the poor wretches, after their brief taste of freebooting, driven back to their monotonous round of discipline. Nor is it satisfactory to remember that there are heartless and brutal parents who actually encourage their children to commit crime, in order that they may be thus taken off their hands. A woman before the magistrate the other day, admitted that all her children were in reformatories except the one then under examination.

The Austrians in Bosnia.——Austrian troops have now crossed the Save, and there is no reason to doubt that the population of the occupied territory will profit largely by their presence. The poorer classes will at last know what it is to live under a civilised Government, while the richer proprietors will be saved from the perils of incessant threats of revolution. Europe, and England especially, will also benefit by the enterprise which Austria has undertaken, for henceforth Russia will be unable to advance a step further towards Constantinople without the consciousness that she may at any moment be checked by a powerful rival. For Austria herself, the consequences of her present policy are likely to be far more serious than are at present generally realised. The Slavonic element now becomes the most important in the Empire; which means that the Empire must steadily extend its influence towards the south-east. As the Hungarians have always protested against the predominance of the Slavs, their bitterest jealousies will be aroused, and no one who knows anything of their character will suppose that it will be easy to allay their suspicions. They have so fierce a sense of independence that rather than be absorbed in a virtually Slavonic Empire, they would go on fighting at intervals from generation to generation. The inhabitants of the German provinces take the occupation of Bosnia quietly, but in the long run they also will be powerfully influenced by it. They have hitherto regarded themselves as the dominant race, and it is inconceivable that they should be satisfied to see themselves more and more supplanted. Prince Bismarck has always wished that Austria should become a great Slavonic Power, expressly because he believes that in that case the Austrian Germans must inevitably be attracted towards the German Empire. Nothing of this kind may happen for a long time, but there can be little doubt that the tendency of events will be in accordance with the ideas of the far-seeing Chancellor. It is possible, therefore, as Mr. Grant Duff pointed out in his able speech on Monday, that in settling the Eastern Question the Powers have laid the seeds of a great central European question. This will not so directly affect England as the problem which has been temporarily solved, but it will have even a keener interest for several of the most cultivated nations in the world.

Socotra.——Because, perhaps, we ourselves live upon an island, we have always had a taste for appropriating islands. During the great French War, we were accused, and not without cause, of frittering away our soldiers' lives in the seizure of West Indian sugar islands, instead of giving effectual aid to Breton loyalists and others, who would have been valuable allies. This island-mania seems to have revived of late years. We have annexed Fiji, the Australians would be well pleased if we were to annex New Guinea—and we may yet be compelled to do so, for the sake of the aborigines, should payable gold fields be discovered there—we have just taken formal possession of Cyprus, and now we learn that the British flag has been hoisted at Socotra. Socotra is, in some respects, better known to Englishmen than Cyprus was a month ago, because P. and O. passengers often coast along the island just before entering or quitting the Red Sea. Socotra is barren and harbourless, its only product of note is the bitter aloe of medicine; but it is fairly healthy, it possesses running water, some vegetation, and a cool climate, considering its latitude. Except for its want of harbours, it would be far preferable as a military station to that scorched-up cinder heap, Aden. It seems that by a treaty made two years ago, we arranged for the possible occupation of the island, which some forty years since was abandoned in favour of Aden. The construction of the Suez Canal has increased the importance of Socotra, and this, it is said, has determined the action of the Indian Government.

The Metropolitan Police.——Lord Truro spoke in a dolorous tone the other evening as to the miserable way in which London is protected. Yet if he would go abroad, he would find that there are few great cities so well defended. Such vague charges as those in which he indulged appear to us to be extremely ill-advised. They tend to make the force unpopular, and, besides, they are very inaccurate. There are doubtless black sheep among the London police, as among every other body of officials; but, on the whole, it is wonderful how well they discharge their difficult duties. Every instance of carelessness or recklessness on their part is freely commented on; it is often forgotten that they display courage and tact in thousands of cases of which we hear nothing. They are at present claiming an advance of wages, and there was an alarming rumour some days ago that if they did not obtain it they meant to strike. We hope for their own sakes that there is no truth in this report, for they may be sure that if they were to act with selfish disregard of the public safety the community would insist on their being sternly dealt with. On the other hand, their demands ought to weighed with the fullest desire to do them justice. In these days there is only one way of securing good service; and that is by paying generously for it. If it is the fact that the wages of the police are inadequate, the public will suffer most in the end, for inadequate wages will ultimately be accepted only by an inferior class of men.

Permissive Liquor Legislation——Mr. Bright has spoken very strongly against the Permissive Prohibitory Bill, holding that the United Kingdom Alliance will never get the public to go with them unless they discover some other method of combating drunkenness. Sir Wilfrid Lawson is naturally much disappointed at this, for Mr. Bright, being not only a distinguished politician, but also an ardent advocate of temperance, would be a most valuable ally. Mr. Bright's repugnance to Sir Wilfrid's pet panacea probably arises from the fact that, like most of the older school of Radicals, he strongly dislikes fettering individual action, even for the sake of accomplishing undoubted good. Hence his hostility to the Acts for restricting the hours of female and child labour in factories, and his lukewarmness about Adulteration. Although this is a subject on which we would express our views with considerable diffidence, we have always felt that there is much to be said in favour of the Permissive

Bill. In the first place, people often argue as if the passage of such a measure would result in the shutting up of all public-houses. But they forget that the moderate drinkers form the largest part of the community, and are not likely, therefore, to vote for the closing of such places as minister to their own convenience. Secondly, we all know that a public-house may be a nuisance, yet not an indictable nuisance. Who, in such a case, has the best right to decide whether such a house should be closed or not, the magistrate, who lives at a distance, or the householder who lives hard by, and who suffers from the quarrels and foul language excited by the alcohol sold there? Thirdly, there can be no doubt that the present system encourages far more houses than (from a moderate drinker's point of view) there is any real need of, especially as every grocer sells alcoholic drinks. Lastly, we should have more belief in the wisdom of the magistrates as licensers if they made it a condition of granting a license that the publican should supply tea and coffee of fair quality at moderate prices to all persons demanding it, and that he should also provide more ample sitting accommodation for his customers. He would thus become in reality, as well as in name, a licensed victualler; and there would be less need then for Coffee-palaces, since the existing taverns would afford proper accommodation, as they ought, both for drinkers of alcohol and for abstainers. Meanwhile we shall watch with interest how the Permissive experiment succeeds in Canada.

CYPRUS

NIKOSIA, the ancient Lefkosia, is the capital of our new colony in the Mediterranean, and though it is far from being the important town that it was under the reign of the Lusignan Kings, by the first of whom it was built, or their Venetian successors, it contains some 16,000 inhabitants, and, before the British occupation, was the residence of the Pasha and of the Greek Metropolitan of the island. The town is situated in the centre of the island in a plain surrounded by mountains, and contains several archæological features of interest, amongst which is the Church of St. Sophia, a fine Gothic building now converted into a mosque, and in which Mr. Phil Robinson tells us, in his interesting little pamphlet, are some sadly mutilated monuments to the Lusignans. There are also a fine bazaar, a khan for travellers, several Greek churches and convents, a Roman Catholic church, and the palace of the Governor, on the portal of which is still seen the Venetian lion in stone. The bastioned walls erected by the Venetians are still standing. These walls are of considerable strength, and for forty days resisted the onslaught of the Turks under Mustapha Pasha in 1570, the city being, however, ultimately taken by storm. The streets, as usual in Eastern cities, are narrow and dirty, and many of the fine old mansions are tumbling into decay. Carpets, cotton prints, and morocco leather are the chief industrial products, and there is some trade in raw cotton and wine. The best wine, however, commanderie, is grown near Limasol, a seaport town on the south coast, some forty-two miles south-west from Larnaca. Limasol is the principal seat of the wine trade, and possesses a fair harbour, although the town itself is in ruins. In addition to the wine trade, large quantities of carobs or locust beans, which grow abundantly throughout the district, are exported to Russia, Egypt, and Syria.

Another of the few harbours which the island possesses is Famagosta, which is situated on the west coast, and which in the time of the Venetians was strongly fortified, as may be seen by the water-gate in one of our illustrations. The town now, however, has fallen into dire decay, while the country around has become marshy from neglect, and is notoriously the most unhealthy district in the island. Famagosta is principally celebrated for its renowned defence against the Turks in 1571, the Venetian Admiral, Bagadino, finally capitulating on condition that he and his followers should be allowed to return to Venice—a compact shamelessly broken by the Turks, who flayed Bagadino, and, stuffing his skin with straw, sailed about the Ægean with it hauled to a ship's mast as an ensign. This trophy was subsequently ransomed by the Venetians, who still preserve it in their museum as a precious relic.

THE YOUNG PRINCES AT DARTMOUTH.

LAST week the Prince and Princess of Wales paid a visit to Dartmouth for the double purpose of presenting the prizes to the successful cadets on board the Britannia, and bringing home their two sons for the Midsummer holidays. Their Royal Highnesses went down on Tuesday by special train, and were taken on board the Britannia in the "Royal Galley," which was manned by the cadets, with Prince Albert Victor as coxswain, and Prince George as second bow-oar (Messrs. Smale and Son, of Dartmouth, have published some very good photographs of the boat and crew; the likenesses are most striking, and the crew are taken in three positions). After inspecting the vessel, the Royal Party were rowed ashore by the same crew, and after driving through the decorated and crowded streets of the town, they re-embarked in the same boat, and were rowed up the river to the Royal yacht Osborne, in which H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught had come round from Portsea, and on board of which the Royal party dined and remained for the night. On Wednesday the Corporation of Dartmouth were received on board the Osborne, and the Mayor presented an address, in acknowledging which the Prince of Wales alluded to the salubrity of the climate, complimented the Corporation on the excellency of their sanitary arrangements, and said that both the Princess and himself were perfectly satisfied with the step they had taken in placing their two sons on board the Britannia. The Royal party then went on board the training-ship, where the Princess distributed the prizes to the cadets who were about to leave the vessel; and the Prince made another speech recommending those who were to remain to be studious and obedient, and to remember Admiral Nelson's saying, "England expects every man will do his duty." He concluded by remarking that the Princess and himself felt a personal interest in the ship, and confidence in it as a practical school for boys, and expressing a hope that his two sons might do credit to it, and to their country.

The young Princes, Albert Victor and George, have now been on board the Britannia nine months, and the life appears to suit them in every respect, as they are both strong, healthy-looking youths. They have special apartments, and every care is taken of them, but no distinction is made between them and the other cadets as regards duties or discipline. They are instructed in the mysteries of navigation, and taught to knot and splice a rope, handle a tiller or an oar; and we dare say are by this time fully acquainted with the name and use of every part of the vessel, from keelson to main-truck.

TORPEDO EXPERIMENTS

MRS. BRASSEY sends us the following account of some torpedo experiments which she witnessed off Portland, on the 1st ult., from on board Mr. Brassey's yacht Sunbeam. The engraving is from a sketch by the Hon. A. Y. Bingham, who, it may be remembered, illustrated the narrative of this vessel's voyage round the world.

"For more than an hour there were sounds of bugles on all the ships composing the splendid fleet now assembled here. The Blazer and Bustard got under weigh, and a number of small steam launches cruised about with a red torpedo fastened to an enormous spar, lashed amidships, and projecting far beyond the bows. We had not long to wait before tremendous explosions occurred. The water flew into the air like Crystal Palace fountains, and the time which it took to descend proved how high its flight had been. The yacht felt as if she had been hit violently from below by some of Vulcan's own giant hammers. The smaller boats were tossed about like corks. The larger vessels (I afterwards heard) felt scarcely any effect.

"Soon after there was a second explosion, not so violent as the first, from what appeared to be a different sort of torpedo. After that the boats returned to their respective quarters; there was a Royal salute, and all was quiet. Since then the children have been out in the dingey collecting hundreds of little fish killed by the explosion."

OUR OBITUARY RECORD

ADMIRAL SIR GEORGE BACK, who died on the 23rd ult., was born in 1796, and when only twelve years of age, entered the Royal Navy as midshipman on board the Arethusa. He saw some active service during the war on the French and Spanish coasts, and was a prisoner in France from 1809 to 1814. He afterwards served under Sir Edward Colpoys, on the Halifax Station, and in 1818 joined a vessel under Sir John Franklin, whom he accompanied on his overland expedition from Hudson's Bay to the Coppermine River, having already taken part with Captain Buchan in his perilous voyage of discovery to the neighbourhood of Spitzbergen. In 1821 he became Lieutenant, and in 1825 started with Sir J. Franklin on his second Arctic Expedition, and while in North America he was promoted to be Commander. After the return of the expedition he remained for some years without active employment, but in 1833 he was appointed to the command of another expedition, the object of which was to seek and relieve Sir John Ross, who had gone out some four years previously to find the North-West Passage. The results of this enterprise were fully recounted by him in a volume published after his return in 1835, and in the same year, having been made a Captain, he started again in H.M.S. Terror, in command of another expedition to the Frigid Zone; of this also he published an account shortly after his return in 1837, when he was awarded the gold and silver medals of the Geographical Society and the gold medal of the Geographical Society of Paris, of which he was made a corresponding member. He was knighted in 1839, elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1847, and in 1854 he received a good service

AMONGST ALIENS

By FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE

AUTHOR OF "A CHARMING FELLOW," "AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE," "BLACK SPIRITS AND WHITE," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

My sister at length fell into a deep sleep, and I sat down to think at my leisure. First I read over again more than once the Princess's letter. In spite of the passion of indignation which surged up in me each time my eyes rested on its hateful words, I forced myself to read it attentively until I had thoroughly mastered its contents. Ugh! Even to think of it now makes me hot with anger; and at the time I believe it would have cost me a less effort of will to hold my hand against a scorching flame than it did to compel my mind steadily to consider that letter with all the judgment I could bring to bear on it.

First of all there needed but little reflection to convince me that the Princess's statement respecting the "revelations" made to her by the little girls, Francesca and Livia, of Don Vittorio's interviews with Lucy in the schoolroom, was a lying pretence. She ignorant of what went on day after day in her own house! I believe a mouse could hardly stir behind the wainscot but she knew it. No; had she wished to prevent her son's visits to the schoolroom she could have done so with perfect ease. Why she had chosen to permit those visits, and why, having permitted them, she now chose to reproach Lucy with them, I did not yet see.

The next point was a more startling and painful one. She spoke of stolen interviews between her son and my sister in the gardens of the Villa d'Este. This too, I was at first convinced was a falsehood, but on a second and calmer perusal of the letter that conviction was shaken. I could not waken Lucy to question her then; it would have been too cruel. And so the doubt remained in my mind, as painful and irritating as a thorn in the flesh. But I must perforce wait until next morning to remove it.

Thirdly, I was struck by the loophole which the Princess left open to Lucy for a possible reconciliation. It is true she never used that word. She even declared that she must forbid her children to hold any communication with Lucy, or to see her again. But I understood her phraseology well enough to be sure that she intended to hold out a glimmer of hope. Her words about cutting short my career in Rome—her phrase "Your reputation is destroyed for ever if I speak one-half of what I know and can prove against you," were all conditional threats. On what was their fulfilment, or non-fulfilment, to be contingent? Not on the Christian charity of Donna Olympia Corleoni, let the condition be what else it might! Heaven help any creature in her power who should depend on that hollow mockery! Her object seemed to me, to be first to beat down Lucy into the dust, and then to raise her from it after her own good will and pleasure. She had reckoned on Lucy's childish inexperience, on her softness and timidity, on the sensitiveness of her affections. She had learned accurately the points of the girl's nature that could be most effectually hurt.

"But you have not quite as accurately learned to know me, Donna Olympia Bastiani Corleoni!" I exclaimed to myself.

Lucy still slept, or seemed to sleep, when I went to my bed beside hers in the same room. The next morning I awoke with the dawn, and looking over at her saw her pale face tinted with the rose hues of sun-rise, and the tears stealing down her cheeks from beneath her closed eyelids. I arose, and wrapped some clothes loosely round me, and went and seated myself on the side of her bed. "Lucy," I said, "you are not sleeping. I want to talk to you."

She shrank away, hiding her face in the pillow without opening her eyes, and murmured brokenly, "Oh, Catherine, don't be angry with me! Don't you cease to love me, or I shall die."

"Angry with you, my pet? No, little Lucy, my little sister that I have loved from a tiny, tiny infant! You cannot think that I shall cease to love you. If your dear dead mother could come back to earth, I think even she would be content with my love for you, Lucy."

Then the poor child burst into a passion of sobbing, and throwing her arms round my neck, blessed and thanked me and begged me to forgive her and love her still, though she had been "very, very wrong to deceive me," until my eyes filled too, and we cried in each other's arms. The ebullition of her pent-up feelings relieved her heart overcharged with sorrow and shame and vague terrors. And presently she was able to speak to me clearly, and with something like calmness. The gist of what she told me was this:

Don Vittorio Corleoni had professed the most fervent love for her. The first announcement of his passion had been made in a little note slipped into her hand with the English letter she was to translate. In it he had conjured her to keep his secret for the present, as he should have to encounter many troubles and annoyances if it were known, as yet. He trusted to her honour not to betray him to his mother, or to her sister, or to any one. She had returned his note to him at the earliest opportunity, and had told him that if he so addressed her again she should be compelled to appeal to the Princess. So far, so good. But what chance had little soft-hearted, simple-minded Lucy against Vittorio Corleoni? The poor child had fallen in love with the fine qualities her romantic fancy attributed to that handsome, high-bred mask, those beautiful deep blue eyes. I have recently read somewhere the dictum enunciated by a masculine critic that "no man but a fool can fail to perceive when a woman is in love with him." Don Vittorio's folly, at all events, was not of the kind which is apt to fall into mistakes from diffidence of its own attractions or a too exalted opinion of the claims of others. He thought it the most probable thing in the world that Lucy should be in love with him; any other state of things would have been almost inconceivable to him.

In a word, he persuaded her to trust in him, and to keep the first secret she had ever had from me. It is not a new or rare case. A sister, even the fondest, has small chance against a lover, when they are weighed by a girl of eighteen in all the enchantment of a first romance of the heart. But Lucy vowed—and I believed her—that her secrecy from me was to be only for a brief while: that she never ceased to urge Vittorio to confide in me, whom she could trust as herself, she assured him; and that he constantly promised to tell me everything soon, if Lucy would but be patient and prudent for a little time. He had even spoken of his great respect for me and admiration of my talents, and had hinted at the great things he and Lucy might be able to do for my advancement as an artist. Ah, poor, credulous, unsuspecting child! He had fooled her to the top of her bent. The extent of his influence over her was more startlingly represented to me by the following circumstance than by anything else—she had kept the most absolute silence about his pursuit to her, even to Monsignore Chiappaforti! That that astute gentleman more than suspected it I did not doubt, but at least he had not heard a hint of it from Lucy. She had been firm and staunch.

The efforts to convert her had gone on in the Palazzo Corleoni simultaneously with Don Vittorio's wooing, but apart from it. Lucy, poor child, was eager to assure me that her mind had been drawn to the Roman Catholic Church before she had ever thought of Vittorio has a lover. And I did not doubt that she spoke the truth. Nevertheless, I did not doubt also that—unconsciously, perhaps, to herself—her infatuation for Don Vittorio prepared her to be infatuated with his faith, with his family, with his country,—with all that belonged to him. By a series of searching questions I gathered from Lucy that Don Vittorio had shown himself but lukewarm on the subject of her conversion. And this fact alone would have been sufficient to convince me (even had there not been, alas! a crowd of others pointing to the same conclusion) that he did not mean honourably by her. His wife—the wife of Don Vittorio de' Principi Bastiani Corleoni and the future head of the house!—must of course belong to the true Church. Heresy would have meant degradation, decadence, social ostracism, for his wife; but for his mistress, the case was different! My blood boiled in my veins as I thought of it all. But no suspicion of this kind appeared to have crossed Lucy's mind. Having once begun her confession she spoke freely and without reservation. "Vittorio cannot blame me for telling you now," she said.

pension, and was created an honorary D.C.L. of Oxford. In 1857 he obtained flag rank, but had not been afloat since that date.—Our portrait is from a photograph by Barraud and Jerrard, 96, Gloucester Place, Portman Square.

Major-General William McBean, V.C.——Although the aphorism that every soldier carries a marshal's batôn in his knapsack has no very general application to the British Army, the career of this distinguished veteran is a proof that the British soldier may sometimes rise from the ranks to a very high position in his profession. Major General McBean was originally a drummer-boy (under age) in the 93rd Regiment (Sutherland Highlanders), and with that corps he spent forty-five years of his life, rising step by step until he held the command of it; not only distinguishing himself in every rank by his gallantry and daring, but conducting himself in such a way towards his comrades as to earn the respect of his brother officers and the affection and admiration of the men. His first commission (as Ensign) was awarded to him in August, 1854, when serving in the Crimea under Sir Colin Campbell, now Lord Clyde, and he was promoted to be Lieutenant in the following December. In 1854 he was made Captain, received the brevet rank of Major in 1860, and of Lieutenant-Colonel in 1871. In 1872 he was promoted to be Major in the Army, and in the following year Lieutenant-Colonel. He served throughout the Crimean campaign and the expedition to the Sea of Azoff, and was present at the capture of Kertch and Yenikale; and was rewarded with the Crimean medal and clasp, the Turkish medal, and the Order of Medjidie. During the Indian Mutiny he was with Lord Clyde in many actions, including the fighting at Cawnpore and the Siege of Lucknow, where he killed eleven men with his own hand in the main breach of the Begum Dagh, on March 11, 1858, and for this distinguished bravery he received the Victoria Cross, the medal with two clasps, and his brevet rank. When promoted to the rank of Major-General, he was placed upon the Retired List; but his love for his old comrades was so great that, when his last illness came, he pathetically begged to be taken back to Woolwich that he might "die amongst the men." His request was complied with, and he died in the Herbert Hospital, whence, a few days afterwards, his remains were taken, with full military honours, to the railway station for conveyance to Edinburgh, where they were interred. There was never a finer specimen of the British soldier than General McBean, and the officers and men of the 93rd may well be proud that he belonged to their corps.—Our portrait is from a photograph by J. Henderson, Albert Place, Perth.

WILLIAM CRESSWELL

It will be remembered that during the progress of the Tichborne case, and since the conviction of the Claimant, vague rumours, to the effect that the real Arthur Orton was still alive somewhere in Australia, were from time to time set afloat by the believers in the man who claimed to be Roger Tichborne. At first, nothing was pretended to be known as to his whereabouts, or his reason for not coming forward. After a while it was affirmed that he was "wanted" for a murder committed years ago in the Australian bush, and that was accepted as an all-sufficient reason for his keeping out of the way; but at last it was boldly stated that he had been discovered in the Parramatta Lunatic Asylum, where he had for some years been an inmate under another name; and last year Mrs. Jury was sent out from England to identify him. She, however, failed to do so; but the Tichbornites, nothing daunted, in April last caused an application to be made to the Colonial Legislature for an order that the lunatic should be given up for the purpose of being sent to England. The application appears to have fallen through in consequence of a "count out;" and so far as can be gleaned from the debate, it appears that, on the one hand, attention was called to the fact that Cresswell's wife had stated that, up to the time of their marriage in 1863, the lunatic had gone by the name of Smith, and that he had told her that his name was neither Smith nor Cresswell, but Arthur Orton, and that he was a son of George Orton, a butcher, of Wapping. She had not said so before, because she did not want to come to England to give evidence. A warder at Darlinghurst Gaol had said that when the lunatic was formerly in confinement there, he was known as Orton; and a Mr. Forbes had made a declaration to the effect that he did not bear the name of Cresswell until 1863. On the other hand, it was shown by Mr. Fitzpatrick, the Colonial Secretary, that the man was sent to prison, and afterwards to the asylum, as Cresswell, without any alias, that he bore no tattoo-marks, or signs of ever having had his ears pierced; that Mrs. Jury said she was quite satisfied that he was not her brother; and that he, while failing to recognise any of the numerous portraits of the Orton family which were shown to him, at once recognised that of a Mrs. Gough as his sister, of whom he had previously been heard to speak. We must leave our readers to form their own judgment.

THE BANQUET TO LORD BEACONSFIELD

On Saturday evening a grand banquet was given to Lord Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury by a large body of Conservative Peers and Members of the House of Commons in the Duke of Wellington's Riding School, at Knightsbridge, in order to testify their appreciation and approval of the services of the two British Plenipotentiaries during the late Congress at Berlin. The dinner was presided over by the Duke of Buccleuch, and was attended by 500 guests, though a larger number would have been present had the accommodation been sufficient. The hall was profusely decorated with flags, banners, and mottoes, foremost amongst which was one which formed the text for the evening's speeches—"Peace with Honour." After the usual toasts to the Queen and the Prince of Wales had been drunk, the Duke of Buccleuch, on whose right and left hand sat Lord Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury respectively, proposed the toast of the evening, "The Health of Lord Beaconsfield," adding, "and welcome home to him, welcome to him as the greatest conqueror who has vanquished war and brought us back peace." Lord Beaconsfield's reply, though perhaps it can hardly be termed one of his best speeches, was an eloquent defence of his policy at the Congress with regard to Greece as well as of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, and it was after expressing his astonishment at Mr. Gladstone stigmatising the Convention as "insane" that he gave utterance to the sentence which has been quoted underneath our illustration, finally declaring that he left "the decision upon that Convention to the Parliament and the people of England." The health of the Marquis of Salisbury was then proposed by the Earl of Malmesbury, to whom the Marquis duly replied in a speech endorsing all that the Prime Minister had said, and in particular the statement that it was only on the urgent representations of himself that the Earl of Beaconsfield had been persuaded to go to Berlin and accept a post "which was certain to be fatiguing and might be dangerous."

AN ARTIST'S VISIT TO THE HOLY LAND

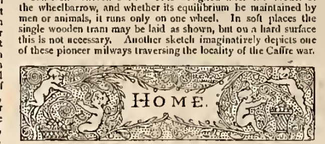
A PIONEER RAILWAY

A section of a novel military or pioneer railway was built about two months ago on the ground lying waste at the rear of Whitehall Place in four hours; and to show the simplicity of the work, its constructors were ten soldiers sent as a fatigue party from the Grenadier Guards and one or two ordinary unskilled labourers. This railway is the invention of Mr. J. L. Haddan, ex-engineer-in-chief of the Ottoman Government, and the railway was primarily designed to meet the need in the East of having a speedily constructed, cheap, and effective means of transport for men and stores over a wild country without the necessity of surveying, levelling, and passing through the preliminary stages of ordinary railway making. The new railway is a "one rail" structure, and the line it represented requires neither sleepers nor foundations, the line running upon 7ft. posts, 440 to a mile, the rolling stock upon it being shaped like an inverted V, designed upon the "camel saddle" principle. The carriages and engines fall on each side like panniers on an animal's back, the wheels of the engines, trucks, and carriages being horizontal, and gripping on each side of the rail. The material of the new railway is wholly of timbers, which were brought on the ground ready cut for use, and the plans having been explained to the serjeant of the fatigue party, the piles were sunk in the ground, the cross timbers were readily fixed and bolted, and by a series of ingeniously designed wedges an 80 ft. or 100 ft. section of the line, running over very uneven ground, was made secure and apparently solid. After a paper had been read on this subject by the inventor, at the Royal United Service Institution, General Sir Garnet Wolseley, K.C.B., who presided, remarked that in these days of short and sharp campaigns earthworks, which required time for consolidation, were out of the question, for now armies did not sit down to long campaigns like the sieges of Troy and Sebastopol. Other systems required good roads, but for a country without the roads, and in rapidity and simplicity of construction, Mr. Haddan's railway would meet an army's wants.

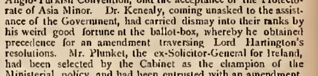
The sample section of the railway above referred to was erected at a speed equivalent to one mile a day for every hundred men employed. The posts of the timber fence which constitute the road are firmly sunk into the ground. Its height rarely exceeds three feet, since it follows, as nearly as may be, the natural undulations of the country traversed, small hollows being graded out by varying the height of the posts. The waggons—or, in fact, the whole train—form a continuous iron skeleton, on which the freight is carried in standard-sized boxes, so as to be moveable without breaking bulk. The seats are turned down when troops and baggage are transported together, but turned up out of the way when freight alone is carried. The empty freight boxes are arranged to do duty as ambulance palanquins or pontoons. The engine, which only weighs four tons, and is of a hundred-horse power, does not require weight to give it tractive capacity, and can consequently, by means of its eight horizontal grip-wheels, actively climb a hill-side (grade 1 in 10) with a load of 100 tons behind it. As Commander Cameron, the African traveller, recommends this pioneer railway for the further development of that continent, one of our sketches represents the "Cameron Pontoon Cart." It is designed after the model of the wheelbarrow, and whether its equilibrium be maintained by men or animals, it runs only on one wheel. In soft places the single wooden tram may be laid as shown, but on a hard surface this is not necessary. Another sketch imaginatively depicts one of these pioneer railways traversing the locality of the Caffre war.



HOME.

Political Affairs.——The main topic of the week has been the speeches made by the Premier and Lord Salisbury at the dinner given in their honour on Saturday last, and which we have alluded to in another column. Mr. Gladstone, evidently much nettled at the allusion made to him by the Earl of Beaconsfield, has written a studiously polite note to him, demanding explanations and references, which Lord Beaconsfield declares himself too busy to hunt up, as the search would extend over two years and a half, during which Mr. Gladstone has been constantly writing and speaking against him and his policy. He therefore delegates the work to his friends, who we doubt not will enter into it con amore. Meanwhile Captain Burnaby, in response to a similar challenge from the ex-Premier, has sent him a sufficiently lengthy list of "elegant extracts" from his recent speeches and writings. To-day the Ministers are to be received in the City, and more will probably be heard of the Treaty and the Convention. Temple Bar is being partially resuscitated for the occasion.—On Tuesday, Lord Salisbury visited the Queen at Osborne, and was invested by Her Majesty with the Order of the Garter.—The Liberal organisations in various parts of the country continue to express their disapprobation of the Eastern policy of the Government; the Leeds Four Hundred declare that the Convention ought to be annulled, as it is an attempt to introduce personal government, and the stealth and secrecy with which it was concluded are dishonourable to England; the Bristol Association, and the Nine Hundred of Liverpool have sent messages of thanks to Lord Hartington for so promptly protesting against it, whilst the National Reform Union demand the impeachment of the Ministers who advised Her Majesty to sanction the Convention, and call upon the Liberal leaders to take decisive action in defence of the privileges of Parliament and the liberties of the people.—The Daily News of Thursday contained a letter from Mr. Marvin, who was recently prosecuted for stealing the Anglo-Russian Agreement. He says, in vindication of his conduct, that he should never have revealed the summary which appeared in the Globe of May 30th, had he not been under the impression that the Agreement was to be made known to Parliament that evening, and published in the papers next morning. The full text, he says, he published as an answer to Lord Salisbury's assertion that the summary was unworthy of confidence; and declares that, his reputation as a contributor of reliable news being at stake, he would have done so had there been twenty Acts of Parliament against the offence instead of none. He explains that at the Foreign Office all papers are "confidential," but that documents which are intended never to be divulged are marked "secret and confidential;" and says that the Agreement belonged to the former category, whilst to the latter belonged another document, signed on May 31st, the nature of which he will not even hint at, although he has had great provocation to divulge the secret. He concludes by saying that when the proper time arrives he will "make other disclosures" which he is convinced will set his character right with the public.—The Marquis of Lorne has accepted the post of Governor-General of Canada, vacant by the retirement of Lord Dufferin.—The Labour Representation League have adopted a resolution, thanking the Members of Parliament who opposed the grant to H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught, and protesting against any such grants being made at a time of such great depression in all branches of national industries, which is the cause of such bitter struggles amongst our workpeople to provide necessaries of life.

Miscellaneous.——The Duke of Cambridge has issued a general order, conveying to the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the Army and the Militia Reserves the Queen's entire approbation of the manner in which they have discharged their duties whilst serving with the colours. Her Majesty trusts that the men will soon find re-employment, and feels assured that many employers of labour will gladly avail themselves of their services. The Reserve Forces Relief Committee have decided to keep open their Fund until the distress caused by the embodying of the Reserve shall have passed away. The office is at 6, Finsbury Chambers, E.C.—On Saturday, some 300 Reserve men from the forts at Gosport, while being marched to the dockyard to take passage in the Cymra, for Dublin, left the ranks, and swarmed into the public houses, the efforts of the officers to preserve discipline being entirely disregarded. When at last the men were got on board, many of them were drunk, and one falling down a hatchway sustained such severe injuries that he was relanded and taken to the military hospital.—The Eurydice has now been moved close to the shore, and on Wednesday she was partially pumped out. The bodies of the sailors between decks, which are in a fearful state of decomposition, are being removed in coffins.—A letter has been addressed by the Crown Prince of Germany to the Queen, thanking Her Majesty, in the name of the Emperor William, for the assistance rendered and the sympathy displayed by the English authorities and people on the occasion of the sinking of the Grosser Kurfürst.—On Wednesday, Mr. Brassey's yacht Sunbeam was run into by the troop-ship Assistance in Portsmouth Harbour, and was somewhat damaged by the collision.—On Thursday, last week, seventeen persons, who had started on a pleasure trip on Lough Silleo, county Cavan, were drowned by the upsetting of the boat. A boatman put out to their assistance, but could not reach them in time.—About a hundred persons were injured by an accident which occurred at Beccles, on the Great Eastern Railway last Saturday. A heavy ballast-train started from the station, but the engine not being powerful enough to draw it up the incline, it ran back with great velocity into an excursion train full of passengers. No lives were lost or limbs broken.



PARLIAMENT

With brief intervals snatched for further consideration of the Cattle Diseases Bill (which passed through Committee on Wednesday) the House of Commons has given itself up to the wearisome joys of a set debate. The subject has, of course, been the foreign policy of the Government, which was formally challenged on Monday by the Marquis of Hartington in a series of resolutions, which especially condemned the failure of the Congress to deal with the claims of Greece, the adoption of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, and the acceptance of the Protectorate of Asia Minor. Dr. Kenealy, coming unasked to the assistance of the Government, had carried dismay into their ranks by his weird good fortune at the ballot-box, whereby he obtained precedence for an amendment traversing Lord Hartington's resolutions. Mr. Plunket, the ex-Solicitor-General for Ireland, had been selected by the Cabinet as the champion of the Ministerial policy, and had been entrusted with an amendment. At the proper time for giving notice, Mr. Kenealy's name came first out of the ballot-box, and accordingly he would have the first opportunity of moving. The difficulty was, however, overcome by private arrangement, and, the Doctor disappearing, Mr. Plunket came to the front.

It cannot be said that the House approached with any enthusiasm the debate to which it had been invited. There was a general feeling that it was the proper thing to do. Precedents, which are always held sacred in Parliament, pointed to a challenge by the Opposition, an acceptance by the Ministry, and a marshalling of the hosts on either side in pitched battle. Everybody felt that, since such a debate was inevitable, it might easily and adequately have been disposed of in one night, or at most in two. But such an appropriation of time was felt to be out of proportion with the importance of the subject. Nothing less than a week would do, and, with a week before them, hon. members have prepared speeches in proportionate length. With one or two exceptions, length has indeed been the principal characteristic of the speeches delivered. Even the Marquis of Hartington, whose good sense unerringly leads him to the conclusion that, on average occasions, everything that is useful to say may be said in half an hour, was led astray by the artificial character of the arrangements for the debate. He spoke for an hour and forty minutes, and has rarely spoken worse. Not that the matter of his speech was not good. In the quality of substantiality and common sense the noble lord never fails. But his manner varies considerably, and on Monday all his characteristic faults were magnified. The harsh notes in his voice were more marked, the conclusion of the critical sentences were more than ordinarily inaudible, and liveliness was increasingly remote from his manner.

Either the force of example, the accident of ill-health, or the prevailing spirit of the debate had a fatal effect upon Mr. Plunket. This gentleman has fairly earned the character of being one of the most brilliant debaters in the House. He suffers from the drawback of a slight stutter. But this is so far overcome in the graceful flow of his oratory, and there are so many admirable things which distract the attention from it, that after he has been speaking a few moments the peculiarity is overlooked. On Monday, however, Mr. Plunket was dull, and the House, which had filled in anticipation of a great speech from him, emptied, hon. members strolling out with that frank disregard of conventionality peculiar to the Assembly, and most useful to a speaker desirous of gauging his own success.

Sir Charles Dilke made a good speech on the Greek aspect of the question; but after this the whole thing collapsed, and dulness sat throned in the House. It seemed quite appropriate, under the circumstances, that Mr. Bourke should be selected to speak for the Ministry. This he did about eleven o'clock, at which time the House had refilled. But it melted away again before the unspeakable dulness of the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and those who remained seized the opportunity to indulge in private conversation. This, of course, made matters worse. The effect upon a speaker of the discovery that his audience, instead of listening to him, are talking to each other is most dispiriting. To a man of resources, and of sufficient self-possession, one or two courses would have recommended themselves; either he would have brightened up, and compelled the attention of the House, or he would have brought his remarks to a conclusion. Mr. Bourke was equal to neither of these undertakings. It seemed impossible to him to arrive at a conclusion. He said the same things over and over again, and went at portentous length into the minutest details. But there must be an end to all things, and Monday night's debate terminated shortly after midnight, Mr. Greene accurately describing it as the dullest debate he had ever listened to, and plaintively imploring hon. members to bring the matter to a conclusion and let him and others go home to their business.

On Tuesday, however, all this was changed. At the outset the House showed the effects of the previous day's exercise. It was half empty and wholly dispirited. Lord Sandon was to renew the debate, and the noble lord had the satisfaction of knowing that the effect of the spread of this information was to give the House an appearance much less crowded than it is on ordinary occasions at the same time of day. But it was also known that Mr. Gladstone was to speak next, and this operated in quite a different direction. Hon. members seemed to have so timed their engagements as to arrive an hour late, when Lord Sandon would either have finished or would be nearing a conclusion. Hence the noble lord suffered some injustice, for as it happened, he was unusually animated, and delivered what is perhaps his best debating speech. But all points of comparison are merged in the splendour of Mr. Gladstone's success. He spoke for upwards of two hours and a half; a sustained flow of eloquence and argument which prevailed against the rooted habit of hon. members to begin to prepare for dinner at half-past six. After Mr. Gladstone had been speaking for a few minutes the House was crowded in every part, and at the close there remained a sufficient number to salute him with a burst of cheering the like of which has not been heard in the House of Commons for many years. This speech raised the level of the debate, and relieved it from the indictment of dulness under which it had fallen. On Thursday, Mr. Lowe did something to maintain the level; but these great speeches have been oases in a far reaching desert of verbosity.

SPORTING

The Turf.——As heretofore Goodwood has sounded the curfew of the London season, which, for the matter of that, has been practically dead weeks ago. Seldom has the meeting in the "ducal park," as it is the fashion to call it, been a more enjoyable one, though many of the events to be contested produced poor fields, at least as regards numbers. Fine weather, abundance of Royal personages, with the Prince and Princess of Wales at their head, the "upper ten" fully represented, the charming scenery looking its best, and the course in first-rate order, all this and more conduced to the success of a meeting which neither Epsom or Ascot can throw into the shade. The sport opened as usual with the time-honoured Craven Stakes, for which Hesper and Capillaire, to whom the former was conceding 3lbs., were made equal favourites at 6 to 4 against them. Hesper, however, was beaten at the distance, and Capillaire won in a canter by two lengths from Singleton. In the Richmond Stakes, which bids fair to become one of the chief two-year-old events of the season, Lord Falmouth, who seems year after year to have an inexhaustible supply of young stock of the best quality, produced Wheel of Fortune, and so good was her private reputation that in a field of thirteen she was made a 2 to 1 favourite, though his lordship's other crack filly, Leap Year, was among the competitors. The issue was hardly ever in doubt, as the favourite won easily enough by two lengths from General Peel's Peter; the Chance Colt now named Cadogan, filling the third place. The great handicap of the day was of course the Stewards' Cup, which now almost ranks in importance with the Royal Hunt Cup at Ascot as one of the chief sprint races of the year. It can boast having attracted to the post on one occasion more runners than ever faced the starter for any race in England, or, indeed, in the world, the occasion being the year 1861, when Croagh Patrick beat 44 other competitors. On this anniversary only twenty, the lowest number we believe since 1843, contested the event. As is so frequently the case for this class of race a comparatively dark animal was most fancied, some wonderful performance "at home" being the ground for the preference. So it came to pass that Sir G. Chetwynd's Cagliostro was elected to premiership, and 7 to 2 was taken against him. It often happens that these intended coups are brought off, but it was not so on Tuesday, the Duke of Hamilton's Midlothian being the winner. Strangely enough, His Grace also furnished the second in Lollypop, whom the general body of backers fancied most after Cagliostro. His Grace, some time before the race, made a public declaration by notice that he intended to win with Midlothian, and thus the rider of Lollypop, who could have won easily, was quite justified by turf law and practice in allowing Midlothian to come in first by easing his horse when he saw that Midlothian had the rest of the field settled. Of course there were heartburnings in many quarters; but there is not the slightest blame to be attached to the Duke of Hamilton. Whether the law of "declaration to win" requires reconsideration at the hands of the Jockey Club is another matter. The Stakes day, Wednesday, saw several small fields and one or two surprises, the most notable being the defeat of Insulaire by M. L. Delatre's Clocher, though the former was backed at 7 to 2 on him in the Sussex Stakes for three-year-olds. For some days past the winner has been backed for the St. Leger at 100 to 1, and so his supporters are in clover. Count Lagrange, however, received comfort for this defeat by winning the Drawing-Room Stakes with Inval, and the Lavant with Rayon d'Or. The Stakes produced an average field of handicap horses, numbering fourteen, of whom Norwich had for weeks past been more or less first favourite. He started at 4 to 1, and, with Fordham in the saddle, won cleverly by a length. It may be noted that Hampton, the winner in 1876, and Strathmore, who were next in demand, filled the second and third places, showing how accurately some handicaps are anticipated as to their result.

Cricket.——There has been no dearth of good games since our last. Suffolk has beaten Essex by 165 runs. For the first time in the annals of cricket Lancashire has met Gloucestershire, and at one time it seemed that the latter would be defeated; but, owing mainly to Mr. W. G. Grace's fine batting in the second innings, a draw was effected.—Surrey has received two defeats, the first from Yorkshire by 75 runs, the second from Kent by ten wickets.—The Australians have been astonishing the natives at Crewe, where the Twenty-two were beaten by 99 runs; and they made still shorter work with the Eighteen of Keighley and district.

Swimming.——The Lords and Commons' race, which now has become an annual competition, was brought off on Monday last, the course being from Putney to Westminster, a distance rather over five miles and a half. We do not mean that M.P.'s, aristocratic and plebeian, themselves engaged in "tachynectic" contest; but to them is due this struggle for the Amateur Championship of the Thames. Several competitors entered the lists, or, more correctly speaking, the water; and, as last year, Mr. Davenport, of the Ilex Club, was the winner. He thus continues to hold the Thirty-Guinea Cup.

Pigeon Shooting.——Capt. Bogardus and "Mr. Wallace," who recently made a tie of it in their match, each killing seventy-nine birds out of the hundred, have since settled their differences, the American crack shot having at last been defeated. He has a match on with Mr. Aubrey Coventry for 500*l.* a side, on the 6th of this month, to come off at Preston Park, Brighton, in the grounds of the International Gun and Polo Club.

New Music

Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co.——There is no falling off of strength and vigour in Part 39, Vol. 5, of The Organist's Quarterly Journal, wherein meritorious compositions will always find a place. "Bring something good, and you shall take your turn," appears to be the response of the conscientious editor to all musical composers, young or old. In readiness for harvest feasts and other rural festivals we find here a "Pastorale," by Gustav Merkel, and an "Andante Pastorale," by Albert E. Bishop, both equally meritorious in their way.—Carlton Speer contributes the "Senata Finale" to a work commenced in Part 37. If the young composer works steadily, as he has begun, he may hope to take a foremost position in the ranks of instrumental composers. A well-written and musicianly composition is "Andante," Introductory Voluntary, by H. C. Cole, F.C.O. The same may be said of an "Andante" by W. Greenwood.—"Introduction and Andante," by Dr. F. Hiller, is brilliant and showy, but really not so difficult as might be expected from this erudite composer, who, as a rule, has no mercy upon his executants.—A new edition of "The Psalmist," a collection of hymns, tunes, chants, and anthems for "Congregational Worship and Domestic Use," has been carefully revised and republished under the editorial superintendence of Ebenezer Prout, B.A. In this present age of musical culture, thanks to the many and varied means of instruction for the child, as well as the adult, congregational singing is no longer a thing to be despised. In comparatively humble churches it is gratifying to find that "the people" not only know when to sing, but when to be silent; for example, during an anthem or special piece of concerted music, the congregation is content to listen, but some of the most thrilling effects are produced by voices in unison, alternated by those in parts, that is to say full congregation and choir by turns. For the furtherance of this combination, which we may look for ten or twenty years hence in perfection, "The Psalmist" is well compiled.

Messrs. Clowes and Sons have published "The Psalter and Canticles," pointed and set to accompanying chants by the Rev. Sir H. W. Baker, Bart., and W. H. Monk. The first-named worker was taken away in the midst of his labour, leaving the result of many years' hard work to his partner, who well fulfilled his task. The pointing in this work is well worthy of attention as the result of much study and careful gleanings from reliable sources. An Organ and Choir edition of this work will shortly be published.

Messrs. Duff and Stewart.——Two ballads and a song, music by W. C. Levey, are well worthy of notice. "When Sparrows Build," the pathetic words of which are by Jean Ingelow, will make a sure effect when sung with true feeling by a high contralto voice. The compass is from C below the lines to E on the fourth space. Good advice for a medium tenor will be found in "Woo a Lassie, Win Her Well," written by J. S. Carter.—"The Spirit of Morn," words by E. J. G., is an ambitious, but not taking, song for a soprano.

Messrs. Moutrie and Son.——Three very sentimental songs for a tenor, the music of which is by H. Poulet, are respectively, "Poor Wounded Hearts" and "Nights of Music," the words by Thomas Moore, and best of the three, "Ah Si L'Amai!" words by Camillio Montelli.

Miscellaneous.——Although scarcely complimentary to the fair sex, "The Margery Daw," written and composed by E. Oxenford and J. Gledhill, is a pleasing song for a baritone, and will bring down thunders of applause at a seaside Penny Reading—at least from the sailors assembled.—A like success may be predicted under similar circumstances for "Hoist the Pennant," by the same collabarateurs (Messrs. J. B. Cramer and Co.). We were scarcely prepared to meet with Handel's popular "Lascia mio Pianga" under the English guise of "Flowers are Sighing," a song, English words by K. Lawrence; those who are not acquainted with the original will admire the present song, compass from D below the lines to E on the fourth space.—"Golden Dreams," a Mazurka Elegante for the Pianoforte, by Adam Wright, is spirited and tuneful (H. Beresford, Birmingham).—A song for a tenor or baritone to take with him into the country is "Let's Be Friends Again," words from Temple Bar, music by Harriet Young; it is poetical and tuneful enough to patch up any lover's quarrel (Messrs. Metzler and Co.).—From a cantata by O. W. Holmes, entitled "Old Father Time," music by H. K. Lewis, comes a fairly written four-part song, "Would You Like to See Your Oldest Friend?" this quartett is one of the best examples from its brethren and companions (Joseph Williams).—Once again, we fervently hope it may be the last of its kind for months to come, a bombastic nautical sea song, "British Seamen," comes before us, the joint production of Messrs. R. Ritchie and W. C. Levey. The only place where this song will find a welcome is at some seaport town (B. Williams).—Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew quite mistook her mission when she attempted to write waltzes. Her "Four Waltzes" for the pianoforte are halting in the extreme. This talented writer for vocalists and choralists will do well to leave dance music alone (Samuel Brewer).—The work of a practised musician is "The Marschner Andante," a prelude for the organ, harmonium, or piano, by F. Mirus (B. Williams).—A very fair specimen of its genus is "Gavotte Imperiale," for the piano, by Max Schroter (Messrs. Weekes and Co.).—As a study for her pupils, "Rondo Cantabile," by Augusta M. Draper, will be found most useful (Lamborn Cock).—There is more muscle and originality in a song by the above-named composer than in her classical pianoforte pieces, "The Song of the Southern Wind," the words of which are by Elizabeth H. Whitemen, is a really good composition (Messrs. R. Cocks and Co.).

Iced Water is in future to be supplied gratis to all passengers on the Midland Railway.

Sir Richard Wallace has been elected a Corresponding Member of the Paris Academie des Beaux-Arts.

The little Nautilus, which lately left Boston for Havre, with a crew of two men, has been spoken by an Italian vessel. The Nautilus was twenty-eight days out from Boston, and the crew refused to leave her.

Dr. Schliemann's Excavations in the Troad will shortly be resumed, and the doctor is now at Constantinople waiting for a guard of fifty soldiers to protect him against robbers during his researches.

The Bark Harvest in Perthshire is just over. Since the beginning of May some thousands of persons have been peeling the bark off the oak and larch trees in the Perth forests, and some of the largest trees have yielded more than a ton apiece.

Forty-eight Transatlantic Medical Students, all belonging to the weaker sex, are making a tour in Europe under the charge of a Washington University Professor. The ladies, who are now at Milan, vary in age from sixteen to thirty-five, and, according to the Italie, are chiefly noted for their green spectacles.

The "Wilhelmsspende," or national penny subscription, now being raised in Germany to commemorate Emperor William's preservation from assassination, will probably be devoted to the erection of a school for children of all creeds on the site of some old buildings adjoining Unter den Linden, where the attempt on the Emperor's life was made.

The Usual Summer Raid against Dogs has begun in New York, and non-muzzled dogs are now despatched wholesale. The authorities, however, have a very merciful method of execution—they give the doomed animals a capital breakfast, then place them in an iron-barred cage on wheels, some hundred and fifty at a time, and lower the cage into the river.

The Berlin Congress continues to afford plentiful material for the foreign papers. Thus the German Kladderadatsch depicts a tottering wall, inscribed "Peace," propped up by the backs of three bricklayers—Lord Beaconsfield, Prince Gortschakoff, and Count Andrassy. "How long will that wall last?" sneers a passer-by. "As long as we can support it," answer the three bricklayers.

Lord Beaconsfield.——"One who was his Schoolfellow" writes to say that it seems unlikely Lord Beaconsfield should have been educated by two Dissenting ministers, as he certainly was at Mr. Potticary's School, Elliott Place, Blackheath, in the years 1814-15, being then ten or eleven years old. Another correspondent informs us that "Popanilla" was reprinted in 1871, in the collected edition of the author's works published by Longmans.

A Smokers' Strike is threatened by the Milanese, the quality of the Government tobacco having seriously deteriorated of late, and the Milanese citizens have drawn up a resolution declaring that, after August 1, they will smoke no more Government cigars until better tobacco is supplied. The Government will thus lose a considerable source of revenue, as the Milanese are following a plan tried successfully during the Austrian occupation of Lombardy, when they refrained entirely from smoking, and so disappointed the Austrians of part of their expected receipts.

A Paradise of Gluttons is a heaven believed in by a Slavonic tribe of Moravia, the Hanaques. In the regions of future bliss they picture an immense mountain of crumbled gingerbread, surrounded at the base by a river of melted lard. The happy Hanaques will recline full-length on the shore, lying on their faces, with the chin supported on the hands, and into their wide open mouths will fall balls of flour, which have been cooked by angels in the crater of the mountain, and have been rolled down the slope into the river, so as to obtain a luscious coating of gingerbread and lard. Meanwhile angels will chant the national airs, and there will be a perpetual downpour of beer and brandy which will not wet the Hanaques, but will only fall into their mouths when they are thirsty.

The Swedish Arctic Expedition, under Professor Nordenskiold, which will attempt to reach Behring's Straits by coasting along Siberia, has been detained at Tromsö by violent gales, and whalers have reported that the state of the ice in the Kara Sea is most unfavourable this season. This Expedition will traverse part of the route to be taken by Mr. Bennett's Jeannette, and according to Dr. Petermann, the Gotha geographer, the Swedes and the Americans may possibly meet in the Arctic Seas. Dr. Petermann continues to believe in the eventual attainment of the North Pole, and in a recent interview with a correspondent of the New York Herald, he declared that the Pole would be found as certainly as the Congo, and that "now the Congo and the Nile sources are settled, this remains the one thing to be done."

London Mortality increased last week, and 1,792 deaths were registered against 1,787 during the previous seven days, an increase of 6, being 39 above the average, and at the rate of 26·1 per 1,000. Deaths from diarrhœa numbered 457 (an increase of 108), of which 336 were infants under one year of age. There were 11 deaths from small-pox (a decline of 8), 21 from measles (an increase of 8), 6 from sunstroke, 27 from scarlet fever (an increase of 6), 7 from diphtheria, and 21 from different forms of fever (an increase of 2). There were 2,414 births registered (an increase of 50, exceeding the average by 54). The mean temperature of the air was 65·2 deg., or 3·0 deg. above the average in the corresponding week of the sixty years 1814-73. The duration of registered sunshine in the week was only 37·6 hours, although the sun was above the horizon during 110·2 hours.

Matchmaking on a Dangerous Scale has been tried by a lady and gentleman at a fashionable country resort in the Bombay Presidency, and a practical joke has become a serious legal difficulty. While out for a stroll this joking pair sauntered into a church which was being cleaned, and finding the marriage register on a table, the gentleman, for fun, inserted the names of four people well known in their social circle. By the evening every one was talking of these secret marriages, and the ladies whose names had been used were in despair, while the gentlemen rushed off in search of the offender, who had disappeared. The Superintendent was in vain asked to erase the names from the register, the clerical authorities in Bombay were equally unable to remove the insertion, and as any one tampering with a register is liable to seven years' penal servitude, the Governor was at length appealed to, and for five days Sir Richard Temple was making up his mind to draw out a Government resolution on the matter, no decision having been reached when the mail left.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The Austrian troops have crossed the Save in two places without opposition, and are now gradually taking possession of the Bosnian provinces. Their march forward was preceded on Saturday by a proclamation to the inhabitants from the Emperor of Austria in which he announced that, in compliance with the decision of the Berlin Congress, his troops were about to cross the frontier of Bosnia and Herzegovina—"not as enemies to seize your territory by force," but as friends to put a stop to the evils which have prevalled for years—"They do not carry war to you, they bring you peace." The proclamation promises that there will be no arbitrary interference with the laws and institutions of the inhabitants, that their habits and customs will be respected, that the arrears of taxes will not be collected, that the troops will pay for everything in cash, and that the revenue of the country will be exclusively employed for the wants of the country itself. All religious and civil authorities are, therefore, exhorted to maintain order and to second the Government. Accordingly, at six o'clock on Monday morning, the vanguard of the Austrian army of occupation, under the command of General Philippovitch, crossed the Save at Brod, where they were received at the frontier watch-house, by the Turkish troops who at once gave up their arms. Their officer, however, presented a protest to General Philippovitch, which, however, was refused, and the Turks were ordered to lower their colours. This not being done the Austrians themselves hauled down the flag, and hoisted the Austrian standard amid loud cheers and the strains of the Austrian hymn. At first the Mahomedan inhabitants of the district were terribly alarmed at the entry of the Austrians, and a perfect stampede took place into the interior, but, upon the repeated assurances of the officers that neither their lives nor their property would be touched, they regained confidence and came back to their houses. Both officers and men have received the most stringent orders to treat the inhabitants well, and to pay for everything they take and to make no requisitions. On the same day another crossing took place at Gradischka in the presence of the Archduke John Salvator—the Turkish troops presenting arms to the friendly invaders, and unprotestingly vacating the fortress. The two detachments will now march upon Serajevo (Bosnia Serai), the Bosnian capital, where they will effect a junction about the 12th or 15th inst. This town will form the headquarters of the force there, and by the latest accounts the Austrians will be most welcome there, as a band of Bashi-Bazouks, headed by a notorious chieftain, Hadji Lola, are setting the authorities at defiance, the town being in a complete state of anarchy, and are seriously threatening the lives of the foreign and Christian populations.

There is very little further news from the East, the Turks are gradually vacating the Bulgarian strongholds, and Shumla is now completely in the hands of the Russians, who, on their side, are making preparations in earnest for their return home, and who have repeated the assurance that they will retire from the neighbourhood of Constantinople as soon as Varna is in their hands. All is perfectly calm and peaceful in the Turkish capital, and Osman Pasha, now that there is no fear of hostilities, has abandoned the defensive works which he was constructing round the city. The negotiations with GREECE continue, but apparently do not make much progress, as the Turks are unwilling to grant all that Congress asked, while the Greeks decline to take less. At present Janina, which contains a large Mahomedan population, is the great sticking point, but it is said that the Porte intends issuing a memorandum on the subject, the Turkish Plenipotentiaries having signed the Protocols relating to the Greek question "with reservations." The most terrible accounts of atrocities committed by the Bulgarians and Christians on the Mahomedans in BULGARIA continue to come to hand, the houses being unmercifully plundered, the men being flogged on the slightest pretext, while the women are maltreated and carried off to the Russian officers' quarters. Neither are Jews or Protestants safe from these outrages, as the recent despatch of Sir H. Layard bears ample witness.—The outrage upon the British man-of-war boat in the Dardanelles has been courteously explained and apologised for by General Todleben.

CYPRUS is being rapidly occupied by British troops and officials, Sir Garnet Wolseley is actively prosecuting his work of organisation, and the island has been divided into six districts—Nicosia, Famagosta, Larnaca, Baffa, and Kirema, to each of which an English staff has been appointed with Turkish interpreters. Officials have also been instructed to prepare reports on every conceivable subject. The disembarkation of troops has been achieved without accident, but the British troops are suffering from the heat, the ordinary bell tents being found insufficient protection. They are, however, being sent into the interior of the island, and to Nicosia in particular, where Sir Garnet Wolseley has now established his headquarters. The Indian troops are to garrison the seaport towns—Limasol, Larnaca, and Famagosta. The Sappers have already been busy at work mending the roads, securing supplies of water, and surveying a line for a railway between Nicosia and Famagosta, and the correspondent of the Daily News telegraphs that "everybody is working hard, the Duke of Edinburgh setting an example in this respect to all his brother officers and men."

FRANCE.——The Republicans have had a little oratorical outburst on the occasion of the unveiling of a statue of the well-known pamphleteer, Courier, at St. Veretz. A number of Senators and Deputies attended the ceremony, and MM. Louis Renault, Jules Simon, and E. About enlarged on the witty and pungent warfare which Courier carried on with the tyrannical and bigoted clerical Court of Louis XVIII., and warned their hearers that the Restoration—as the events of the 16th of May showed—is not yet dead. This is the sole political event of any interest of the week, and even foreign politics are attracting very little attention across the Channel, except, perhaps, the somewhat undignified warfare of words in which our own party leaders have been indulging of late, and which causes the Débats to remark with some truth that "when the English do abandon themselves to the intemperance of their bad humour, they far surpass the French in vituperative power." While our statesmen are quarrelling over the result of the Berlin Assembly the French Government are bestowing marks of honour on the German officials of the Congress, and Prince Hohenlohe, Herr von Bulow, and several others have received the Legion of Honour. To turn to social matters, the strike movement is drawing to a close, the miners are resuming work, and although the men of several other trades still hold out, a general calm prevails even in the affected districts.

A noteworthy trial for murder has been the great event of the week in Paris, the criminals being two law students of good family, but of dissipated habits, who were accused of murdering a milkwoman, for the sake of a large sum of money which she was known to keep in the house. They then cut the body up and left a portion in a parcel in a room which they hired, and where it was discovered through its smell by the landlady. The murderers have been found guilty—wonderful to relate—without extenuating circumstances, and have been sentenced to death. There is little Exhibition gossip beyond that a national lottery subscription of 40,000*l.* is being raised to enable people of limited means to see the Exhibition, and the proceedings of inevitable congresses, one being an assembly of Women's Rights, in the Freemasons' Hall, where various Transatlantic feminine orators voluminously held forth. A tribute has been paid to woman's superiority in the selection of twelve women out of a jury of twenty-four, to report upon the mustard exhibits, as it was considered that the men's habit of smoking would have somewhat impaired their taste. The Anti-tobacconist Society should take note of this official acknowledgment of one at least of the deleterious effects of nicotine. There are to be double the number of gold medals which were originally announced, but each medal will only weigh half as much as at first settled—the total of these awards will be 2,500, while the Prix d'Honneur will number 150. The captive balloon in the Place de Carrousel is now in full work. The height ascended is above 500 yards, the fare is twenty francs. The admission to the enclosure to see the balloon costs a franc. One warning to Parisian visitors—there are a great number of false ten-franc pieces about, which have been circulated by a gang of forgers who have just been captured. Owing, also, to the number of forged bank notes, the Bank has decided to issue a new form of note which will be more difficult to counterfeit.

GERMANY.——The general election took place on Tuesday, though with what definitive result it is difficult to say. There appear to have been no disturbances, and the Socialist leaders have been exerting their utmost to keep their followers perfectly quiet. Socialist sympathisers, however, appear to be more numerous than ever, and in Berlin alone 56,000 Socialist votes were recorded—an increase of 25,000 since last year (in 1867 the number recorded was only sixty-nine !). Notwithstanding this increase, the Socialist members have been defeated, owing to the energy displayed by the other parties, the votes recorded being from 80 to 90 per cent. of those registered, the usual average being only from 50 to 60 per cent. At the time we are writing the Liberals are certainly the most successful of all the parties; and, although Dr. Falk has been defeated at Berlin, the successful candidate is also a Liberal, the Minister's failure being owing to his countenance of the Anti-Socialist Bill in its rejected shape rather than in the amended form in which, by a compromise with the Government, it is probable that it will be accepted by the House. The utmost concern has been expressed by the greater portion of the Liberal Party at Prince Bismarck's very decided attitude of hostility towards them, all the more so as they have always been strongly in favour of the repression of Socialism, although they rejected the recent Bill as likely to lead to the arbitrary prosecution of other Ministerial opponents than the Socialists. The Conservatives, of course, are in high glee over the return to their fold of the man of iron; but, notwithstanding all their aid, it is difficult to see how Prince Bismarck will muster a tangible majority, and obtain the extension of the Ministerial control of the army, and the needed vote of 15,000,000*l.* per annum, unless, in some way or other, he conciliates the Liberals—or the Ultramontanes.

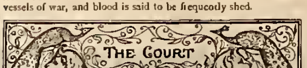
The Emperor has left Babelsberg for Toeplitz. On Sunday he was well enough to receive various Ministers; but he still needs great quiet. He hopes, however, to be back for the marriage of Prince Henry of the Netherlands and the Princess Mary of Prussia on the 24th inst. While he was at Babelsberg a circular from the Lord Chamberlain announced that any one entering the Park, except by the gates, "must expect to be shot at by the sentinels." The Emperor, through the Crown Prince, has written to Queen Victoria, warmly thanking the British authorities and people for the sympathy evinced towards Germany on the occasion of the loss of the Grosser Kurfürst, as well as for the assistance rendered to the sufferers.

ITALY.——The "Unredeemed Italy" agitation is rapidly cooling down, owing to the general reprobation with which the proceedings of the Italia Irredenta party have been received throughout Europe, and the Italians are now beginning to think that their recently adopted attitude is somewhat undignified. General Garibaldi, however, is as irrepressible as ever, and in a letter, declaring that Italy "has manifested herself magnificently in favour of our enslaved brethren," recommends "rifle practice in all the Italian provinces, inasmuch as after words it will be necessary to come to deeds."—The King and Queen have paid a State visit to Milan, where they have been enthusiastically received.—Cardinal Franchi is dangerously ill, and on Wednesday received the last Sacraments.

INDIA.—A plague of locusts is desolating Madras, and considerable anxiety is felt by the Government in consequence of the destruction caused by these insects, and extra famine officers have been requested from the Indian Government. Great distress is also being felt in Cashmere, caused by the want of grain owing to the failure of past harvests. Thousands of caterpillars have now appeared there, and are feasting off the green corn, so that the present crop may possibly be far below the average. The weather this summer has been more oppressive than has been known for years, and the number of deaths among the Europeans from heat apoplexy is quite unprecedented.—Mandalay, the King of Burmah's capital, was on fire when the mail left, 2,000 houses having been burnt down.

UNITED STATES.——There has been another encounter with the hostile Indians in Oregon, Colonel Forsyth's cavalry, with a force of friendly Umatillas, having come upon a camp near Birch Creek, where they captured twenty women and children, and killed seventeen warriors.—Yellow fever is prevalent in New Orleans, where, on Wednesday, there were thirty-one new cases and five deaths.—According to a report on the Chinese question by Colonel Bee, the attorney for the Chinese six immigration companies, the emigration and death-rate of Chinese have exceeded the immigration into California by five hundred, and the entire number of Chinese residents on the Pacific Coast does not exceed 65,000.

MISCELLANEOUS.——Yesterday (Friday) had been appointed a day of thanksgiving in SOUTH AFRICA for the conclusion of the Kaffir war. According to the news from the Cape up to the 9th ult. there had been an engagement on June 14 on the Magnet Hills, with Secoceni's men. The enemy was driven out of his entrenchments; but the British troops, exposed to a galling fire, were compelled to retreat with the loss of six men.—In CANADA the appointment of the Marquis of Lorne as the Governor-General has been most loyally welcomed.—From AUSTRALIA we hear that a numerously attended meeting has been held at Sydney to express the approval of the policy of the British Government at the Congress. Great enthusiasm is said to have been displayed at the meeting.—JAPAN has received the three ironclads which have been sent over from England, and is busy reforming her Press laws. The imprisonment of journalists is now abolished, and punishment by fine is substituted. Serious affrays are reported from Yokohama between the sailors of Russian and British vessels of war, and blood is said to be frequently shed.

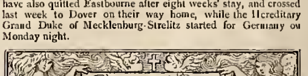


THE COURT

THE Queen and Princess Beatrice remain in the Isle of Wight. Last week Her Majesty drove through Cowes and Newport, and on Saturday visited Ryde. Lord Sandon, the Dean of Westminster, and Miss Victoria Baillie arrived on a visit, and in the evening dined with the Queen, Sir T. M. and Lady Biddulph also joining the party. Next day, Divine Service was performed at Osborne before Her Majesty and the Princess, Dean Stanley officiating. The Queen held a private investiture of the Orders of the Garter and of the Bath on Tuesday, when Her Majesty invested the Marquis of Salisbury with the Garter, bestowed the Riband and Badge of the First Class of the Bath on Sir J. L. Simmons, and invested Lieut.-Gen. Sir A. Kemball and Lord Tenterden with the Second Class of the Order of the Bath. Subsequently the Queen knighted Mr. E. Hertslet, Librarian at the Foreign Office, and gave audiences to the British Ambassador at Rome, Sir A. Paget, and the British Ministers in Liberia, Persia and Guatemala, Messrs. Blyden, W. Taylour Thomson, and Locock. Princes Albert-Victor and George, and the Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, of Wales, are now staying with the Queen at Osborne.—The Queen has appointed Lady Southampton, Lady of the Bedchamber in Ordinary, in the place of the Countess of Caledon, who, on resigning has been named an Extra Lady of the Bedchamber. The Queen will inspect the Special Service Squadron, under the command of Vice-Admiral Sir Astley Cooper Key, on the 13th inst., at Portsmouth.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have been spending this week with the Duke and Duchess of Richmond and Gordon for the Goodwood meeting. On returning to town from Dartmouth last week the Prince and Princess went to Strawberry Hill, to be present at the dinner and the masked ball given by Frances Countess Waldegrave, and also attended the Sandown Park Races. The Grand Duke of Hesse and the Duke of Connaught visited the Prince and Princess at Marlborough House on Saturday, and the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Connaught went in the afternoon to the marriage of Captain Arthur Paget and Miss Mary Stevens at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, being afterwards present at the breakfast. In the evening the Prince and Princess of Wales, with their two boys and the Duke of Connaught, went to the Opera Comique. On Monday the Prince and Princess entertained Prince and Princess Christian and the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz to lunch, and inspected Mr. M'Lachland's picture of the Royal Family at Messrs. Agnew's Gallery, while the Prince presided at a meeting of Her Majesty's Commissioners for the 1851 Exhibition. Later in the day the Prince and Princess, with the Duke and Duchess of Teck, left London for Chichester, where they were met by the Duke of Richmond and Gordon and driven to Goodwood Park. They were present at the races on Tuesday, when the Princess wore a dress of light corn colour trimmed with deep red, the Duchess of Teck being in olive-green. The Royal party were at the races on the succeeding days, and would leave Goodwood yesterday (Friday).

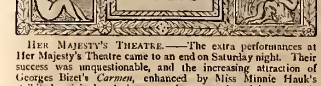
The Duke of Connaught was present on Tuesday at the award of commissions to the gentlemen cadets of the Woolwich Academy.—Prince Leopold's knee is better and he will shortly join the Queen in the Isle of Wight. He has, however, been obliged to give up his visit to Southampton fixed for to-day (Saturday).—The Grand Duke of Hesse left England on Sunday night, his wife and children remaining at Eastbourne. The children of the Imperial Prince and Princess of Germany, Princesses Victoria, Sophie and Margaret, and Prince Waldemar, have also quitted Eastbourne after eight weeks' stay, and crossed last week to Dover on their way home, while the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz started for Germany on Monday night.



CHURCH NEWS

THE PAN-ANGLICAN SYNOD.——The last meeting of the assembled Bishops was held at Lambeth Palace on Friday last, and on Saturday the Conference was brought to an end with a full choral service in St. Paul's Cathedral, which was attended by a very large congregation. The procession included the choristers, vergers, cathedral clergy, and about ninety bishops, home, American, and colonial, with the Archbishop of Canterbury to bring up the rear. The Communion Service was read by the Primate, assisted by the Bishops of Winchester and London, and the preacher was Dr. Stevens, Bishop of Pennsylvania, who said that the Synod which had just closed was the largest and most important that had ever been held. Its deliberations would reach the very ends of the earth, and its full results would never be known until the great judgment day. The little differences on non-essentials, which existed amongst the heads of the Church, were as nothing compared to the unity among them on essentials, and the meeting had without doubt brought about a great renewal of spiritual life throughout the Church. The reports of all the Bishops of the work in their respective dioceses, both at home and abroad, were most encouraging. It was true that in some places excesses of ritual and a spirit of insubordination were complained of, and the spirit of infidelity was also far too prevalent; but all these things were best met by the preaching of the plain simple truth, and by example. After the sermon the Holy Sacrament was administered, first to the prelates and clergy, and afterwards to the laity. The Standard of Monday contained a long introduction to the Reports of the Conference, and an announcement that the Reports themselves would be published during the week. With regard to the vexed questions of Ritual and Confession the Committees are of opinion that "no alteration from long-accustomed ritual should be made contrary to the admonition of the Bishop of the diocese;" and "that no minister of the Church is authorised to require from those who may resort to him to open their grief a particular or detailed enumeration of all their sins; or to require private confession previous to receiving the Holy Communion; or to enjoin or even encourage the practice of habitual confession to a priest; or to teach that such practice of habitual confession, or the being subject to what has been termed the direction of a priest, is a condition of attaining to the highest spiritual life. At the same time the Committee are not to be understood as desiring to limit in any way the provision made in the Book of Common Prayer for the relief of troubled consciences."—The Nonconformist considers that the most striking aspect of the Conference is its strangely composite character, as well as the unique position occupied by the English prelates. "There were the American Bishops—the representatives of a Church once established, but long since free from State restraints—and which exercises episcopal supervision over every inch of American territory, and has a far larger number of Bishops in proportion to the population than are to be found in this country; Bishops from Canada, where the reorganisation of the Church, no longer State-endowed, has been more recent and more difficult, and yet equally successful; Australian Bishops, who have passed through a corresponding experience, and who do not hesitate to extol Voluntaryism in the hearing of their brother Bishops as a sufficient and beneficent agency. There were also Scotch Bishops—the representatives of a Church which in Scotland occupies the position of a Dissenting sect; Bishops of the disestablished Irish Church; and Bishops from India and Ceylon, where they are maintained out of taxes levied on heathen populations, and where their position is a source of embarrassment to both the local Governments and the Church at home. And, lastly, there were the Archbishops and Bishops of the Church of England in England—all appointed by the Crown, all maintained out of national property, all having seats, actual or prospective, in one of the Houses of Parliament—all bound to act in accordance with laws passed, not by the Church, but by a secular Legislature."

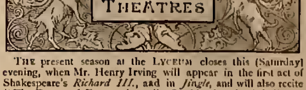
VARIOUS.——On Monday, at Leamington, a Missionary Conference was opened, under the presidency of the Bishop of Worcester. Amongst the speakers were several of the American Bishops now in this country.—The Curates' Augmentation Fund has just received 1,000*l*. from an anonymous donor.—A sad incident occurred on Thursday last week at the Wesleyan Conference meeting at Bradford. The Rev. P. C. Horton, who had just been speaking of his old friend, the late Rev. H. H. Cheetle, fell in a swoon upon the platform, and, after partially recovering for a short time, died in a few hours of heart disease. On Saturday the Conference Love Feast was held in Eastbrook Chapel, and was attended by about two thousand people, hundreds of others being turned away from the doors for lack of room. On Monday a fraternal letter from the Methodist Episcopal Church was read, and also the report of the examinations of probationers, which was considered to be highly satisfactory. Sixty young ministers were formally received into full connection. On the suggestion of Dr. Haydon, of the United States, a Committee has been appointed to consider the advisability of convening an Œcumenical Council of representatives of all the Methodist bodies throughout the world.—On Wednesday the Annual Conference of the Methodist Free Church was opened at Manchester; the Rev. W. Boyden, of Burnley, being chosen President for the year.—Mr. Spurgeon's congregation are about to present him with a testimonial, to commemorate the completion of the twenty-fifth year of his ministry. It is proposed to collect 5,000*l*. for the purpose, and Mr. Spurgeon intends to devote the money to Church purposes, especially to the providing a permanent maintenance for the aged inmates of the almshouses in connection with the Metropolitan Tabernacle.



MUSIC

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.——The extra performances at Her Majesty's Theatre came to an end on Saturday night. Their success was unquestionable, and the increasing attraction of Georges Bizet's Carmen, enhanced by Miss Minnie Hauk's strikingly original and picturesque impersonation of the wayward, fascinating gipsy-heroine was such that they might with advantage have been prolonged for another fortnight at least. Enough, however, has been written for the present about this very remarkable work; and, indeed, there is little more to say about the opera season just concluded, except that, while artistically to be commended, it has not been over remunerative in a pecuniary sense. There have again been nothing but repetitions—Faust, the Sonnambula, Le Nozze di Figaro, Carmen (twice), and Lucia di Lammermoor constituting the programme of the week. In the Nozze Madame Pappenheim took the part of the Countess (vice Madame Caroline Salla), and showed herself as great a proficient in the music of Mozart as in that of Beethoven and Meyerbeer. The last representation of Carmen was for the "benefit" of Miss Minnie Hauk, who was more than ever applauded by a crowded and enthusiastic audience (including the Prince and Princess of Wales). The last performance of the season was for the "benefit" of Madame Etelka Gerster, who to Lucia added an act from Dinorah, including the "Shadow Song," which, after such a fatiguing opera as that of Donizetti, proved somewhat too exacting for her powers. She was, nevertheless, called upon to repeat the final quick movement, and retired amid as much cheering as if she had done her very best—as was certainly the case in Lucia, which she has never sung better. Every incident of the past season having been duly recorded and commented upon, recapitulation would be occupying space to no purpose; we may, therefore, conclude by saying that the autumn season will commence late in October, and that Mdlle. Trebelli (if report may be believed) is to play the part of Carmen in English. This is a curious way of lessening the attraction of what would surely have been the crowning feature of the regular performances, in Italian, next year. We can hardly believe it. Whether Sir Michael Costa is to direct the orchestra on these exceptional occasions is not stated. As the eminent conductor usually takes his holiday in the autumn, it seems unlikely. Nevertheless, there is always Mr. Weist Hill—"our English Costa," as he has been justly called—at hand.

WAIFS.——The marriage between Mdlle. Emma Albani and Mr. Ernest Gye, eldest son of Mr. Frederick Gye, director of the Royal Italian Opera, is to be solemnised to-day at the Warwick Street Chapel.—The orchestra of the Opera House in Berlin and the Stadtheater at Cologne are being lowered, after the plan invented by Richard Wagner for the performances of the Ring des Nibelungen at Bayreuth. We sympathise with the players.—Italian opera is to be revived in the autumn season at Bucharest. Thus will the Roumanians console themselves for the loss of Bessarabia.—Verdi has had a cordial reception from the King and Queen of Italy, at Turin.—A musical festival is to be held at Bruges on the 19th and 20th inst. The King and Queen of the Belgians intend to honour it with their patronage and presence.—The death of Madame Musard, widow of the once renowned French composer of dance music, is announced, at the age of 83.—The "Waux Hall" concerts at Naples have been unsuccessful. Thirteen theatres have temporarily closed their doors owing to the intense heat.—At the obsequies of Queen Mercedes, Signor Tamberlik, the tenor whom Spain has most delighted to honour, was one of the singers, creating a deep impression in a sacred air by Stradella.—At Florence, a new circus has been opened, with the significant title, "La Delizia."—M. Victor Massé, composer of Paul et Virginie, being seriously indisposed, has given up the post of chorus-master at the Paris Grand Opera, and retires on a pension.—A body of vocalists (students) from Upsala, Christiana, and other Swedish towns, has been well received at the Trocadéro. For part singing, however, Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir has carried off the honours in the face of all competitors. So much for the musical fame of "Old England."—The renowned French organ builder, M. Cavaillé-Coll, has been commissioned by the Minister of Fine Arts, in association with M. Dupanloup, to remodel and rebuild the great organ in the cathedral at Orleans.—Our excellent composer, Mr. Henry Gadsby, is writing a new cantata expressly for Mr. Kuhe's next Brighton Festival, the subject of which is Scott's Lord of the Isles.—There is to be an Eisteddfod on an unusually grand scale this week at Bangor (Menai Bridge), under the direction of Mr. John Thomas, chief of the Welsh minstrels ("Pencerdd Gwalia"). There will be "Saxon" music, once so distasteful to our Welsh brethren, whom Mr. Thomas and Mr. Brinley Richards have so long been trying to "educate," Judas Maccabæus and The Creation being among the leading features of the programme.—The adjudicated prizes to successful competitors, both at the Royal Academy of Music (Principal, Dr. G. A. Macfarren, Cambridge Professor) and the London Academy of Music (Principal, Dr. Henry Wylde, Gresham Professor), were kindly administered by Mdlle. Albani on Saturday. The eminent artist, it need scarcely be added, received a hearty greeting on each occasion.—Mr. J. T. Carrodus, our representative violinist, contemplates a professional tour in Germany. That he will obtain cordial recognition among our Teutonic musical brethren, there can be no question. Such highly finished playing as his must find sympathy wherever genuine art is understood and appreciated. Mr. Carrodus, moreover, will entertain the Germans once again with a concerto, or concertos, by their own Molique, of whose admirable compositions (so difficult to execute) too little has recently been heard in the land of his birth.—Miss Minnie Hauk has gone to Lucerne, in Switzerland, and will spend her holiday at the hotel on the summit of the Righi. She returns in September for her English tour; after which she goes to America, as one of Mr. Mapleson's operatic company.—The towns which will be visited by Madame Christine Nilsson in her English concert-tour (beginning at the end of September) are Liverpool, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Newcastle, Manchester, Nottingham, Birmingham, Leeds, and Bradford. The tour is to extend from September 27 to October 22.—Mr. Mapleson has taken the New York Academy of Music for three years (not seven, as has been stated).—The Promenade Concerts, at Covent Garden Theatre, under the presidence of the enterprising Messrs. Gatti, with Dr. Arthur Sullivan as conductor, begin this evening.



THEATRES

THE present season at the LYCEUM closes this (Saturday) evening, when Mr. Henry Irving will appear in the first act of Shakespeare's Richard III., and in Jingle, and will also recite "The Dream of Eugene Aram." On Monday (Bank holiday), Miss Bateman (Mrs. Crowe) will reappear in the favourite play of Mary Warner.

At the OPERA COMIQUE Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's "nautical comic opera," H.M.S. Pinafore, continues to be deservedly popular, Mr. G. Grossmith, jun., being eminently amusing as the pompous and highly-official First Lord of the Admiralty, while Miss Emma Howson is as charming as ever as Josephine, the "gallant Captain's daughter."

THE CANTERBURY.——The spectacle of Plevna reaches its 200th night of representation this week, and is to be withdrawn to-night (Saturday) to make way for a fairy version of "Lurline," entitled The Night Dancers, in which Miss Nelly Power will make her re-appearance, and Mdlle. Bartoletti from Her Majesty's Opera.

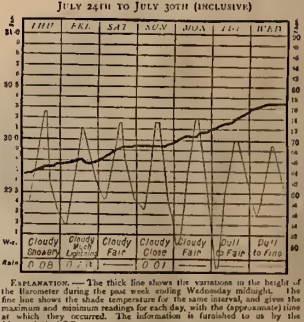
JULY 24TH TO JULY 30TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The weather during the week just ended has been generally cloudy and cool. The thermometer has not risen much above 70° on any day, the highest point reached being 75° on Thursday, the 24th instant. The nights have been rather mild; but early on Tuesday morning, the 29th instant, the thermometer fell as low as 46°. A thunderstorm, with very vivid lightning, occurred on Friday evening, the 25th instant, and a little rain fell also on Thursday and Sunday, the 24th and 27th; but, with these exceptions, the weather has been dry. The sky has been extremely cloudy every day; but the dull weather appears to have been confined to the south-east of England, clear skies being reported almost every day from our western and south-western stations. The barometer was highest (30·36 inches) on Wednesday, the 30th instant; lowest (29·68 inches) on Thursday, the 24th instant; range, 0·68 inches. Temperature was highest (75°) on Thursday, the 24th instant; lowest (46°) on Tuesday morning, the 29th instant; range, 29°. Rain fell on three days; total amount, 0·39 inches; greatest fall on any one day, 0·30 inches, on Friday, the 25th instant.

CAPILLUS VENERIS

A SINGLE strand of golden hair,
  How comes it here upon my shoulder?
Blown from the head of lady fair—
  Where did I meet or last behold her?
I'm certain that she must be young.
  And pretty? Perhaps. But then I wonder
What pain it was her heart that wrung
  And made her tear her locks asunder!

"Only a woman's hair," wrote Swift,
  Four words so tender and so bitter,
In each light breath to sway and drift,
  And in each passing ray to glitter.
Slight tendrils of most sacred vines—
  O think upon it ye who bind them,
These little threads, these slender lines,
  Will drag the whole wide world behind them.

It isn't yours, O lady mine,
  Down from the wall serenely gazing,
While in my heart "that look of thine"
  The ghost of buried hope is raising.
There may be one would prize this hair
  As I the look from those soft lashes;
There may be one. I can't tell where,
  And so—I'll throw it in the ashes.

LEGAL

THE MURDER AT FARNHAM.——The man, Obed Usher, who killed his little daughter, aged twelve, by striking her on the head with a hammer because she refused to fetch him more beer, has been sentenced to death. The case, peculiarly painful in itself, is rendered doubly interesting on account of the defence set up, which was that of insanity. It was shown that Usher, who was an old soldier, and had served both in the Crimea and India, had, since 1871, been subject to various hallucinations, and had made two attempts upon his own life. In 1874, having apparently recovered his senses, he was discharged with a pension, and since then he appears to have led a quiet, respectable life, working at a limekiln, and exhibiting great affection for his motherless children. Immediately after committing the murder, he went and gave himself up to the police, saying that it was done "in a passion," that he was very sorry, and adding, "God bless her soul! Hang me at once." Mr. Justice Mellor explained the legal meaning of insanity—viz., that it could only be admitted in the case of a person who, at the moment of committing a crime, was incapable of judging whether the action was right or wrong, and perfectly indifferent as to its consequences. The jury could not think that Usher was in such a mental condition as this; but they appended to their verdict of "guilty" a recommendation to mercy, which we should not be sorry to see acted upon by the Home Secretary.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——The Middlesex magistrates have elected Captain Morley as their chairman, in the room of the Marquis of Salisbury, who recently resigned. Lord Carnarvon, who had been invited to become a candidate, declined to allow himself to be put in nomination as soon as he found that the magistrates were not perfectly unanimous; and Sir J. Heron Maxwell, who was proposed but not seconded, said that he had no ambition or desire to occupy the post.—At the Leeds Assizes, on Saturday, two men were sentenced to fifteen years' and a third to seven years' penal servitude, for conspiring to forge a will relating to property worth about 20,000*l*.—Proceedings have been commenced to set aside the will of Madame De Tourville, who bequeathed all her property to her husband, by whom she was murdered, and who is now undergoing a life sentence in the Austrian mines.—At Stanningley, near Bradford, a publican, who is also a money-lender and bill-broker, was last week robbed of 17,000*l*. in notes, bills, and cash, which were taken from his bedroom, the door of which had been forced open with a "jemmy."—Mr. Irving has withdrawn from the prosecution of the man who attempted to get from him a loan of 10*l*. by an unauthorised use of Mr. T. Mead's name; but the fellow is still in custody, and will probably be committed for trial for sending a threatening letter to Mr. Charles Sugden with the view of extorting money.—At Worship Street, the other day, a man was charged with having stolen 3*l*. The accused had been entrusted with a cheque for the amount for the purpose of getting change, and he had absconded with the money. He pleaded guilty, but Mr. Bushby, the magistrate, decided that he must be discharged, for he had stolen nobody's goods. He had not stolen the cheque which had been given to him to get change, and he had not stolen the money, for that had never been in the prosecutor's possession, all that could be done was to sue him for the recovery of the money (although we fail to see by whom that can be done if it belongs to nobody). The prisoner is said to have been exceedingly astonished at his escape.—The foregoing decision savours more of the special-pleader than the judge, and is not badly matched by the verdict given on Saturday by a jury at the Liverpool Assizes, in respect to a charge of burglary. The prisoner, a young woman, had been seen running away from the house which had been broken into; her veil and umbrella were found on the ground beneath the window; and she herself, when arrested, was carrying a bag full of housebreaking tools. The defence was that she had taken an overdose of chloral, and was not responsible for her actions, and the jury acquitted her. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn said that he had never heard a more extraordinary verdict in his life, and significantly told the jury that their services would be dispensed with for the remainder of the session. These jurymen may perhaps be sneered at as blundering provincials; but what are we to say to a London jury who accept the plea of a thief, that "he ought to have been stopped sooner," or of the judge and counsel who, apparently agreeing with the verdict of "not guilty," forthwith join in a subscription for the injured innocent, who whines from the dock that he has only 2½*d*. in the world. This is said to have actually happened at the Middlesex Sessions; and it is not surprising that, within a week, the same thief was again in custody on a similar charge, for which Sir J. Ingham sentenced him to two months' hard labour.—Three men have been committed for trial for stealing a yacht from its anchorage off Brighton. They got away with it on Tuesday night, but on Wednesday the owner made chase in a steamer, and overtook it some eighteen miles out. One of the thieves said that had there been more wind they would have been 100 miles away.—A lad who has been for six months employed as call-boy at the Opera Comique, is in custody on a charge of robbing the treasury

"Which do you believe most likely to enter into an insane Convention, a body of English gentlemen honoured by the favour of their Sovereign and the confidence of their fellow-subjects, managing your affairs for five years, I hope with prudence, and not altogether without success; or a sophistical rhetorician, inebriated with the exuberance of his own verbosity, and gifted with an egotistical imagination that can at all times command an interminable and inconsistent series of arguments to malign an opponent and to glorify himself?"

AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE TO THE HOLY LAND

CHRISTIANS, MOHAMMEDANS, AND JEWS

EASTER in Jerusalem is the most stirring time during the year. Pilgrims from all parts of the globe arrive in large numbers to worship at the shrines of the Holy Sepulchre. This year not only have Christians assembled in the Holy City but Muslims from all parts of Turkey and the East have come to glorify their Prophet at the great Mosque of Omar. It is lucky that, the late war leaving Russia in so uneasy a state, very few pilgrims from that country could attend Greek Easter, for it has no doubt saved the Holy City the trying ordeal of witnessing many serious struggles which the meeting of Muscovite and Muslim fanatics would have occasioned. The disturbances between the Greek and Latin Churches, which very often lead to a bloody issue, are scandalous enough, and they are even carried within the precincts of the Holy Church.

A STREET IN JERUSALEM

THE WALL OF WAILING, JERUSALEM

The journey from Constantinople to Syria is one of great interest, for we touch at all the principal ports along the coast, and at many of the islands in the Ægean Sea, allowing the pilgrim sufficient time to look about him. At Smyrna there is time to see the Castle, the Aqueduct, and the wonderful oyster beds which Mark Twain tries to account for in his "Pilgrimage." One can even rush off to Ephesus and spend two hours among tho ruins, see the tomb of the Evangelist Luke, stand where Paul preached, conjure up from the murky pool of water the temple of the Great Diana of the Ephesians, where now only the frogs lift up their voices to the great goddess; the Isle of Rhodes with its scanty palms; the famous Rue Chevalier of St. John, their fine old hospices, and the place where once stood the Colossus.

But all these places of interest seem to be absorbed in the anticipation of the wonders of the Holy Land. Even the cup of Cyprian wine at Cyprus does not open up much conjecture as to whether the ancient imbibers of that liquor suffered from indigestion, or whether for its extreme acidity it might have been the wine that disolved the pearls of Cleopatra.

There was a gentle swell along the shores of Palestine which, though our ship might be anchored in the bays of that coast, still caused her to roll uneasily, and tended to choke all emotion which might have arisen in one's bosom at the first sight of Syria. The pilgrim, therefore, on arriving at Beyrout, hastens on shore, and once on terra firma, and after the first few minutes, becoming reassured that the town itself is not also gently rolling, he will discover that Beyrout is a very charming place. First of all the snow-clad Jebel Sannin and the hills of Lebanon form a cool refreshing background to the glistening white houses lining the slight promontory which stretches along the south side of the bay, studded here and there with palms, gardens, and terraces rich in flowers, orange trees, cactus, and crystal fountains all glistening in the strong sun.

Beyrout is rich in commerce, and is said to be the rival of Smyrna. The great institutions are the schools, English, American, and German. The British Syrian School presided over by Mrs. Mott is one of the finest in the town. The school is quite palatial, and is charmingly situated. There are classes for the blind, little children, training schools for teachers, Mohammedan and Christian. One could say much more about Beyrout, its picturesque drives and charming environs, and the courtesy of its English residents, but a pilgrim has restrictions, and must hasten on his way to the Holy City. Steaming all along the Syrian coast, the morning sun lifts the veil of mist from the hills of Judea, and discovers to the early pilgrim on deck the long-looked-for Holy Land. But the cruel, cruel sea still occupies the attention of many of the voyagers at this auspicious moment. And it is with some indifference to them that Jaffa gradually rises with its steep rock out of the grey shore, and catches the first rosy tints on its housetops as day breaks across the ocean.

In a few moments several boats push off from the shore, and are pulled rapidly towards our ship. As they arrive alongside there is a general rush of pilgrims—Muslims, Christians, and Jews. During the struggle and general confusion we are hustled down the side of the vessel by our dragoman and into a boat, and we push off for the shore. As we arrive some little distance from the beach dark-looking rocks like mighty teeth peep out of the surf; we steer between two of the dangerous-looking break-waters. Our men give an extra spurt. We pass them, and make for the beach. One must pity poor Andromeda, for she must have had a pretty hard time of it on rough days, what with the surf and the sea monster. For it is to one of these Jaffa rocks that tradition chains the undulating figure of the fair daughter of Cepheus and Cassiopeia, the agonies of which unhappy lady so often appear on the walls of our Royal Academy. Here too, Jonah, as my American friend observed, "took a state cabin in the internal economy of the whale." We landed, made straightway for Mr. Hardegg's nice little hotel, took breakfast, and immediately started for Jerusalem.

Threading our way through strings of camels, with beggars and lepers crying for baksheesh, we arrived outside the town, and made towards the hills of Judea, passing through groves of orange and lemon trees and hedges of prickly pear, which made the air fragrant, as a gentle breeze from the sea wafted the scent along the dusky road, and sweetened the atmosphere for miles.

Our dragoman continually pulled up the waggons, and standing up would majestically point out the old traditions of the country as we passed by. So many were the places of interest, and so few that we could attach credit in, that not many were retained in our memory. We passed Ramleh and Bet Nula, where Richard Cœur de Lion pitched his tents after the first day's march to Jerusalem—which, by the bye, for distance, was a good day's march indeed. We saw the valley in which David killed Goliath; on the left Mizpah, and the birthplace of John the Baptist. We now reached a rugged part of the road, so an hour or more of struggling over rocky ground on foot, and a short distance longer in our waggons, brought us to the Holy City, just as the last rays of the sun were dying out of the heavens, lighting up the old walls, domes, and minarets of Jerusalem, as we entered the Jaffa Gate. However much our guide had shaken our belief in many holy places along the route, as we passed under the walls of this wonderful city we could not help remembering that at this time, upwards of eighteen hundred years ago, Jesus of Nazareth suffered martyrdom for the world within sight of its ramparts.

At six the next morning the sound of the clanging of bells awakened us, and we dressed to go to the great Latin Mass, for it was their Easter Sunday, and the Greek Palm Sunday. We make our way to the top of the Holy Sepulchre, and enter a little door just below the dome, find ourselves in a narrow gallery, from where we look over the Chapel of the Holy Sepulchre, and on the scene below. The Sepulchre where the body of the Meek and Lowly was supposed to be laid is gaudy with pictures, artificial flowers, silver and gold lamps, gilt candelabra, and burning tapers. Surging round its walls is a crowd as motley as in the scene of a pantomime—Copts, Abyssinians, Assyrians, Greeks, Latins, and Moslem guards. It is necessary that a strong guard be placed in the building to keep the members of the various Churches from quarrelling with each other instead of worshipping at the Sepulchre. Presently a jingle of bells, a beating of gongs, and strains of an organ ascend with the fatty smoke of a thousand tapers from the jostling crowd below, then from the Latin Chapel a procession of bishops and priests in gorgeous array, with banners of cloth of gold, slowly wend their way through the crowd, chanting and praying in a steam of incense. Before this service is quite finished, the Greeks, Armenians, and Copts begin to hold their respective services, and try each to drown each other's voices as they go through their devotions. During the following week the Greeks have the church to themselves, and they have far the greater gathering of pilgrims at their Easter ceremonies. On Thursday the Patriarch and twelve Bishops enact Christ and His Apostles, the Washing of the Feet at the Last Supper, the Agony in the Garden. A platform is erected in the courtyard of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, decorated with the emblems of the Church. A huge branch from the olive tree in the Garden of Gethsemane, under which Christ prayed, is used in the ceremony, and after the service is over the crowd scramble for its sprays. On Friday the Black Service is held on Mount Cavalry. In the Sepulchre, and also round the Stone of Extreme Unction, but on the following day, is the great event of all, the Coming of the Holy Fire.

All through this eventful Easter week Jerusalem, generally so silent in the sleepy shadow of her narrow streets, has been stirred all a-bustle by thousands of Hajji of all denominations. Even fair American and English pilgrims, who, having done the cities of Western Europe, and steamed up the Nile, and back to Cairo, make their way to the Holy City, and show their pretty faces, on which the sun has cast a healthy russet glow, beside their yashmacked and veiled Oriental sisters who throng the streets in hideous dress, of white or flowering shrouds. Stately Arab, lounging Turk, and blear-eyed Jew, the fume of Russian leather, and the tar of camels thicken the atmosphere. We are glad the many services are over, and that we can now leave the stifling streets for the open country. On the road to Bethlehem, a short distance from Jerusalem, we pass Rachel's Tomb, rather an unimportant-looking building in white plaster, but revered alike by Muslim, Christian, and Jew, for it is here where Rachel died giving birth to Benjamin. By approaching the birthplace of Christ by way of the Pools and Gardens of Solomon we can somewhat understand (which puzzled us before), how the peasant subsists, for the appearance of the country is barren and sterile, but the path to Bethlehem lies through one of the many strips of valleys, full of fruit and corn, which intersect the barren heights round about the City of Zion. Passing along a ridge of rock and by the side of an old aqueduct which leads from the Cisterns of Solomon we suddenly come upon Bethlehem rising out of a valley of dark olives as we wend our way through the trees, and mount the narrow streets, and come upon women washing clothes in the fountains. We are struck with their beauty. Our guide tells us that the women of Bethlehem are noted for their comeliness. It is anything but rare to meet a pretty face in Syria; but Bethlehem may, indeed, carry off the palm for the beauty of its female inhabitants. Many are the swains who come from less favoured towns, and seek the pretty faces in marriage, though it is a general custom for the people of Bethlehem to marry among themselves, which, by-the-by, is settled at rather an early stage of existence. We passed some little children playing on a doorstep. Our guide drew our attention to a girl about seven years old who was assisting a boy to build up a house with pebbles. She wore a locket round her neck which our dragoman took into his hand, and explained to us that it was worn as a sign of her engagement to be married. The little girl evidently understood the situation, for she ran away and hid her face against the wall. The youth of her choice, about nine years old, looked uncertain whether to express his indignation of our treatment of his sweetheart by aiming a stone at us or taking the baksheesh we offered him. I was introduced to a well-to-do young farmer of seventeen autumns, who was already blessed with a wife and family. I believe that his parents and several young ladies thought that when he had passed his sixteenth birthday he was becoming a confirmed old bachelor, but at last Bethlehem beauty smote him down before he had time to invest in a latch-key, or put up for a Bohemian Club. Of course the birthplace of Christ is not visited by the pilgrims for the manner and customs of its present inhabitants, but for the Chapel of the Nativity and the many other Holy places, though the Hajji must not imagine that he is shown the veritable manger, for the only genuine one was discovered by the Empress Helena, and was afterwards packed and forwarded to Rome. This Church of the Nativity is crowded with Scriptural events, and, like unto the Church at Jerusalem, all conveniently near one another. The sight-seer must continually bless the Empress Helena and other searchers for Scriptural truths who have arranged these things so nicely, and for their consideration for the soles of the pilgrims' feet.

Not far from St. Stephen's Gate is the Pool of Hezekiah, or Dragon's Pool, names for which there is no authority. It is a small pond, in the corners of which are openings for the reception of rain-water and remains of stairs. Further on we come to the Tomb of Absalom, hewn out of the solid rock, detached on three sides, the rock not being high enough. The cupola and spire of the monument were made of other material. It is in Ionic style. The Jews are in the habit (when they think of it) of pelting this edifice with stones in memory of Absalom's disobedience to his father, and no doubt also with a vivid recollection of the martyr their forefathers killed, with the same primitive weapons, not far from the spot. A little further, and we come to the tombs of Zacharias and St. James.

The Jews also do their little pilgrimage to their Wailing Place against the walls of Zion. Here, every Friday, men and women, carrying huge and tiny Hebrew prayer books, wail for the Majesty that has departed from their beloved city. The men shake their earlocks, pull their beards, and wring their hands, and the women, young and old, cry themselves into hysterics over the fallen greatness of Zion. A touching scene is presented by the pilgrims leaning against the weather-beaten wall, kissing the stone, and weeping.

At Sechem the Jews preserve the scroll of the Pentateuch, said to have been written by Eleazer, son of Aaron, 3,200 years old. The document is considered to be of doubtful authenticity.

On going up to the Mount of Olives we cross the Valley of the Kidron, also called the Valley of Jehoshaphat. There is a tradition, founded on a misinterpretation of Joel iii., 2, that this gorge will be the scene of the Last Judgment. We can go viâ the Garden of Gethsemane or Oil Press. It is an irregular quadrangle, a high plastered wall surrounding the garden. On knocking at the wicket an old Franciscan monk will permit you to enter and view the ground. It is prettily laid out with flowers of the brightest hues. You are told that the olive trees you see in this garden are the same under which Christ prayed and the disciples slept, but when Titus and Hadrian visited the environs of the city they are known to have cut down all the trees. And the Crusaders testify finding the whole region absolutely destitute of wood, and, as I myself know what armies will do for the sake of fire, I begin to have as much faith in the history of those trees pointed out at Gethsemane, as I have in most things exhibited in the Holy Land.

In this neighbourhood is the Chapel of the Tomb of the Virgin. Her parents, and also Joseph, her husband, are supposed to be buried somewhere hereabouts. Here is also the Cavern of the Agony. The sight which impresses one more than any other in or about the City of Zion is the magnificent view from the Mount of Olives. In a quarter-of-an-hour from Gethsemane we may look upon the valley of the Jordan, the cobalt-blue of the Dead Sea stretching away through the grey and ruddy hills on the east—those still and bitter waters lying 3,900 feet below us. Towards the north is seen the upper course of the valley of the Kedron, beyond which rises the Scopus, and on the west lies the once mighty Jerusalem, with its domes of the Holy Sepulchre and Mosque of Omar, its old walls and minarets. Under the dome of this mosque stands the famous rock on which the Jews offered up their sacrifices; and where Abraham was about to slay Isaac; where Muslim tradition makes Mohammed to have ascended to heaven on his miraculous steed El-Burak. The altar on that occasion was about to follow the horse and the prophet, and might now have been in heaven, but for the strong objection the Angel Gabriel showed, and who hurled this peripatetical mass of stone down on the earth, and must have used some force, considering the finger-marks he has left imprinted on the rock.

Pilgrims, when once in the Holy Land, after visiting the birthplace and the place where Christ suffered death, cannot resist taking a longer journey from Jerusalem to the town wherein Christ lived and spent his boyhood's days—Nazareth. The present town is built on the site of the ancient Nazareth, and lies in a basin on the south slope of Jebel-es-Sikh, embosomed in a framework of cactus hedges and fig and olive trees. Within the town we are shown the kitchens of the Virgin, the house and workshop of Joseph, and the synagogue in which Christ is said to have taught. Also the table whereon Christ dined with his disciples. In about ten hours from Nazareth, viâ Mount Tabor, we reach Tiberias and the Sea of Galilee. This city, named after the Roman Emperor, has, like other Syrian cities, seen much bloodshed and destruction, but in 1837 it suffered more than any other town in Syria. During that period of earthquakes more than half of its population was destroyed. It still wears the same dilapidated aspect it was shaken into in those days, and to add to its general dirt and wretchedness the greater part of its present inhabitants are Jews, the larger number being of Polish extraction, who simply live their lives in a state of beggary which is kindly encouraged by their richer brethren in Europe, who forward them money. Many of the now bare peaks of Lebanon were probably once clothed with cedars. Most of the groups now existing stand from 5,000 feet to 6,000 feet above the sea. No care is taken of these noble trees, the goats eat all the young shoots, and cedar branches are used for fuel.

SHE even showed me the precious scrap of paper in which he had first declared his love—I loathe to profane that word in writing of him—but although neither in that, nor in any of his reported utterances to her did the word "marriage" once occur, she never appeared to doubt for an instant that he sought her as his wife. Distantly and cautiously, I ventured to hint a suspicion; but I need not have feared to startle her. Her mind seemed incapable of taking in such an idea. Her only conception of my meaning was that I accused her lover of possible weakness in yielding to the opposition of his family, and so giving her up. And to this she merely replied with a trembling lip and tearful eyes, "I know I am far beneath him in every way, and I would not be an obstacle in his path, or a clog on him—only I do believe that no one else would make him so happy as I, because no one else could love him as I love him."

It was maddening to hear her talk so. And, although I put a strong constraint on myself, being resolved to be gentle and patient with her, I could not help my voice taking a sterner tone as I asked the direct question, "Lucy, does the Princess speak falsely when she says you have had stolen interviews with her son in the gardens of the Villa d'Este?"

"No; she speaks truly—at least, as she thinks, truly. I was going to tell you how it was, Catherine. Vittorio came here without my knowledge. We had had a little quarrel—at least he had been vexed at my coming to Tivoli. When you thought Monsignore was setting himself against the visit you were mistaken. It was really Vittorio. But he ought not to be blamed for that. He only wanted to keep me in Rome because he was fond of me, you know."

"Or of himself! Well, go on."

"But then when I was gone, he was so miserable. He wanted to write to me, but then he thought you—might——"

"Well?"

"He knew you would see the letter, and perhaps question me about it, and so—he resolved to ride over all the way, only on the chance of being able to catch a glimpse of me even if he could not speak to me. He would not have done that, Catherine, if he had not loved me truly."

"And was it his true love which induced him to follow you to the gardens of the Villa when you were alone? He must have bribed the portress to let him in!"

"No, no, Catherine! Indeed not! She knew him. The Princess spent a summer once at Tivoli."

"He then knowingly exposed you to the comments of that ignorant woman, full of the ideas and prejudices of her country, who of all the matter only knows that you are the sister of a poor artist, a young motherless girl, who receives stolen visits from a gentleman of Don Vittorio's rank and consequence! You see what his lady mother writes;—how she views (or affects to view) such imprudent behaviour! Don Vittorio knows as well as the Princess that he was cruelly injuring your reputation in the eyes of all his people."

But it was all of no use. She blamed herself, she was willing to humble herself to the dust; but Vittorio was noble-hearted, generous, magnanimous, a mirror of chivalry! How, then, did she interpret the Princess's words, "My son has confessed everything," and the Princess's scornful reproaches following thereon? Had not Don Vittorio betrayed his love's confidence, and given her up to insult and evil repute? If he could not control or mitigate the arrogant violence of his mother's resentment, he could at least have disowned it! He could have come and stood by Lucy openly,—he could have written!

All in vain! I urged and argued in vain. And it grieved me to the soul to think how sharp the pain would be, how crushing the blow, when Lucy should be convinced by bitter experience that this idol she now worshipped was a poor, hollow, brittle, painted piece of clay.

The rest of that day passed miserably enough. Lucy was really ill;—nervous, languid, and unable to take food. Towards four o'clock a violent headache oppressed her, and I made her go to bed, and darkened the windows; for the light hurt her poor eyes, inflamed with crying. Lucy had, apparently, not thought of making any reply to the Princess Olympia's letter. But I had thought of it. I would do nothing rashly, but I had thought—not whether I should answer the letter, for on that I was unshakeably resolved—but how to answer it. And I was still thinking, when I heard the door of our sitting-room softly opened, and a light footstep on the bare brick floor. The step was very unlike S'ora Nanna's ox-like tread. I turned my head, and saw Monsignore Chiappaforte.

CHAPTER X.

HE came forward with a sweet sympathising look on his face —a look that needed but the slightest modification to serve for various occasions of condolence, from a broken tea-cup and genteel comedy, up to a broken heart and unfashionable tragedy. To which category he was disposed to assign my present troubles I was uncertain. I think he was himself uncertain for a few seconds. When he spoke it was in a moderate and measured tone of sympathy, and his countenance was just a very little less sweet as soon as he fully saw mine, than it had been on his first entrance. "This is a sad disappointment, my dear Signorina," he said. "I arrived here hoping to find both you and our dear Lucia well and merry, and enjoying your holiday, and now Don Gregorio tells me that your sister is ill."

"Yes, Monsignore; she is ill."

"Dear, dear, dear! What is it? A touch of fever? Have you any advice for her?"

"I shall see that she is taken care of."

"I am sure you will. There can be no doubt of that."

I had risen from my seat when I saw him, and remained standing, he also standing with his large ecclesiastical hat in his hand. I was vividly conscious of the contrast between my curt roughness of speech and manner and his smooth politeness; but I was resolved to make no pretences, nor to cry "peace" with my lips when there was war in my heart. I did not doubt that Monsignore was privy to the fact of the Princess's cruel letter. Perhaps he had even inspired it. Of this at least I was sure, that all his feelings in the matter would be ranged on her side and against us.

"I hope my worthy friend Don Gregorio Galli has been able to be of some use to you here?" said Monsignore with an amiable inflection of voice, which was so strongly contrasted with the tone of mine as to be almost ludicrous.

"No doubt he meant well, but I cannot say he has been of any use to us, Monsignore."

"Ha, ha, ha! No, eh? Poor Don Gregorio! He is a good creature,—a worthy soul,—but he has lived remote from the world and lacks savoir vivre, I dare say, ha, ha, ha!"

"Monsignore Chiappaforte, you must forgive me if I speak abruptly. My sister is ill. I am uneasy and troubled, and I cannot now talk with you on indifferent topics."

The expression of his face changed at once and completely from smiling nonchalance to steady gravity. He sat down, put his hat on the table, and settling himself in his chair, said, "Good. I understand. Will you talk on a topic which is not indifferent? Will you talk on a topic which concerns Lucia?"

"I cannot tell. I will not promise to talk. But if you wish it, I will listen."

Monsignore shrugged his shoulders very slightly, and replied, "That is something! One must be thankful for the smallest concession from so,—ahem!—admirably resolute a person."

I made no answer, but folded my hands on the table before me and waited.

"The fact is, that the Princess Corleoni is displeased with Lucia;—very seriously displeased. This grieves me, I assure you."

Here he paused, expecting me to speak, but as I did not, he proceeded in the same even, grave tone. "Now you love frankness, and have strength of mind to bear it, therefore I will say frankly that I think Lucia has been to blame. Frankly now, do you not think so yourself?"

"Monsignore, to answer such a question as that, made no part of my agreement with you when I told you I would listen. However, before I could answer it, if I would, I must know precisely what you mean in asking it. To what point in my sister's conduct do you refer? I take it for granted that you have some special thing in your mind for which you blame Lucy."

"Has not the Princess written to her?" he asked, taken a little off his guard.

"Oh!"

He leant back in his chair, half closing his eyes and nodding to himself as if he were meditating my reply. In reality I believe he felt himself checked by my stubborn inflexibility. I think he had reckoned on being able to lead me on to talk, and then to guide my talking, as he was accustomed to guide most persons, into the direction he wished; using either a silken thread or a leathern thong, coaxing, urging, or restraining, as the case might require. But my wrath burnt too hot within me for such arts to avail. In truth, the power of cunning—call it diplomacy, or what other polite name you will,—seems to me to be greatly over-rated. In general, it weaves only cobweb meshes which are shattered at the first stirring of any strong and genuine feeling. Passion ignores and over-rides the "laws of the game," hacks artful knots suddenly in two, and flings a fierce sword into the nicely-balanced scale. I think Monsignore Giacomo Chiappaforte scarcely made sufficient account of strong and genuine feeling in his dealings with the world. In the present case, instead of saying to me, "You are very indignant," he said, "You are very cautious, Signorina." And I suppose he really credited me with some deep scheme.

"However," he proceeded, "my duty, and my strong feeling of interest in your sister, alike command me to try to serve you. If I am misunderstood,——patience!"

"Monsignore, it is very easy to be understood, I think. One has only to speak the truth plainly."

"Alas! How often is the truth rejected and misinterpreted! The head alone will not suffice to receive it; it must be accepted by the heart. Intellect, my dear young lady, is no all-sufficient guide of conduct. But as to Lucia,—you say the Princess has written to her?"

"And you say so too, Monsignore."

"Ahem!—yes; I thought it likely, from what she said to me, that she would write. The Princess was much agitated. I trust she did not write—ahem!—a—a—intemperately?"

"She wrote very intemperately."

"Ah! Dear, dear, dear, I feared so! But you must make allowance for the feelings of a mother. The Princess is a devoted mother;—an exemplary mother. When the maternal feelings are aroused, women do not stop to calculate or measure their words. We must have charity for the imperfections of human nature."

"Monsignore, do you bring any message from the Princess Corleoni?"

The thought had suddenly struck me that he had been sent to negotiate a reconciliation with Lucy.

"A message? No; oh no! The Princess was too—too excited, when I saw her last, to think of sending a message to your sister. No; my visit to you is prompted by other motives. Ahem! You must be aware,—since you tell me the Princess has written, and written in anger,—that what has occurred places Lucia in a very sad and painful position."

"Insult is certainly painful. And Lucy is exceptionally sensitive."

"Ah! yes; but the matter is more serious than that. The Princess Corleoni is a very illustrious and influential lady. Her countenance and friendship can do much in Rome; and—naturally—her disapproval, on the other hand, carries with it a certain sort of social stigma. Now Lucia, I grieve to say it, has incurred her disapproval. I make allowances for your English habits of thought, and so forth; but still, not even in England, I believe, would it be considered venial for a young woman in Lucia's position to encourage the clandestine addresses of her employer's son! More particularly when that employer was of a rank so immeasurably superior to her own. You follow me?"

"You speak the language of the world, Monsignore; but at least you speak explicitly, and of course I understand you."

"You have nothing to oppose to what I say, Signorina?"

"I do not think I am called on to enter into any defence of my sister to you, Monsignore Chiappaforte."

"You will at all events be called on to undertake her defence to your own friends, to the world you live in, to society! Social laws must be obeyed by those who wish to profit by their protection."

"I renounce with contempt the 'protection' of social laws which bully the weak and cringe to the strong. I despise from my soul the attempt to make mere compromises with the world, the flesh, and the devil, binding on my conscience as if they were divine institutions."

My anger had flashed out in spite of me, like a sudden tongue of flame from a smouldering fire. The priest looked at me with a new expression of surprise on his face, mingled with sour aversion.

"These are strange sentiments, Signorina," he said. "I warn you that they are dangerous sentiments. I gave you credit for more sober sense than to be led away by such revolutionary notions. I had hoped that you would not encourage Lucia in conduct which gives such pain to her benefactress, and can only bring misery on herself. You, at least, must be convinced that Don Vittorio Corleoni can never marry your sister. It is too absurd an idea to be seriously entertained for a moment. The alternative, if she does not discourage his pursuit, is one which I suppose you are hardly prepared to accept, notwithstanding your disdain for the laws of society!"

At that moment I had a glimpse, not often vouchsafed to the profane vulgar, of the real Giacomo Chiappaforte, instead of the smooth, smiling, soft-voiced prelate, whose bonhomie and infantine gaiety of manner were so lauded and admired. And let me give Monsignore all the benefit to be obtained from the confession that, to me, the reality was preferable to the sham. The sham had disgusted and wearied me with its perpetual smile, its ready laugh from the teeth outward, its smooth, yet resolute ignoring of rough realities which were hurting other folks. But now at last the real Giacomo Chiappaforte showed that he could be in earnest on occasion. His mouth was drawn into an expression of the bitterest sarcasm, his eyes glittered angrily, his very voice was changed, and had a hard metallic sound. This man was at least human enough to hate, it seemed.

"Then, Monsignor," I said, disregarding his sneer against myself, "you judge Don Vittorio Corleoni capable of dishonourably pursuing an innocent, motherless girl, a stranger, beneath his mother's roof? The Princess judges as you judge, and yet neither of you have anathemas for him! The 'social laws' which Lucy is to obey on pain of losing their valuable protection have no protection to give her, nor any terrors for the man who would injure her! The morality which is revolted by Lucy's wickedness in believing a cruel lie, holds a sweetly charitable estimate of the liar."

"Tut, tut," exclaimed Chiappaforte, shrugging his shoulders, and fixing his mouth into a hard, cynical smile, "tut, tut, tut! This is the kind of high-flown sentimentality which might serve to excuse any offence, or crime, or blunder; and very often does, I believe, amongst the philanthropic worshippers of revolution and irreligion. As to Lucia, I am willing to give her credit for innocence of intention at the beginning,—youthful vanity is a great temptation, and hoodwinks the conscience. But the world will not judge so leniently. The world will say—unless the Princess can be induced to keep this unfortunate matter secret—that a young woman living with the liberty which is permitted to girls of your nation could not possibly be ignorant of the probable result of encouraging Don Vittorio's love-making in such a case. The world will say that Lucia perhaps played for the great prize of wife, but failing that, would not disdain to content herself with——"

"Be silent, sir! This conversation is worse than useless. I have nothing to say to you. I recognise no right on your part to intrude yourself into my private life. A benevolent intention might excuse it; but you are evidently actuated by feelings which are not benevolent."

"Young woman, I am not accustomed to be so addressed."

"Nor I."

"I am fulfilling my duty——"

"If so, your duty and my duty clash. This is my house, Monsignore. I request you, as you are a gentleman, to leave it."

"Before doing so, I wish to speak with your sister."

"I shall oppose your seeing her. She is too much prostrated to be equal to such an interview."

"Do you mean to shut her up? You had better be careful about what you are doing!"

"Oh sir, do not condescend to threaten me! I am not to be terrified by stern looks and big words. I am ashamed to continue this scene! Let it end. Since you refuse to go, I will leave you."

No sooner said than done. I passed swiftly out of the room, along the corridor, and up the stairs which led to our bedroom, leaving Monsignore in a position of considerable discomfiture. As I went through the stone corridor, I fancied I saw something flitting on in front of me; and before I reached our bedroom door, I overtook Lucy, trembling and panting with the haste she had made.

"Lucy!" I cried, "what does this mean? Where have you been? Why did you leave your bed?"

She drew me into the room and shut the door before she answered, and then sitting down on the side of the bed, she laid her head against my breast, and said, "I fell asleep after you left me, and when I awoke my headache was gone. I felt better, calmer, less fevered and nervous, than I have felt since I read that letter. I wrapped a shawl round me and came down to the sitting-room to tell you this, and to give you one gleam of comfort in the midst of all the trouble I cause you. When I reached the door I heard a voice speaking angrily. I did not recognise it at first, it was so changed. But after a few moments I found it was Monsignore Chiappaforte who was speaking. And then you answered him. And I stood there out of sight, and——and I heard it all, Catherine!"

"MARGERY TRAVERS," by A. E. N. Bewicke, author of "Onwards; but Whither?" &c. (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—Like its predecessor, "Onwards; but Whither?" this new story of Miss Bewicke's is full of excellent work, and much above the average of novels; but, like that book, again, the general impression it leaves on the mind is hardly satisfying. The tale is so good that we feel that somehow it ought to have been better. Yet it is seldom, indeed, that we come upon a novel boasting three heroines so powerfully conceived and ably drawn as Margery Travers, Una Stapleton, and Lottie Spluck—such as they appear, at any rate, in the first two volumes of this story. Margery is a girl of regal beauty and high intellectual and artistic gifts, but with the taint in her both of her "bad Travers' blood," and of the evil associations of a Bohemian youth spent under the care of a most disreputable, though well-born father. She thinks the warm affection and gratitude she feels towards Allan Stapleton, the honest and manly young English gentleman who offers her his love, will be enough to make her a good and contented wife to him; but ere long finds out that her lover's goodness and devotion do not prevent him from boring her by his intellectual shortcomings and incapacity to understand her, and enter into the things that interest her; and the struggle between her desire to be loyal to her engagement, and her inward weariness of it and repugnance to fulfilling it, is depicted with much force. Nor are Una Stapleton, who looks so dove-like an ingénue, and is, in truth, so bold and unscrupulous an intriguer, and so dead at heart to everyone, but the abandoned mauvais sujet, whom she sees through and despises, though she cannot cease loving him; nor Lottie Spluck, the great American heiress, who is such a fascinating compound of worldliness and simplicity, childishness and depth of feeling, at all behind Margery herself in distinctness and individuality. It must be admitted, however, that neither character can be said to be well sustained to the end; and, indeed, the interest of the piece dies out by degrees long before we reach the conclusion, and both the story and its dramatis personæ, male and female, become vague, unsubstantial, and unreal, as though the author was weary and had ceased to keep any real "grip" upon her work. It is difficult to say precisely what it is in Miss Bewicke's stories that is apt to make us feel them less successful than with their many merits they ought to be; but perhaps it is that, being comparatively weak in constructive faculty, she is given to encumber herself with an over-complicated plot. Entanglements and surprises are not the materials best suited to her genius; and we should strongly recommend her, when thinking out the plan of her next novel, to be content with some very simple and readily intelligible story, and trust to her power of delineating character, and writing animated and pointed conversation for rendering it interesting. We are tolerably confident she would have no reason to regret the experiment.

"Sunshine and Snow," by Hawley Smart (3 vols.: Chapman and Hall).—Captain Hawley Smart's new novel forms very pleasant light reading, though we do not like it quite as well as "Bound to Win," chiefly, perhaps, because it is less concerned with race-horses, and more with human beings, and the author seems to us more at home and at his best with the former than the latter. Not that there is any lack of "sporting" matters in these pages. We have two steeple-chases, a description of "trolling" for a big pike on a lake during a hard frost, and another of the "roaring game" of "curling" as pursued on the ice in a Canadian winter, besides something about trotting matches and cock-fighting. The sketch of Mr. Campbell Macgregor, the French Canadian of Scotch descent, whose habitual speech is French and broken English, but who has so supreme a veneration for the language and customs of his Gaelic ancestors, a veneration which necessitates his imbibing numerous "Willie waughts" of neat whiskey, though they make him cough and get into his head, and his natural instincts incline to light claret, is especially good. As to the principal personages of the tale, Jim Hawksbury and his brother Hussar, Mr. Cherriton, or "the Clipper," Clarisse Lydon, and Letty Auriole, they are just the kind of young people whom we have often met before in Captain Hawley Smart's novels, and hope we may often meet again. We cannot but think, however, that the author is a little out in his psychology in his account of the causes that led to the ruin of George Auriole, alias Lydon, the ex-man-of-fashion, who has suffered social extinction for cheating at cards. Would a man whose passion for play was a passion for mere winning, quite independent of the pecuniary results of success, care for a victory achieved by cheating—a victory which he would know was no real triumph at all? We could almost as well suppose "the Champion" proud of vanquishing a rival with one arm in a sling.

"Ingerstein Hall and Chadwick Rise: a Story of the Thirty Years' War," by James Routledge (3 vols.: Tinsley).—This story, which is described as "an attempt to picture some phases of the Thirty Years' War in their Relation to England," embraces altogether the whole century from 1613, the date of the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of James the First, to the Elector Palatine, to 1714, the date of the accession of George the First, but deals more particularly with the period from 1625 to 1637. Among the historical personages introduced are Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, and his famous Chancellor, Oxenstiern, Cardinal Richelieu, Wallenstein, and Count Tilly, whilst the fictitious characters are most of them certain members of the families of Ingerstein, Chadwick, Waye, and Prim, residing at Monkerton, a village to the south of London. Mr. Routledge—who, be it said, is an ardent champion of Protestantism, and of the cause of the Parliament against Charles the First—has treated his theme not without ability; but, from the length of time covered by the action, his tale is somewhat too sketchy, whilst the dramatis personæ crowd upon one another till one gets bewildered as to "who's who." Still, the book, if only for the care bestowed upon it, deserves to be spoken of respectfully.

"The New Paul and Virginia; or, Positivism on an Island," by W. H. Mallock, author of "The New Republic," &c. (Chatto and Windus).—Our estimate of Mr. Mallock's satire was sufficiently expressed in noticing it on its first appearance in the pages of the Contemporary Review for last April—viz., that, though undoubtedly clever here and there, as a whole it was rather forced and heavy, and did not succeed in so presenting the doctrines of Positivists and Materialists as to make us see them in a new light, but only in showing that they might be so represented as to be made to seem ridiculous—as, for the matter of that, might pretty well any system, religious or philosophical. But some of Mr. Mallock's hits are certainly felicitous; as, for instance, when the Positivist Professor, and the curate whom he has educated to be able "to give a reason for the want of faith that was in him," say good night to each other beneath the stars, "murmuring together that there was certainly no God, that Humanity was very important, and that everything was very solemn." Mr. Mallock has here added some "Notes" from the writings of Professor Tyndall, Professor Huxley, Mr. Frederic Harrison, and others, with the view of showing that the opinions he puts into the mouth of his Professor Paul Darnley are no caricature.

We have to acknowledge the receipt of the following works:—"Frank Allerton, an Autobiography," by Augustus Mongredien (3 vols.: Samuel Tinsley), a novel of the days of George the Second, which proves its author to be a man possessed of knowledge—even of somewhat recondite knowledge—and culture, but slenderly endowed with the special gifts of the novelist. It is, however, readable, and towards the close almost interesting. "Unto Which She was Not Born," by Ellen Gadestone (Samuel Tinsley), is a tale, fashioned after the model of Mr. Tennyson's "Lord of Burleigh," of a young lady who marries an earl, though all the while in love with a painter cousin, and then fades away under the pomps and cares of her new state of life, and unable, good as her husband is to her, to forget the old love. The story is not altogether a bad one; but as, save the last page or two, it is told by the heroine herself, she should not get so very near giving us an account of her own death. Also, "Loved and Unloved," by Harriet Davis (Samuel Tinsley), a story essentially tame and commonplace, though perhaps not worse than many another.

FASHIONS

Learned folks tell us that summer weather will last until September this season, therefore it behoves us to make preparations accordingly for our holiday trips at home and abroad. Those of our readers who are about to travel on the Continent we advise by no means to take any washing costumes, more especially those who are going to the Paris Exhibition; but, on the contrary, visitors to our English watering places cannot do better than provide themselves with some half-dozen or more of white cambric or sateen dresses, for the most part made short to clear the ground by four inches. An excellent plan with these costumes is to have a pleated flounce of batiste, with a scalloped edge at the top, fixed on a wide tape band, which can be firmly tacked upon the white dress. The flounce should be of a dark colour—Navy blue, cardinal red, myrtle green, mastic brown, or, better still, black; cuffs and a square collar to match. By way of variety, a laveuse tunic or broad scarf may be worn, edged with lace or embroidered muslin, and again the white costume may be made in battlements or scallops at the edge and the flounce placed under it. At the present season of "summer sales" Corah, pongee, and Japanese silks, are to be bought at a very reasonable price and will make foundation dresses light and cool, to be trimmed as above described. But there are days which are dark and dreary, for which we should be prepared in the shape of a good unshrinkable serge, made as simply as possible, trimmed with graduated rows of black braid, also well shrunk before putting on, so as to avoid that unseemly appearance which follows a heavy wetting when not thus provided against. With this costume should be worn a straw hat with a waterproof cover, or even a sou'-wester. For chilly sunshiny days we have seen some very stylish costumes made thus: short dress of white serge, Princess shape, double-corded at each seam with red or blue silk, on the skirt a double pleating of white, lined with the colour used, and turned down at irregular intervals. White soft felt hat, trimmed with a wing, and ribbons to match. Well-fitting shoes of kid or Spanish leather, laced up the front with coloured ribbon; stockings to correspond. At many French watering places may be seen hats, sensible, but most unbecoming, tilted over the eyebrows, so that the wearer can see nothing above her boot tips, and trimmed with cherries or blackberries hanging feebly downwards, or, worse still, woollen lumps which resemble nothing in nature. A becoming hat or bonnet of muslin to match the dress may be run up in half-an-hour, or on a straw foundation, carefully chosen to suit the face and figure of the wearer, any amount of variations may be effected. In spite of their clumsy sounding names we can assure our readers that oatcake and workhouse sheeting are light and cool fabrics most becoming to slender figures.

For visiting purposes dresses are often composed of three or four materials; for example, a petticoat of violet satin, trimmed with a frayed ruche of silk a lighter shade, over which is a cream-coloured damask silk tablier, embroidered at the edge in white, and violet chenille violets and leaves; long waistcoat of cream-coloured satin, embroidered in violets. Cream-coloured satin hat or bonnet, with shaded violet feather tips and long cream-coloured gauze veil, which is knotted at the front and fastened with a bunch of real or artificial violets.

Amongst the most fashionable and useful materials of the day is barége, a fabric which in Paris is very popular for bridal dresses. The Revue de la Mode gives the description of a most graceful bridal toilette made thus:

"The bridal dress of white barége was simply charming; it was made with a long train, gracefully draped, the only trimming a wide ruche of white satin and a long satin scarf-sash. Some wreaths of orange-blossom fell gracefully over the front of the dress. The hair was arranged in classical bands, which were divided by wreaths of orange-blossom. The dress of a relation of the bride was of lilac silver brocaded silk, the skirt trimmed with deep Castilian fringe, with a beading of lace-like gimp, white and lilac fringe which seemed to be composed of acorns and lilies of the valley; scarf, Louis XVI., in old point d'Alençon, with lilac bows. Bonnet with feathers, lilac and ornaments of point d'Alençon. Another most useful and economical material is mousseline de laine. A very elegant costume for a garden party was recently made thus: Dress of dead white mousseline de laine, on the skirt were six narrow flounces bound with Cardinal red satin; two wide scarfs crossed each other, embroidered at either edge with designs, in silk and crewel, of poppies and wheatears; the ends of the scarves were loosely knotted at the back and fastened with a large satin bow. Waistcoat, square collar and cuffs of red satin; cascade of Valenciennes lace down the front, ruffles at the throat and wrists. White silk stockings, with red clocks; black kid Queen Anne shoes, with red ribbon rosettes and bows across the instep. White chip hat, turned up on one side, lined with red satin, bouquet of poppies and wheatears. The same style looks well in rose pink, embroidered in roses of every shade, from white to the darkest crimson, evening-sky blue, with variegated ivy and bluebells, stone-colour with faded leaves of many hues, mastic brown with lilies of the valley, and last, but not least, black, which forms a background for any amount of colour and artistic designs.

Hats and bonnets are varied in form, material, and trimmings, from the simple white muslinette or batiste, made from the same material as the dress, and trimmed with a velvet or ribbon bow, to the dainty little bonnet composed almost entirely of ostrich feathers on the outside and under the brim, in white, with a rose or small bird—in pale blue, with a white water lily and leaves, in salmon pink, with a deep crimson rose.—A black net or chip hat or bonnet will be found most useful for country or seaside wear, as it may be trimmed with natural flowers, buttercups, daisies, wild roses, cornflowers, poppies, &c. Artificial fruit is also much worn—for example, plums, oranges, cherries, currants, black, white, and red, and strawberries.

In the present warm weather it is really a comfort to wear what is styled a dressing-gown, or morning robe, as long after noon as circumstances will permit, hence these costumes are made as tastefully as possible. Three robes of this description were recently shown to us. They were made thus: No. 1, of white striped cambric, trimmed with fine English embroidery, loose at the back; a plastron composed of seven strips of open work embroidery, lined with blue cambric, bows to correspond. No. 2, a Princess shape of dove-coloured mousseline de laine, with a plastron of poppy-coloured silk. No. 3 was of white Japanese silk, with a straggling pattern of Canterbury bells and variegated ivy. All three of these dresses were made loose, without sash or girdle.

Shoes and boots are now worn so pointed that we may shortly look forward to a revival of the fashion of fastening the tips by a chain or ribbon to the waistband. When not carried to extremes the pointed toes are much more becoming than the square to the feet. As to stockings they are now such works of art as to deserve to be displayed by the wearers of skirts at least six inches from the ground. Insertion of real lace is now introduced into silk stockings, and the result is that shapely ankles and insteps are made to look thick and clumsy.

From Paris amongst the latest novelties, are fancy bouquet holders in the shape of horns of plenty, lizards, serpents, and other reptiles; they are worn on the left side of the corsage or in the hat or bonnet, and contain a natural flower. Some of these bouquet-holders are very costly, but others are inexpensive, as the whim for these eccentricities will not last.

ALL THE WORLD AT PARIS

INTRODUCTION

Earth no such Folks! no Folks e'er such a Town
As Paris is! sing Derry, derry down.

Be pleased to go up with me in a balloon and look down upon the world. You will find that all its roads lead just now to Paris; and that every road is crowded with travellers.

What do they all want to see?

A big bazaar, full of everything; so that he who has seen Paris, shall have seen everything.

They come from the East and from the West.

Fat John Bull is pulled up in a fauteuil roulant.

Lean Uncle Sam sits on a rocking-chair and swears "this Exposition whips Philadelphia."

Africa flits across the Mediterranean.

Europe and Asia get mixed up; and the little Japanese cannot make up his mind which he belongs to.

All the world and his wife—et son père—goes to Paris. And Paris triumphs, holding up her arts and her institutions for universal admiration, and the sergent-de-ville is in his glory.

Chapter I.

Spectatum veniunt, veniunt spectentur ut ipsi.

Of course we went to Paris, because Papa is an exhibitor, being the inventor of the celebrated boot-cleaning machine. You can guess how we all wished to see it, the cynosure of every eye, and hear what the world had to say to it.

So we took tickets for Paris, five in all, for Papa and Mamma; for us girls, Lilly and Lollie (that's me), and Charlie, the only boy—Mr. and Mrs., the Misses and Master Ogle, as Galignani had it in print.

We telegraphed to the "Chatham" for beds. Mamma chose that hotel because it had advertised soap gratis.

Papa was so provoking as to take second class tickets, and, of course, at Dover we found the £ s. ds. on the boat, so had to crouch behind a mountain of luggage.

Our portmanteaus and band-boxes, carefully labelled FRAGILE, were hurled down a sort of avalanche on to the deck. Somebody's luggage exploded in the act. The somebody was leaning against the mountain reading, with a happy smile on his face.

We were too much engaged to bother about our luggage. We sat in "a line" and pondered whether we should or should not be "sick."

Lily determined to prevent it by fasting; I by eating; mamma by lying down; papa by standing up and holding a rope tight; Charlie didn't care. We were all sick. The sea was quite calm. It was nothing but the hideous display of mops and basins which made us so.

Then the train!—Dust and heat insufferable tempered by bores! A young Englishman, who had bought a French novel at Calais, "to get up the literature of the country," kept saying, "Oh, oui, oui, n'est ce pas." It was like the note of a brain-fever bird on a hot day in India.

An American, as we passed the Seine, asked boldly whether that was a branch of the Scene.

An old Englishman insisted on unpacking a large trunk to get out a dust coat.

Suddenly, as we were going our fastest, a head popped in at the window, and demanded "tickets."

How mamma started! and how papa fumed, for our tickets were in the deepest depths of his trowsers pocket, and we were packed as the French pack sardines.

At last Paris and an omnibus to the hotel! Charlie sat on the box with the driver—a surly man, for Charlie said, "Many English in Paris?" "Aye," said the coachman, with a crack of his whip, "and Russians, too."

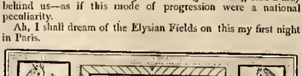
Then a grand ascent of staircases, up to the seventh heaven of the "Chatham." From our bedroom we ought to have a magnificent view of Paris. We rushed to the window and saw—only a stack of chimney pots.

We were late for table d'hôte, but after dining privately, we hurried to the Champs Elysées. Oh, how mysterious those long dark alleys of trees! how romantic the flash of the fountain in the moonbeams! Very soon we are craning our necks amongst a crowd to look over a rhododendron hedge at a theatre embowered in trees, sparkling with a thousand lanterns.

At the gate of this paradise (café chantant) we stood disconsolate, for papa would not let us go in.

He took us to the Cirque d'Été instead. We need not have come to Paris to see that, but we met here a most popular Englishman in the person of the clown. In this profession, at least, we are allowed to excel. Our countryman had a way of jerking himself forward in a sitting posture, without the aid of hands or feet. "Un vrai Jean Boul" (John Bull), said a lady behind us—as if this mode of progression were a national peculiarity.

Ah, I shall dream of the Elysian Fields on this my first night in Paris.



THE READER

The charming papers—reprints, in part, from the Cornhill, the Saturday, &c.—now published, by Dr. G. Birkbeck Hill, under the title of "Dr. Johnson, his Friends, and his Critics" (Smith, Elder, and Co.), will be, to admirers of the great eighteenth century lexicographer, like the discovery of some new treasure. As chapters of biography, they bring to light more than one fact and clear up more than one disputed point. As studies of a character, the most interesting, perhaps, to English tastes of the literary characters of all time, they help us everywhere to a survey of it from fresh and novel points of view. Not their least service in this latter field is the effectiveness with which the author—himself an old alumnus of Johnson's college—sets before us Johnson as a true and loving son of Oxford, a character largely formed of Oxford influences and teaching. By most of us, perhaps, this side of Johnson's individuality has been, to say the least, imperfectly appreciated. We are apt to recall the legend of the poor scholar's worn-out shoes, the truer story of the visit to the Master of Pembroke, the coldly civil reception, the neglect to subscribe for even one copy of the Dictionary, and to put Alma Mater from our thoughts with the sentence sternly passed upon her by Johnson's junior, Gibbon; to think of Johnson solely as a Londoner of the Londoners, the literary Bohemian well known to Cave and Savage, the literary dictator of an after time, but not a man in the formation of whose character Oxford had even a larger share than Lichfield; to forget how dear Oxford always was to Johnson, from those youthful years when first "the fever of renown burned from the strong contagion of the gown." to the years of shattered health and full-grown fame when he could still take heartiest delight in parading her streets in his new and handsome Master's gown, and enjoy nothing more than doing the honours of his retired little college—"nest of singing birds" as, mindful of the many minor poets to which Pembroke had given birth, he loved to call it—to his dear Hannah More. Were it, indeed, only for this study of "the Doctor" as a true-born product of our eldest University, Dr. Hill's volume would amply repay perusal. But it is also very much more than this. It falls into a three-fold division—a delightful picture of Johnson's Oxford, rich in minute and lively details, and rendered glorious (from the biographer's point of view) by the happy discovery among the musty battel-books of Christ Church of the special entry which by indirect evidence fixes beyond a doubt the long-disputed date when Johnson ceased to be in residence as an undergraduate; a critique, delicate and exact, though at times, perhaps, somewhat strained too far, of the Rembrandtesque and effective, but not always strictly accurate, portraits of Johnson and his set by his later critics, Macaulay and Carlyle; and, last, a group of sketches of Johnson's friends, Goldsmith, Topham Beauclerk, Bennet Langton—all good, the last two admirable. It is not too much to say that it is a volume which will henceforth be indispensable to all who would form a full conception of Johnson's many-sided personality.

In default—more pity that it should be so—of the staunch readers of the olden type whose healthy appetites could digest ten volumes of "one of the best biographies in the world" and pass contemptuously by the abridgment in 800 pages, we could wish no better substitute for Lockhart's "Life of Scott"—no abler miniature after a master portrait—than that which Mr. R. H. Hutton furnishes in "Scott" (Macmillan and Co.), the new volume of Mr. John Morley's series of "Englishmen of Letters." Aims, work, and incidents—the story of the life—are so faithfully condensed from Lockhart's volumes that criticism of Mr. Hutton's narrative would be criticism of Lockhart himself. Yet something may be said for the broad and genial sympathy with which Scott is treated in his weakness and his strength, in his dreams of building up a feudal family and his battle single-handed against the storm his carelessness had evoked, as for the thoroughly artistic estimate—however tastes may differ on some of its minor points—of the literary worth of the Romances and the Poems. A better volume could hardly be found to revive the interest of the mass of readers in a genius and a personality whose claims, once universally acknowledged, are now in many quarters all but ignored.

Whatever views may be held of Homer and the Homeric poems—of all the perplexing questions, in fact, which have come to make up a special science of "Homerology"—there can be but one opinion of the ability and the fulness, in the smallest possible space, with which these questions are treated by Mr. Gladstone in his "Homer," the new number of "Literature Primers" (Macmillan and Co.).—That Homer was an actual personage, an Achaian Greek of the pre-Doric period; that he composed the two epics commonly ascribed to him much in the shape in which we have them now; that their production and preservation, with only slight corruptions of the text, in an age when writing was unknown, present no insuperable difficulties to those who estimate aright the powers of a practised memory and the prevailing custom of public recitations; and that the theory of the "Chorizontes," or "Separators"—the writers who assigned a different authorship to the "Iliad" and to the "Odyssey"—is supported neither by external nor internal evidence, are the main theses which Mr. Gladstone defends at starting. These once established, we next proceed to consider the artistic scope and perfectness of the poems as national epics of the noblest class, and to extract from them that which, under any theory of their origin, they must be admitted to contain—a system of the religion and the polity, the morals and the arts of pre-historic Greece. We know not how far Mr. Gladstone's views will quite command the assent of foreign scholars. To ourselves he seems a little to overrate the internal evidence from artistic skill, and hardly to allow enough for a frequent simplicity in thought and style—as of the imaginative childhood of the world—not inconsistent with the theory of divided authorship. There can be no doubt that the question—one, after all, of greater or less probability—is admirably stated, and the reconstruction, out of the poems themselves, of primitive customs and beliefs as sound as it is tasteful.

The common-sense, but somewhat easy-going, Broad Churchism of the lectures and addresses against Disestablishment, now reprinted by Thomas Hughes, Q.C., under the title of "The Old Church" (Macmillan and Co.), will commend them more, we fear, to tolerant laymen of no particular Church party than to those ardent disciples of greater strictness in dogma and in practice by whom—whether they go to the right or to the left—the fate of Churches, national or independent, seems more and more likely to be decided. Yet it is a volume full of much sound thought and ready argument from the point of view of the politician, if not of the sectarian. The most effective, as well as the most instructive chapter, that on Voluntarism in excelsis in the United States, with its invariable tendency to narrow everywhere the entrance to the Churches and leave outside an ever-increasing residuum to the sole spiritual power that will take them, Rome—seems particularly worthy of attentive consideration.

The fragrance of the woodland and the river bank—not the wild forest or the rushing torrent of untamed lands, but the trim plantations and the lazy streams of central and southern England—seems to cling to the pleasant little volume "The Game-Keeper at Home," a reprint from the Pall Mall Gazette (Smith, Elder, and Co.). It is full of things that the lover of woodcraft likes to know and read about—the haunts of hare and rabbit, where the hedgerows are full of gaps, or the chalk shoots up from the bramble-covered ground in tiny precipices, the ways of hawk and ousel and marauding crow, the difficulties that beset the keeper's path in breeding time, or the plots and counter-plots of watcher and poacher, where the meadows by the plantations are scored across with village "rights of way." A volume that only the true lover of the country will enjoy, but that he will enjoy very much indeed.

It is doubtless most desirable to learn to read with proper emphasis; yet we almost question whether Mr. George Vandenhoff's "Art of Reading Aloud" (S. Low and Co.), with its puzzling array of bars, and notes, and arrow-heads, and accents, and endless rules for "orotund," or ore rotundo elocution, is quite the book to which we should commit ourselves, except upon compulsion. It is doubtless very true, and very sensible; but it reminds us irresistibly of Mr. Weller's saying about "going through a great deal to learn so little."

A useful little essay on "Singing," by Fred. Penna (Tinsley Brothers), in which the patient sufferer from "Books of the Words" will be glad to note among the first requisites for good singing, the distinct and proper pronunciation of consonants and vowels, and a trio of psalters—"The Proper Psalms," with Notes and Short Explanation (W. R. Bowden, Oxford; W. W. Gardner, London): "The Magdalen Psalter," or the Psalms and Canticles Pointed for Chanting, by Messrs. Tuckwell and Stainer (Bowden, Oxford; Mowbray, London): and "Canticles and Psalter Festival and Ferial," Pointed for the Gregorian Chant, by the Rev. J. B. Gray (Bowden, Oxford; Mowbray, London), hardly require lengthier notice.

"Rob Rat: a Story of Barge Life" (Wesleyan Conference Office).—In the little unpretending book before us the unspeakable misery and vicious brutality of the lives of the population of our canal barges is depicted with a simple but telling truth; the author evidently having a full acquaintance with his subject. With a realism that is almost ghastly he draws a painful picture of desolate toil and drunken vice—of men, women, and children literally wallowing in utter filth and wretchedness. The book can scarcely fail in its object, which is to direct attention to this fearful state of things; though in what way reform is to be commenced is a question not very easy of solution. It is dedicated to Mr. George Smith, of Coalville, whose exertions first brought the matter into prominence, and whose name is doubtless familiar to many.

We have already, in former years, called our reader's attention to the excellent "Practical Guides for Tourists," published by Trübner and Co., and we will only say that the new edition of the "Practical Continental Guide" for 1878 is in every way as deserving of praise as its predecessors, and fully justifies the promise on its title page—that it enables tourists to see all that ought to be seen in the shortest period and at the least expense. The Guide relates to France, Belgium, Holland, the Rhine, Germany, the Tyrol, Switzerland, Savoy, and Italy, and contains an immense amount of information of all kinds, briefly and tersely given. The condensed guide to Belgium, Holland, the Rhine, the German Spas, and South Germany, is also worthy of high commendation.

RURAL NOTES

The Cattle Bill.——"Report Progress." Such have been the words used during the last three or four weeks "in season and out of season" about this ill-advised measure. The Duke of Richmond, a breeder of no mean note—a landlord who cares for his tenantry—might have had more consideration for himself and other fellow-breeders before he framed it. He seems to have forgotten, that the Bill was like a two-edged sword; nay, more than that, that it would not only cut both ways against those rearing long pedigreed stock in this country, but had as it first stood a direct thrust at the consumers of meat produced out of lineaged cattle. Under this heading, on the 8th June, it was noted that the Cattle Bill "excited an unusually animated discussion in the House of Lords, and that no persuasion or taunts could induce the Duke of Richmond to alter his resolution to have all foreign animals slaughtered at the port of debarkation, except Americans." Where are we now? Or, rather, where is his Grace when the Bill goes back as amended, emasculated, of none effect from the Lower House? We shall perhaps learn something definite before grouse shooting begins.

The Weather.——Hay has been dear enough, why should it not be cheap? Neither in Ireland, England, nor Scotland, have we had so heavy a crop for many years as in the present, nor so beautiful a season for storing it in good condition. But a failing exists both in Scotland and Ireland of often delaying to secure the hay until the weather breaks, and all the sweetness and much of the nutrition have been taken away. In the course of the past fortnight there have been terrific thunderstorms—in Wales specially, where many cattle and sheep were struck down by lightning and human beings miraculously escaped. The crops, so far as we have seen and can learn, have not suffered so much as might have been expected—there are not many corn-fields "laid," and only here and there potato stems are battered down. The rain has done much good to the aftermath, and the sheet-lightning contributed to the ripening of the grain.

The Show Season.——One would scarcely believe, to look at the jovial rubicund faces of the farmers who go the round of the shows (whose numbers at present are legion), that they were such poor ill-treated wretches as some of their would-be representatives affirm. They talk at these gatherings, of course, of the merits of this or that particular animal—doubt, as becometh them—a bounden duty almost, the justice of the judgments, but "aye the burden of their sang" is oh, for more security of tenure and fewer restrictions in leases. Agricultural shows are becoming too much alike. They are not now adding much to the education of agriculturists. The same animals are paraded from showyard to showyard, from the Land's End to John o' Groat's, with, so far as we can observe, no other earthly reason than taking prize-money, and affording different judges opportunities to arrive at varying conclusions, upon grounds no more definite than touch and symmetry and points never calculated up as they ought to be. When an animal has passed successfully through all the stages of the prize list it is, in our humble opinion, fitting time that he should retire into the herd, or go into a caravan.

Harvest Prospects.——So far as the writer's experience goes they are favourable to husbandmen. The Farmer takes a very hopeful view. It says: "The crops of 1878 are standing at the present date (last Monday) in a satisfactory state all over the country. Of the wheat crop the estimate may be put at thirty bushels per acre, yielding a total of about thirteen million quarters, say three million quarters over last year's deficient harvest. Probably the total money value of the 1878 harvest of all crops, including hay, over that of 1877, will not be less than 50,000,000*l.* sterling."

Miscellaneous.——Mr. Fletcher N. Menzies, the courteous secretary of the Highland and Agricultural Society, has been presented with a cheque of 1,156*l.* and a silver tankard for the services he has rendered the Society.—The Colorado beetle has been relegated to the limbo from whence it sprang. A new danger, we are told, has arisen in Ireland, not to the potatoes, thank goodness, the staple food, but to the turnips this time. Major Borrowes has discovered a caterpillar, "or small green worm," whose whereabouts had not been noted—since the days of St. Patrick, we were going to say—but for twenty-five years, the Major puts it. This villainous little worm has a peculiar taste. It destroys "all the leaves except the centre one," and, having done so, "shows wonderful powers of getting over the ground." It is to be hoped its fraternity will be stopped before getting over other ground than the twelve acres of the Major in the County Kildare.—The old story is that, if you want anything well done, do it yourself. To plough land without the intervention of anchor or rope has frequently been tried and not succeeded, because the motive power made indentations too deep in the land to recover itself, let alone the plough it was dragging. We have seen a model of a traction engine invented by Mr. Edwards, Kansas, U.S., that looks as if it could accomplish the task wherein Boydell and others have failed, of going over the land with its cultivating apparatus without sinking. We should be pleased to see it in actual work.

OUR CLIMATE

Jones would lose half the delights of his month's holiday if, on his return from the "Continong," he could not descant in rapturous expletives upon the blue skies and the glorious sunshine in which he has bathed himself abroad. "What a change from the cloud, and rain, and fog of this beastly place!" he exclaims. Jones, having read the constant diatribes against the English climate, in which the newspapers are so fond of indulging, and pinning his faith entirely upon those facetious articles, is fully convinced that clouds, rain, fog, and easterly winds are the peculiar properties of this country, and utterly unknown in that vague and favoured territory, the "Continong." As he usually makes his trip in the very finest season of the year, he is not disappointed. It is, as a rule, tolerable weather, even in his own doleful land, during the months of August and September; we see the sun occasionally, an icy easterly wind does not blow every day, and link-boys do not drive a very flourishing trade at that period; but, while Jones is roasting in the streets of Paris, or taking a Turkish bath upon the lower ascents of Mont Blanc, he pictures those evils to be the lot of the wretched who are doomed to remain in Britain. If he went to Paris in March, he would be rather disillusionised; his nose might be bitten by a north-easter, his cheeks beaten by sharp sleet, and he might some nights find himself enveloped in a good thick yellow fog of which London might be envious; for Lutetia no longer deserves the praise of Benvenuto Cellini, who pronounced its atmosphere to be clearer than even that of Italy. There were no coal fires in his day.

Where are we to go, to what land, to find this wonderful contrast to the English climate? A study of the weather-tables in The Times will show us that the weather in the capital of France is pretty much like the weather in the capital of England at all times. If it be cold in the one place, it is seldom balmy in the other; if we are drenched with rain, our neighbours cannot altogether dispense with umbrellas. Our spring is the worst time of all the year; but even their villainies are often in good company. When, two or three years ago, we were snowed up and frozen up in April, the same blessings were extended to Bordeaux and its neighbourhood, and even to Rome. I can hear Jones growing very angry, and raving about Provence and the South—the sunny South! Well, we have our sunny south, too. The south-west of England has a charming climate; in Cornwall and Devon, and even in Hampshire, the myrtles grow twenty feet high, and trail about the labourers' cottages, and fuchsias attain the size of trees. In the first-named county, orange, and lemon, and cork trees, the American aloe, and almost any tropical shrub or tree, will flourish in the open air: and the winters are mild, sunny, and snowless. Would any person, for comfort's sake, exchange the climate of green, genial Ventnor, taking both all the year round, for that of parched up and torrid Toulon? or for the scorching summer and bitter winter of Madrid? At poetic Verona, the icy winds that come down the mountains in winter are far keener than any we should experience in the Isle of Wight. And we have no mistral in our south. Crossing the Atlantic, have we anything so unendurable as the climate of New York? Sunstroke in the summer, frost-bite in the winter; and, as to fickleness, listen to what the elder Matthews wrote about it in one of his letters:—"It is neither the cold of winter nor the heat of summer that injures the constitution of a European, but the changeableness of the weather—one day muslin and lace too much to bear; next, flannels and furs insufficient; while, at Boston, it was one day 12 deg. below zero, the next 25 deg. above." I have heard people even lean with a preference towards the Russian climate." Fancy a St. Petersburg winter. A writer thus describes it:—"Snowing and freezing, with intervals of slush, from November to April. If you have not heavy furs on, you are frozen to death, nipped by the ice-cold winds, sent home to bed with toothache, or rheumatism, or congestion of the lungs. If you muffle yourself up warm, you are obliged to crawl at a snail's pace, groaning beneath a load of wraps, one advantage of which is that it breaks your fall as you slide full length upon the slippery pavement." There are besides such trifles as the loss of a nose or a couple of fingers to which Jack Frost has taken a fancy. Surely there is nothing so very enviable in all this.

It is a characteristic of human nature to reverse Hamlet's advice, and to prefer flying to ills that it knows not of rather than endure those it has. The unparalleled brutality of our climate is so frequently dinged into our ears by natives and foreigners, that it is a part of our gospel to believe it unique; yet Nathaniel Hawthorne, who had been a traveller in many countries, who was not, to say the least, an ardent admirer of things British, had the courage to say he considered our climate, with all its faults, the best in the world. There is scarcely a day throughout the year in England in which it is so cold, or so hot, or so rainy that open-air exercise is impossible at any hour throughout the twenty-four. How few countries can justify the same boast!

I do not attempt to assert that our climate is nearly as good as that of France or Italy; but "the travelled" indulge in such exaggerated enthusiasm over those countries, regard them through such a roseate atmosphere, that if they be secretly disappointed with the reality, as compared with their imaginings, they would not acknowledge it for the world, but would rather hide the disappointment under increased enthusiasm. Even Italy is not always innocent of leaden skies, and slush, and snow; and the sunset mists of Nice and the exhalations of the Campagna are far more deadly than "a London particular." Some of our illusions about the transcendent Eastern climate have been rudely disturbed by the letters of the special correspondents during the late war; the descriptions they wrote of their sufferings from rain and cold nights would have been very appropriate to a winter journey through the Scottish Highlands, but read very strangely when applied to the land of the rose. All things considered, with Hastings, Ventnor, Bournemouth, Torquay, and Penzance, we are not such a wonderful distance behind even the countries that can boast of Cannes, Nice, and Mentone.

HOLIDAY THOUGHTS ON SEA VOYAGES

The old question of "Where shall we go?" has probably been, or is being, asked by thousands of people at this time. To get to the sea seems to be the prevailing idea; and there is no doubt that for those who habitually live in a large town or city the sea-air is the great restorative.

Those who are rich enough to travel generally prefer the Continent, and, if they settle down, take up their abode at some foreign watering-place. But the mass of English people who take a regular autumnal holiday frequent our own seaside resorts. These places are not without considerable disadvantages. People leave comfortable and even luxurious homes to go into dingy lodgings, and find, with the rent of them, that their household expenses are doubled, and probably trebled. They sleep in uncomfortable beds (sometimes more than uncomfortable), they sit in rooms furnished with faded carpets and curtains, with a suspicion of a good deal of dust buried in them. The tables are generally ricketty, and the chairs seem to have been made to suit beings of a different shape from our own.

And there seems no way out of this discomfort, as we have not yet in this country arrived at the art of comfortable hotel life at a minimum price. It is true that there are hotels that have a fixed charge that sounds moderate; but a long list of "extras" makes up for the moderation.

However, we bear all this discomfort of seaside lodging-houses, because we think we can get out of the dingy rooms, if the weather is fine, and stroll by the sea. The sea-air does us good, and we go back to our work refreshed; but somehow we don't feel quite satisfied. We begin to think we have spent a great deal of money on our holiday, and we might have done more. Then next year the same old question comes again as to where we shall go, and the calculation as to what it will cost, and we begin to wonder whether we couldn't get more enjoyment from the money. We enumerate all the places, and decide that this is too crowded, and that too common, and the other too dull.

If there is a family of children for whom autumn arrangements must be made, there is no way out of the difficulty, unless the parents will consent to part with them for a time, and then they could not be better placed than at a farm-house, or some place in the open country. Sea-air is not an absolute necessity to children, unless they are of scrofulous or scorbutic habit. It is the brain-worn, weary man, who wants the iodine and bromine and ozone that the sea will give him.

For children the open country and good farm produce for food is the very best thing; and of such food there is generally a scarcity in a crowded seaside place.

The writer's experience of the cure for a really overworked brain is a sea voyage. Not a coasting voyage to Scotland or any neighbouring place, but a voyage right out in the deep blue sea. One is accustomed to think of it as a very terrible affair. There may be sea-sickness, of course, which is unpleasant; but if the way of travelling is wisely chosen, there need be none of the horrors we have been accustomed to associate with a sea voyage. Some of the mail steamers are now so admirably appointed that a week or two can be spent very pleasantly in them. It is true the sleeping berths are small—for a large person—but they are scarcely less uncomfortable than a lodging-house bed.

One is so absolutely lazy on board ship. The brain must rest, for it quite refuses to work. There are no newspapers or letters or telegrams to disturb one. You are not continually pulled up, as when travelling by rail, at stations whose walls are covered with glaring advertisements, which so fix themselves on the mind that they become a regular nightmare. You do nothing all day, and you are quite content with doing nothing. You have not that restless feeling which you have on land, that makes you complain of ennui. And you can always find amusement in your fellow-passengers. It is astonishing how many people of original character you meet on board ship; at least you fancy they are all original. There is great variety in the human mind, and you have time to find it out; and it is probable that there are several amongst the passengers who have travelled much, and have much to say.

Then there is equality and good fellowship on board, and that does good for a change. The first-class passengers are probably of all grades from a peer to a tradesman. On shore the tradesman would be the peer's most humble servant, but on board everybody is equal, except the captain, and he is the king. This freedom from conventionalism for a time is refreshing, and gives one an opportunity of better knowing one's fellow creatures. Those who had very magnificent ideas of a lord, find he is only an ordinary mortal with well-bred quiet manners; and the higher class people may parchance find out that there is a good deal of humanity in those whom they have been accustomed to despise, and that a grammatical form of speech is not always necessary to express a noble sentiment.

Then it does one good to talk to the sailors and to see how cheerfully they work, and how cheaply they hold their lives; and the captain and officers are nearly always interesting men.

It is surprising how soon one gets an appetite at sea. You begin to look out for meal-times, and find yourself eating three good meals a day, with an occasional snack at the bar. You become quite astonished at your own powers in the way of eating.

The length of the journey must depend on the purse and inclination of the traveller and the time at his disposal. Several tracks might be indicated, as there are good steamers on most of the lines; but one that can be specially recommended as convenient for any one having only a short holiday, is a trip to Madeira. It is advisable to choose one of the newer vessels, as being easier of movement, and containing all the latest improvements. It is a six or seven days' run from the Docks, in good open water after the Channel is passed. Madeira is a beautiful and interesting place, and there is an English hotel, Miles's, where the accommodation is most excellent, and the charges much lower than in England. The stay here might be as long or short as the traveller pleased. A fortnight can be very agreeably spent in making excursions in this land of sunshine and flowers, and, unless it is the rainy season, fine weather is pretty certain. Then there is Teneriffe within twenty-four hours' reach, which is also very interesting.

The overworked man, who, having a month to spare, makes this journey, will find when he reaches the Docks on his return voyage that he can step lightly off the ship, and return to his business with a heavy burden cast away from him. He will feel that he can fight any difficulties and do any amount of work; and he will discover that he has the spring of youth in his movements that he thought he had lost for ever.

to the extent of 90*l*.—At the Chester Assizes, two gamekeepers have respectively recovered 65*l*. and 50*l*. damages from their late employer, Captain Parr, a county magistrate, who, suspecting that they were dealing dishonestly with his rabbits, had them confined in a lock-up for more than a month before bringing them before the magistrates, by whom the charge was immediately dismissed.—On Sunday last, fifty-four of the inmates of the Mount St. Bernard Roman Catholic Reformatory in Leicestershire attacked their gaolers and made their escape, after arming themselves with bludgeons, knives, and stones. Forty-three of them were recaptured and taken back, but in the struggle one of them stabbed a policemen, for which offence he is now in custody at Loughborough.—The Echo says that last Sunday at Cobridge, near Hanley, two married women engaged in a "prize fight." A ring was formed, the combatants used their teeth as well as their fists, and after three rounds, one who was "severely bitten," retired. Where were the police?—The trial of the Spaniard Garcia for the wholesale murder in Monmouthshire has been postponed. He was hooted and hissed on the way from the gaol to the court-house, and again on his return.—A shocking occurrence took place a fortnight since at the East End of London. A boy, aged five years, being told by his mother to rock the cradle in which lay his baby brother, replied passionately, "I don't want to rock it," and on his mother leaving the room for a moment, he got a large nail and struck the child under the eye. The baby died, and at the inquest one of the jury wished to legally punish the child, and contested the verdict for a quarter-of-an-hour, but ultimately a verdict of "death from misadventure" was returned.—In South London another boy, aged eight, on Saturday last shot his sister, aged three, with a revolver. The girl died, and the result of the inquest was a verdict of "Death from misadventure," coupled with a censure on the children's foster parent for his carelessness in leaving the weapon about. The boy, on being questioned, said "I took up the pistol and pulled something, when it went off. I did not know what it was;" and added that he did not think it was a real pistol.—At Hereford, a girl of thirteen has been sent to prison for six months for attempting to poison her mistress by tampering with her medicine.—A thermometer maker at Islington committed suicide last week in a fit of passion, caused by finding a skewer in some meat served to him at supper.

W. C. BENNETT'S NEW VOLUME,
Cr. 8vo., Cloth, 1s.

SEA SONGS. By W. C. Bennett.

"While Dr. Bennett's new volume of sea songs is admirably qualified to attract maritime hearers, many of them are as well fitted to be sung in the drawing room as on the bosom of the Atlantic. Simple, free, flowing, and full of buoyant vigour, they are now stirring and joyous in tone, and again unaffectedly pathetic. Their writer has caught the genuine odour and flavour of salt winds and blue foamy waves; he gives us songs of parting—graceful, simple, and tender—songs that tell of lonely musings in tropic calms, of ships beating amid sleet and snow 'round the Horn,' straining under clouds of canvas after flying foes, of sweeping into palmy isles over the Pacific swell; and he descants with the fiery energy of diction of the great deeds of Blake and Anson, Vernon and Pellew—naval worthies whom his songs should make more than names to the people. In short, Dr. Bennett's new volume is altogether excellent, and can scarcely fail to attain extensive popularity."—Scotsman.

THE GRAPHIC SUMMER NUMBER,

which was entirely sold out on the day of publication, has now been re-issued, and a few copies still remain unsold.

The numerous readers of THE GRAPHIC who were disappointed in not being able to procure the number at the earlier date would do well to make immediate application to their newsagents, as, after the copies now remaining are disposed of, there will be no further re-issue.

THE GRAPHIC SUMMER NUMBER.

"Nothing better of the kind, whether as regards the artistic merit or its literary attractions, has ever been issued—and we are thinking of productions which cost a good deal more than a shilling—than the Summer Number which the enterprising proprietors of The Graphic have published at that price. It stands, indeed, in some respects, entirely alone."—Manchester Examiner.

"We may embrace this opportunity of saying that The Graphic people have excelled even themselves in their Summer Number."—Greenock Telegraph.

"The most entertaining number of The Graphic yet issued is the Summer Number for 1878."—Leeds Express.

"From its novel and interesting character great success is anticipated."—Bilston Herald.

"A popular number, that will assuredly secure a great demand."—Daily Chronicle, June 25, 1878.

"Is a novelty in newspaper literature."—Warrington Guardian.

"Which is likely to meet with a very favourable reception."—Bradford Telegraph.

"The coloured engravings, which are numerous, and finished in a very superior style, hit off in a happy manner the peculiarities incident to life at the seaside, the more humorous features receiving special notice."—Bradford Chronicle.

"The number is certainly the best yet issued by The Graphic, and that is saying a great deal."—Preston Herald.

"Will excite general interest."—Eastern Morning News.

"Having read your notice of The Graphic's Summer Number, I hasten to examine for myself this artistic and wonderful production. I can with confidence recommend my readers, residents, or visitors, to procure for themselves copies of this admirable paper, feeling sure that they will derive much genuine pleasure from an inspection of its contents."—Scarborough Weekly Post.

"Christmas is no longer to have a monopoly of good things in the way of literature and art. To The Graphic belongs the credit of invading the 'old Father's' time honoured domain."—Brighton Herald.

"A charming special Midsummer Number of that inimitable journal, The Graphic, whose varied and unique illustrations are a marvel of the printer's art, and exhibit a great advance in colour printing. We have seldom seen a better shilling's worth."—Staffordshire Advertiser.

"Demands a word of praise for the excellent taste and artistic beauty of its illustrations, the majority of which are coloured by a process which the proprietors were the first, we believe, to employ for the purposes of popular periodical literature."—Manchester City News.

"Holiday numbers of the lighter monthlies are by this time almost an institution, but a 'summer number' of an illustrated weekly is a rather novel idea. It is an idea, however, which is likely to be heartily welcomed by many people in the form given to it by the publishers of The Graphic. The accuracy of some of the views is noteworthy, while the spirit and humour displayed in all would not have discredited John Leech's Punch."—Scotsman.

"Is one of the most artistic productions that has lately been published. A very pleasant day indeed might be spent on the sea shore with no other companion than the summer number of The Graphic."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Sufficient light reading to wile away a few hours very pleasantly."—Midland Counties Express.

"Its novel and interesting character will doubtless render it a marked success."—Belfast Northern Whig.

"Is delightfully fresh and breezy. The number is a highly creditable one, and is full value for a shilling."—Sheffield Post.

"It contains a large number of coloured engravings, the subjects of which will excite general interest."—Leeds Mercury.

"A great many of the drawings are given to phases of life at Scarborough, and several to those of Harrogate."—Hull Express.

"The views are most amusing, and true to life. We commend the Extra Summer Number of The Graphic to our readers."—Shields Daily News.

"Affords us greater pleasure than almost any such venture which we can remember. How such a work could be produced at the price charged for it we are utterly unable to explain."—Bath Herald.

"The special numbers of The Graphic are always good, but the present one is the best which has been yet produced."—Observer.

"Will be the source of considerable amusement, illustrating the life and habits of various classes of seaside visitors."—Staffordshire Sentinel.

"This number has a true holiday air about it, and is almost redolent of the sweet breath of kine, and bracing with the briny air of ocean."—Huddersfield Examiner.

"Admirable, and the illustrations of our babies among the buttercups and on the sea shore will find their way into many a scrap book."—Sunday Times.

"Will be of special interest to Yorkshire readers because of its coloured illustrations, numerous and effective, of Mr. Chumley's Holidays at Scarborough."—York Herald.

"By far the most elaborate thing of the kind that has ever been issued in newspaper form."—Banbury Guardian.

"During the height of the season is admirably pourtrayed. It should have an immense sale."—Doncaster Gazette.

"This splendid holiday number of The Graphic is sure to sell by tens of thousands. Everybody at the seaside or at inland resorts, famous for their medicinal springs, is bound to buy this number; and no one buying it will fail—unless he is afflicted with a very severe attack of mental blindness—to discover her own or his own portrait. . . . This summer number will prove, we hope, the prelude to many more equally good."—Weekly Times.

"Redolent of the seaside. The number is an admirable one, both in a literary and artistic sense."—Liverpool Evening Express.

"Is a surprise of a most pleasurable kind, a budget of fun, and brimful of the pleasantest, brightest, and funniest coloured seaside sketches ever gathered together in such a form."—Liverpool Albion.

"Is resplendent in gorgeous colours, and they must indeed be fastidious who are unable to derive pleasure from its bright and amusing sketches. The Graphic, as a high-class journal of art, is always an acceptable element of our current literature, but there is a peculiar charm about the present issue which is calculated to make it particularly welcome at the commencement of our Scarborough season."—Scarborough Daily Post.

England and the East.——It may be hoped that we have now entered upon a time of comparative repose in regard to the Eastern Question. The opinion of the nation has been formally asked through its representatives; and Parliament could not have given a plainer or more decisive answer. Everything indicates that the country, taken as a whole, cordially sides with the Ministry. It may not have approved every step taken during an exciting and dangerous crisis; but it is inclined to forget mistakes that may have been committed, and to look to the future rather than to the past. No one who watches public opinion carefully will, however, assert that all anxieties have been finally allayed. People feel more and more that the enterprise we have undertaken is one of vast proportions, and Ministers cannot be said to have thrown much light on the manner in which it is to be fulfilled. In his speech at the Guildhall, indeed, Lord Beaconsfield was most emphatic in his assurances that the Convention with Turkey is a reality, and that no time will be lost in the attempt to carry out its provisions. Sir Stafford Northcote spoke in the same tone on Tuesday; and Lord Salisbury's statements thoroughly agree with those of his colleagues. But all of them seem to imply that we are to work simply by moral pressure, and it is this fact that gives rise to some grave forebodings. Of course it is possible that the Sultan may be as good and wise a man as the Premier describes, and that he and his officials will profit by the bitter lesson they have learned during the last two years. At best, however, we do not get beyond a possibility. The Turk is not nearly so bad a fellow as Mr. Gladstone makes him out to be; he has, indeed, some qualities which we, with our pharisaic self-importance, would be all the better for imitating. But his best friend cannot say that he is energetic in pursuit of an ideal, or that he troubles himself much about ideals at all. His tendency is to let things "slide," and to believe that when he has issued an order or made a promise he has done everything that can be reasonably expected of him. It may be, therefore, that after some show of giving heed to our counsels he will at last begin to think us intolerable bores, and politely let us know that he would like us all the better if we advised him rather less. However, the Government had clearly no alternative but to make the attempt it is now about to begin; and we must all hope that the glowing prophecies in which it indulges are not altogether fanciful. Perhaps, even if "the Pashas" are not very pliant, the people whom they govern may be favourably affected by our having pledged ourselves to defend them against aggression. It will, of course, be the aim of the Ministry to show them that it is their interest to associate themselves with us; and if they are fairly convinced of this, they would probably do more for their rulers than their rulers are ever likely to do for them.

Dismembered Turkey.——The boast of our Ministers that they brought back "peace with honour" may be accepted as justifiable so far as England and Russia are concerned. A conflict between these two Powers has been avoided, or, at all events, indefinitely postponed, by each consenting to abate somewhat of its original pretensions. But in South-Eastern Europe, the focus of all the trouble, there is at present little sign of genuine peace. In the Rhodope district the Bulgarian avenges the oppression of centuries by the most abominable ill-usage of his Mussulman neighbours, while the Russian conqueror looks on apathetically, or even connives at these outrages. That the Austrian occupation of Bosnia was a matter not merely of political expediency but of absolute necessity is proved by the shameful massacre to which the vanguard of the occupying forces has just fallen victims. If the fanatical Mussulmans shoot down in cold blood the soldiers of such a powerful Empire as Austria (Hungarians, too, who are usually credited with a strong friendship for the Turks), it is not likely that they would have shown much mercy to the wretched refugees who have for months been cowering on Austrian soil, if they had dared to return to their homes unsupported by Austrian bayonets. We have no desire to take an unduly pessimist view, but it is plain that countries which are in a semi-barbarous condition, and which are inhabited by half-a-dozen or more conflicting sects and nationalities, are unfit for self-government. Thus far Russia has done nothing but mischief by her wanton attack upon Turkey; for although a bright future may emerge from the gloom of to-day, no one, whether philo-Russ or philo-Turk, can deny that at this moment the provinces rent from Turkey are in a far worse state than they were three years ago. The only exception seems to be Cyprus; there the people really appear glad to see the British, because, in spite of all our faults and shortcomings, we do, in dealing with dependent populations, endeavour to act fairly and impartially towards everybody.

Paying the Bill.——The reckoning for all the great things he has been doing is decidedly heavier than John Bull had anticipated or likes. To be talked about by all the world, and at the same to do a really good stroke of business, is no doubt an excellent thing, but to have to pay six millions for it—that is not at all so agreeable. Between four and five of these six millions have still to be met, and Sir Stafford Northcote's proposal is to issue Exchequer Bonds, by which the debt will be cleared in about three years. Mr. Gladstone angrily denounced this plan, but we do not think his arguments convinced anyone who was not prepared beforehand to accept every conclusion that might tell against the Government. To make the nation pay the bill at once, as he suggests, would mean the imposition of fresh taxes. That would be very useful to Mr. Gladstone, since it would make people grumble, but it would be by no means so useful to the country. Trade is still in a depressed condition, and no wise Minister would hamper it more than he could help. We could have understood Mr. Gladstone's indignation had it been proposed to transfer the payment of the money to another generation, but the taxpayers who will have to bear the burden will be those who have derived the benefit for which the expenditure has been incurred. Besides, had the recent preparations been made twenty or thirty years ago, they would not have been completed in nearly so short a time. Our Administration is now more highly organised, and important measures are taken with a speed and thoroughness that would once have been deemed impossible. It would therefore be unfair to require us to pay our way precisely as our forefathers used to pay theirs. After all, however, this is a very subordinate question; the real difficulty is to decide whether, as the saying is, we have obtained real value for our money. On that point impartial observers are pretty well agreed. Whether the Anglo-Turkish Convention proves a success or not, we have at any rate been saved from war, which we should certainly not have been but for the evidence we gave of our readiness. To be delivered without discredit from a severe struggle is an advantage for which it would be worth while to make far greater sacrifices than those that are now demanded of us.

Roughs in the Parks.——In this journal we have always welcomed—and we trust we shall never cease to welcome—every suggestion which tends to increase the innocent pleasures of the poorer classes, who, especially in large cities, are not too plentifully provided with recreations which are both healthful and harmless. But for this very reason we must beware of yielding to a sentimental cry ostensibly raised in favour of the poor man, but in reality calculated to do him more harm than good. Much abuse has been levelled against Mr. Baillie-Cochrane, because he ventured to state that unruly children did a good deal of mischief in St. James's Park. If he was correct in making this statement—and our own personal observation of the park in question on many occasions leads us to think that he was correct—why should he be styled fastidious and exclusive for endeavouring to preserve, on behalf of the whole community, that which a portion of the community are damaging? Everybody knows how mischievous the children even of the most careful parents can be. Much of this spirit of mischief does not arise from malice—it is merely curiosity in the wrong place or at the wrong time—but its effects are not the less objectionable. One gentleman says he went to St. James's Park on the Bank Holiday, and the children were behaving beautifully. He could not have chosen a worse day for judging. The children he saw belonged altogether to a higher class—to artisans, small tradesmen, and the like, who had come from a distance, the park was to them a delightful novelty, and, most important of all, they were with their fathers and mothers. The children of whom Mr. Baillie-Cochrane complains are habitués of the park, they mostly come from the slums of Westminster, and the parental element is generally represented by some child-mother of seven, who has, perhaps, two or three lively urchins younger than herself to look after, as well as a fretful baby. We should be sorry to forbid these forlorn little creatures access to the park—their homes are not too attractive—but we must at the same time remember that the recuperative energy of Nature is easily neutralised on a limited space of ground by human efforts, and that if the numbers of these juvenile roughs were largely increased, the park would become a leafless, grassless waste. We advise, therefore, that for the benefit of all these young persons should be more sharply looked after than they have been latterly.

Mixed Marriages.——It is impossible to find fault with the decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins in regard to the extremely interesting case which came before him on Monday. Clearly the law could not recognise as binding the promise of a man before marriage as to the religious training of his children. He may afterwards change his mind; and it would be impossible to insist on his paying for an education which he regards as a deadly evil. At the same time, a real hardship is inflicted upon a woman who has obtained a solemn pledge that her offspring shall be trained in accordance with her most sacred convictions, and who is afterwards deprived of the rights thus conferred upon her. She may receive no legal injury; but that she has morally a genuine grievance there can be no question. On the whole, the conclusion to be drawn from the case is that "mixed marriages" are not, as a rule, desirable. Of course it is possible to conceive people of different religious ideas living together in perfect harmony. This is especially easy when the husband is good-natured or indifferent. But if he and his wife are both of an ardent faith, and if their beliefs diverge on fundamental questions, there must necessarily be incessant misunderstanding. And a woman can never be sure, however much her lover seems to submit to her will, that no difficulties will arise. When the heyday of passion is over, and prosaic duties take the place of romance, he may become rather less obliging; or, perhaps, his notions about religion may altogether change. From being a cool man of the world he may develop into a fanatical Methodist; and then there are pretty sure to be "scenes." All this will seem very foolish to a young couple who are certain that life would not be worth having if they could not share it hand in hand. But if a Roman Catholic young lady is wooed by a young gentleman who is not a Roman Catholic, her parents would do well, before giving their consent, to look carefully at both sides of the question.

Inaccessibility of the Thames Embankment.——There are a good many arrangements in this big metropolis of ours which inspire the intelligent foreign visitor with more astonishment than admiration. For instance, at immense expense—as all ratepayers know—a fine granite Embankment has been constructed on the Middlesex bank of the river. In any Continental city—in Paris, Berlin, or Vienna—where private interest is compelled to give way to the public benefit, such a noble thoroughfare would be made as accessible as possible. But what do we see in London? Why, we see a street called the Strand running parallel with the Embankment, and numbers of cross-streets uniting the two thoroughfares, only that--will the intelligent foreigner believe it?—so many of these cross-streets are closed at one end, that from Villiers Street to Surrey Street, a distance of half-a-mile, there is at present only one street leading to the Embankment, namely, Wellington Street. When the Waterloo Bridge toll is removed, there will be a great increase of traffic in that part of the Strand leading to Wellington Street, and as there is a steep hill in Upper Wellington Street, by the Lyceum Theatre, the congestion will probably cause some accidents more or less serious. Why should not the culs-de-sac leading from the Strand be all opened to traffic, being first paved with wood or asphalte, so that the lodging-house keepers may not complain? And talking of streets, when are we going to have that long-mooted avenue from Tottenham Court Road to Charing Cross? Now that he has settled the affairs of Europe at Berlin, the Marquis of Salisbury might take the matter in hand, and so make amends for past obstructiveness.

Party Organisation.——A great deal has recently been said as to the necessity of political parties organising themselves. The Liberals are hard at work all over the country, forming compact bands by which, it is hoped, they will soon be able to improve their present humble fortunes. And Lord Beaconsfield on Tuesday, addressing the representatives of Conservative Associations who waited upon him and upon Lord Salisbury, devoted most of his address to a panegyric on party organisation. Both ancient and modern history were put under contribution for the illustration of his theme, and we have no doubt that his counsels will be enthusiastically followed. We confess it seems to us a profound mistake that so much should be made of mere party ties. Under a constitutional system parties are probably inevitable; but they should be accepted rather as a necessary evil than as something to be proud of. If they are to be really useful, they must be the spontaneous expression of sincere conviction. Nothing blunts a man's love of truth for its own sake, nothing so effectually saps his love of intellectual fairness, as to belong to a party to which he feels he owes thorough-going allegiance. Under such a system as that which is now coming into favour politics will cease to be a serious study; the word will come to mean an ignoble strife for place. The aim of statesmen, we believe, ought rather to be to relax the already too strait bonds of political life. Certainly, we have not of late had much reason to congratulate ourselves on the advantages of party government. It is impossible to believe that in regard to the Eastern Question the Liberals would have acted as they have done if they had not felt it necessary, as a matter of course, to attack their opponents. Men like Mr. Cowen have shown that they are capable, in a great emergency, of departing from those with whom they usually associate; and the spirit they have displayed is that of the truly patriotic politician. It is to be hoped that there are still a great many Englishmen who love England but care very little about mere parties, and who are prepared to judge on its merits every question as it arises. If this is not so, our politicians will soon degenerate to the level of those of the United States.

TOO MUCH WHIP AND SPURS.——All genuine sportsmen who witnessed the race for the Goodwood Cup must have felt indignant at the punishment inflicted on the gallant mare Kincsem. "She was spurred," says The Times' reporter, "from withers to hip, and the application of the flail-like whip of her clumsy rider was patent to everybody all down the straight." If this is the usual method by which jockeys in Hungary strive to win a race, and not an exceptional punishment inflicted amid the overwhelming excitement of the struggle, poor Kinesem must wish, albeit she won the Cup, that her gallant ancestors had stayed in England, instead of emigrating to foreign parts. There is plenty of brutal senseless treatment of horses in this country; so it is with some satisfaction that we note that Kincsem's rider, although English by birth, had been for some time in Hungary, and had, therefore, probably acquired this bad habit in his adopted country. At all events, his unlimited use of whip and spur met with unanimous disapproval from those of his brother-professionals who were "standing down," and who thus were able fully to appreciate the requirements of the case.

AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE TO THE HOLY LAND

II.

Two of our engravings represent respectively a group of Bethlehem women and a group of Bethel men. Concerning the personal characteristics of the people of these two places we spoke last week, we will therefore here say a few words concerning the places themselves.

Bethel, which lies about ten miles north of Jerusalem, is mentioned in Genesis as the scene of Jacob's dream. Here also Abraham pitched his tent. The city was originally called Luz, and was the residence of a Canaanitish king. The name was probably changed to Bethel, "House of God," from the fact of a temple having once stood there. After the secession of the North from the South, which took place during the reign of Rehoboam, Bethel became the chief scene of Jeroboam's idolatry and the feasts connected with it. The place is now called Betin. It consists of miserable hovels with about 400 inhabitants.

The word Bethlehem in Hebrew signifies "place of bread." The town lies about five miles south of Jerusalem. The scene of the Book of Ruth is laid there, and Bethlehem was regarded by the prophets as a sacred place because it was the home of the family of David. As the birthplace of our Saviour it acquired still higher fame, but it was not until the fourth century, when pilgrims began to flock thither, that it became a place of importance. After the destruction of its fortifications in 1489 it lost much of this importance, but within the last two or three centuries it has gradually recovered. Since the Muslims were expelled by Ibrahim Pasha in 1834 in consequence of a riot, the town has been almost exclusively occupied by Christians. The inhabitants, who number about 5,000, are farmers and cattle breeders, besides making images of saints and other ecclesiastical ware.

From Scopus, the hill where Titus and his legions were once encamped, an especially interesting view of Jerusalem is obtained. The position of the town on the top of a rocky eminence is distinctly seen, and its indented north wall (resembling that of a mediæval fortress), its towers, and its numerous mosques and minarets appear to great advantage.

Mount Hermon, which culminates in three peaks, each about 9,000 feet high, is frequently mentioned in the Old Testament as a landmark of Palestine, and indeed of Syria also. It is not mentioned in the New Testament, but one of its slopes was probably the "high mountain" on which the Transfiguration took place. In winter the mountain is covered with heavy snow, and even in summer patches of snow are to be found in shaded hollows. The expedition to the summit, which occupies a whole day, is best made in summer or early autumn. The view from the top is of vast extent, embracing a great part of Syria.

We have borrowed the above details from Mr. Baedeker's admirable "Guide to Palestine and Syria." Our engravings are from photographs taken by Mr. Frank Mason Good. We omitted accidentally last week to acknowledge our obligations to this gentleman, from whose photographs all our Holy Land engravings were taken, with the exception of the "Struggle for the Olive Branches" and the larger view of the Wall of Wailing, which were from original sketches by our special artist.

CRICKET IN INDIA

EVERYBODY is aware that wherever Englishmen go they carry their amusements with them, as well as their pale ale, their plum-puddings, and their public dinners. Wherever half-a-dozen Englishmen are gathered together, something of the nature of a horse race is sure to be got up among them; while as for cricket, that game which to the Continental mind seems such a complicated puzzle, it has been successfully played both under the sun of the tropics and upon the ice of the Polar regions. Our troops had not been forty-eight hours in Cyprus before the stumps were set up. It is not everywhere, however, that John Bull finds any of the natives inclined to join in the sport; they are generally content to "assist," in the French sense of the word, by simply looking on. There are, nevertheless, exceptions to the rule, and in the Bombay Presidency the Parsees, who have for long shown themselves superior to the prejudices with which other Indian races are more or less fettered, have come out quite strong as cricketers. Before long, it is rumoured, a Parsee Eleven will visit our shores for the purpose of contending with us on our native turf. We have already received several severe drubbings in the cricket field from our Australian cousins, perhaps next we are destined to be knocked (cricketically) into a cocked hat by the descendants of the Fire Worshippers of Persia.—Our sketches require no remark on our part, save this, which we address to readers who do not know India. The Indian cricketing season is during the so-called "cold weather," that is, from November till March, when the air is comparatively cool, though the sun's rays are still so fierce that a pith helmet is required to withstand their influence.

AN IDEA FOR A DECK OTTOMAN

OUR picture represents an adaptation on a large scale of the swing-tray which hangs in every ship's cabin, and which, being suspended, remains almost motionless, however violent the oscillation of the vessel may be. The ordinary swing-tray is used as a safe place for depositing tumblers and wine-glasses, often full of liquid. Its big brother in our sketch is loaded with a still more attractive freight, although we incline to think that, pleasant as these young ladies may be in themselves, they must be rather irritating to Ixion at the wheel, as they are not transparent, and, therefore, must seriously impede his vision of objects ahead.

By this invention, which is a simple and easily-managed adaptation of the ball-and-socket principle, every packet afloat may become a Bessemer on its own account; and at a very trifling expenditure may give its passengers all the immunity claimed by the promoters of that vessel.

Given a light iron frame, which may be screwed into the deck, and a wicker-chair swinging freely therefrom by a ball in a socket fitted on to the frame; and it is evident that the apparatus will follow every motion of the vessel; and the thenceforward happy passengers may smile a calm defiance at the heaving waves.—Our engraving is adapted from a sketch sent us by "J. P. A."

THE MINISTERS IN THE CITY

THE visit of the Premier and Lord Salisbury to the City was not made the occasion of any popular display of enthusiasm. The decorations on the line of route were few and far between, the most noticeable being the tinsel dragons or griffins, whichever they were supposed to be, which at Temple Bar supported between them the banner inscribed "Peace with Honour." It had become whispered about that there would be no "procession," and consequently there was no unusual crowd in the streets, when the Earl of Beaconsfield's carriage, closely followed by that of the Marquis of Salisbury, was driven Citywards along the Strand. The ordinary traffic went on as usual, and at very few of the windows were any spectators assembled. The greater part of the cheering was done by some rough-looking youths who ran beside the carriages shouting vociferously. At Guildhall a temporary pavilion had been erected in the yard, and a profusion of tasteful decorations was displayed both here and in the Guildhall itself. One of our contemporaries thinks it an odd circumstance that the arrangements were precisely like those on the occasion of the reception of the Czar of Russia. When Lord Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury alighted, they were received by the civic officers, and conducted, amid amid the plaudits of the assembly, to the Great Hall, where the Presentation of the Freedom was to take place. The Court of Common Council was then opened in due form, and after one or two items of business had been disposed of before the Clerk announced, what everybody present already knew, that at a recent meeting the Common Council had agreed to confer the Freedom of the City upon Benjamin, Earl of Beaconsfield, and upon Robert Arthur Talbot Gascoigne Cecil, Marquis of Salisbury, and the Chamberlain read aloud the names of the citizens who had proposed and seconded the resolution. Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury then each signed and read aloud a declaration, promising to be true to the Queen, obedient to the Lord Mayor, and to uphold the privileges and customs of the City: and then came a speech from the Chamberlain, who said that the Premier's grandfather belonged to the City, and declared his belief that Lord Beaconsfield himself might have been Lord Mayor if his energies had not been turned in another direction. The parchment certificates were then presented to their lordships (the gold caskets in which they were to be enclosed not being yet ready); and each having returned thanks in a brief speech, and inscribed their names on the Freemen's Roll, a motion was made and carried "that this Court do now adjourn," and the Lord Mayor, the Mace and Sword Bearers, the City Marshal, and the newly-made citizens of London marched out of the Hall in procession, amid renewed cheering from the spectators. The proceedings had, however, been interrupted at one point by a person who seems to have forgotten the nature and purpose of the meeting. Taking advantage of a moment's silence he shouted out his opinion that the new citizens were "traitors to the Constitution," but his protest was cut short by the bystanders, who promptly hustled him out of the Hall. The reception at the Guildhall was followed by a banquet at the Mansion House, at which speeches were made by Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury, the former giving the reasons why he believed the result of the Congress would be an enduring peace. Europe had, he said, a prospect now which she never enjoyed before. She had brought before her for her study and development a great continent which Nature has gifted with infinite wealth. The British protectorate, if carried into effect, would add much to the wealth and welfare of the world. The first duty of the Government would be to secure tranquillity and order, and as soon as tranquillity and order were general—and this mainly depended upon the administration of justice—he would leave the rest with confidence to the energy and enterprise of Europe. Lord Salisbury, after remarking that previous treaties to which this country had been a party had been denounced like the Treaty of Berlin was now by a small section of the people, said that a great field of duty was now opened to us; and we must make up our minds not to neglect it. The act of the Government had been declared the will of the nation with no uncertain voice; and if we were true to the mission we had undertaken the two years of war abroad and of bitter controversy at home would only be remembered as heralding the dawn of a period of order and prosperity for one of the fairest regions of the earth.

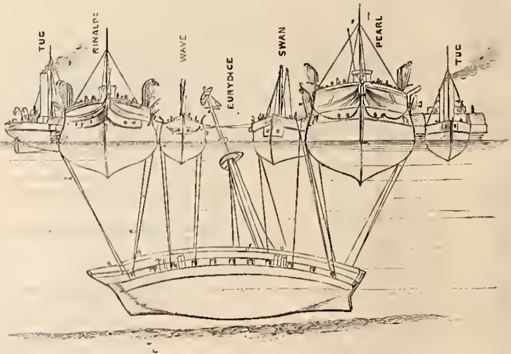
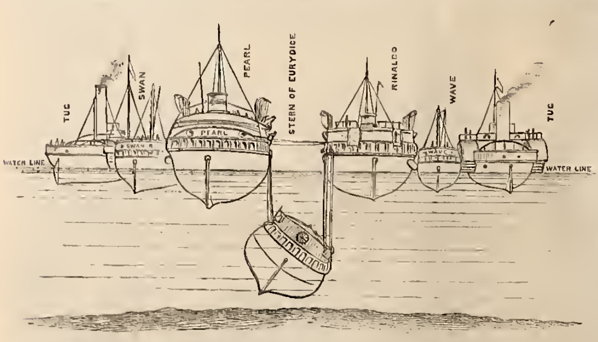
THE RAISING OF THE "EURYDICE"

After four months of arduous labour, the wreck of H.M.S. Eurydice has been successfully beached at Sandown Bay. The position of the vessels employed in the lifting process are shown in the accompanying diagrams and in one of our engravings on page 148, a reference to which will enable our readers to understand the somewhat complicated arrangements which were necessary for the accomplishment of the work, which has all along been of the most difficult character. One great point must be borne in mind, that everything depended upon the divers, and that they could only work at slack tides and in very fine weather, the under currents on the Isle of Wight coast being exceptionally strong. The ship lay at first in seven fathoms and a half of water, and to this must be added eight or nine feet of mud in which the wreck was embedded, making in all a depth of about fifty-six feet from the surface. Wire ropes were from time to time attached to the inner sides of the ports by means of "toggles," pieces of timber six feet long by twelve in diameter, which acted as buttons; the other ends of the ropes were made fast to the four floating hulls placed over and across the Eurydice; and, when everything was ready, and the tide at its lowest ebb, the process of pinning down was commenced—that is, the ropes were hauled "taut," and made fast to the lifting vessels, so that, as the tide gradually rose to its highest point, the whole mass of lighters with the sunken vessel lifted as well. Then it was that the steam-tugs took up their positions, and towed the ill-fated craft towards shallower water, till she was left on a bank under the Culver Cliff, with one side and her upper deck above the water at low tide. Many times all would be ready for lifting, when the sea roughened, and everything had to be abandoned, the lighters returning to Portsmouth.

The deck of the vessel, when beached, presented the utmost confusion, the whole surface being almost covered with ropes; the hull, with the exception of the bows, carried away by the Thunderer, and a portion of the quarter, torn by the iron ropes, was but little damaged; and two boats, in an undamaged state, were found almost in their proper places. More than a dozen bodies were found; but many a score remain below. The last lift was effected by means of steel hawsers passed under the wreck.



THE LIFT BEFORE THE MAST WAS OUT, BY MEANS OF "TOGGLES" AND "JIGGERS"—LIFTING VESSELS ATHWART-SHIPS



STERN VIEW OF LIFTING VESSELS AND WRECK—THE MAST OF THE "EURYDICE" TAKEN OUT TO AVOID CONTACT WITH SHIPS

On Friday last Her Majesty the Queen, with the Princess Beatrice and the young Princes Albert and George, viewed the wreck from the beach; and on Monday the Royal yacht Osborne steamed into the bay with the Prince and Princess of Wales and their five children on board. The Prince himself had a boat lowered and rowed to the wreck, upon which he clambered, and remained for some time conversing with the officers in charge. It was hoped that by now the Eurydice would have been afloat and on her way to Portsmouth Harbour; but the state of the weather has greatly checked the work. On Wednesday, however, at daybreak, the Rinaldo and Pearl again lifted the wreck sufficiently to clear the bottom, and the Eurydice, together with the lifting vessels, was slowly towed a distance of six miles, to St. Helen's Sands where she now lies, and where it is thought the closing of the ports can, previous to pumping out, be effected.

THE AMERICAN ARCTIC EXPEDITION

Mr. James Gordon Bennett, the energetic proprietor of the New York Herald, having, by a liberal expenditure of capital and the indomitable perseverance of Mr. H. M. Stanley, succeeded in opening out the hitherto unexplored portion of the African Continent, has now turned his attention from tropical to Arctic exploration, and is organising an expedition, entirely at his own cost, which is to make yet another attempt to reach the North Pole. For this purpose he has purchased the well-known Arctic yacht Pandora, which, under the command of Captain Allen Young, has already achieved important work in the North Polar regions. The Pandora, which has been rechristened the Jeannette by Mr. Bennett, is a screw steamer of some 250 tons burthen, and is fitted with engines of 80-horse power. She is specially built for Arctic service, and, in addition to a hull of more than ordinary strength, is sheathed from eight feet above her keel to two feet above her water-line with a coating of American elm some three inches thick, so that her resistance to the nipping of the ice may be rendered as great as possible. The rudder can be dismounted and replaced in case of accident, and she is fitted with a perfect magazine of appliances and instruments for Arctic exploration, such as sledges, ice-saws, tents, ice-anchors, &c.; while she carries about 164 tons of coal, her daily consumption, when steaming four knots an hour, being reckoned at three and a half tons. The hull, for greater safety, is divided into three water-tight compartments, and, since the 1st of April, has been under the hands of the shipwrights, and has been thoroughly and completely repaired, any injured wood-work being removed and replaced by new. In the stern, also, a comfortable cabin has been formed for the officers. On June 18th, as we have said above, Mr. Bennett rechristened the vessel the Jeannette, and she has now sailed for San Francisco, where her fitting out is to be completed in time to start on her journey next January, when she will attempt to attain the North Pole by way of Behring Straits. At the same time Mr. Bennett will despatch another yacht, the Dauntless, which will also try to reach the Pole by way of Spitzbergen.

The map of the North Polar region needs little explanation, as it shows the most northerly points which as yet have been reached by the various explorers. The first really authentic Polar expedition was undertaken by Sebastian Cabot, in 1497, with three vessels; and he was succeeded in 1596 by Barents, who discovered Spitzbergen. Hudson, and other Englishmen, followed up his researches for the next ten years; and, in 1616, Baffin discovered the bay which bears his name, and the now well-known Straits of Smith's Sound. In 1740, a Danish navigator in the Russian service, Behring, passed through the Straits which separate Asia from the United States. These discoveries, which were mainly made while searching for the North-west Passage, by which the Atlantic and Pacific were supposed to be united, early proved of great value to Arctic navigators, as they opened the three chief roads towards the North Pole—namely, those of Smith's Sound, of Spitzbergen, and of Behring Straits. By the first-named several noteworthy attempts have been made to reach the North Pole, beginning with that of John Davis in 1585, when the latitude of Upernavik was attained, down to later days, when Ross and Parry made their well-known expedition in the Alexander and the Isabella. In 1852 Inglefield attained the altitude of 78° 28'; and in the following year the American explorer, Dr. Kane, in the Advance, reached the latitude of 78° 45', and, being forced to pass a second winter in the ice, he sent out a sledge expedition under Lieutenant Morton, who reached 81° 20', from which point an open sea was descried. In 1860 another American, Dr. Hayes, who had served as a surgeon under Kane, sailed in a little vessel of some 133 tons, the United States, and reached 81° 35' by means of sledges; but found Kane's "open sea" covered with ice. In 1871 Captain Hall left New York in the Polaris, and reached the highest altitude as yet attained by a vessel, namely, 82° 16'; and next we come to the Nares-Markham expedition in 1875, when Captain Markham, in a sledge journey, reached the highest altitude yet recorded—83° 26'.

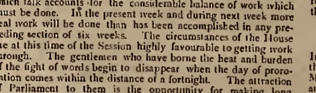
The Spitzbergen route will be ever famous by the Franklin-Parry Expedition of 1827, when the altitude of 82° 45' was attained, this being the first occasion on which sledges were used by Arctic explorers. In 1868 Dr. Petermann sent Koldewey northwards, when he attained to 81° 05'; and in 1869 Hegeman and Koldewey, in the Germania and Hansa, reached, in the former vessel, 75° 30'. In 1872 Count Wilczek fitted out the Tegethoff, and entrusted an expedition to the two Austrian explorers, Weyprecht and Payer, who, by means of sledges, reached 82° 05' (the Tegethoff only attained 79° 54'), and discovered Franz-Josef Land. The Behring Straits have been principally explored by Russian expeditions, including those of Anjou and of Wrangell in 1821; but, in 1849, Kellett discovered "Kellett Land" and "Herald Island," since which time no expedition has attempted this route, which is now to be explored by the Jeannette. As may be seen by the map, the current in the Straits sets northwards, towards the Pole, while in Smith's Sound it flows in a southerly direction. Thus, a vessel entering Behring's Straits would be assisted in its course by the course of the current, while all vessels going by the Baffin's Bay route lose half their time in combating the stream. The Arctic winds which mainly prevail blow from the north-west, and they cause the floating masses to drive towards the east, and thus open canals on the shores of the Arctic peninsula. A way, therefore, is expected to exist along the coast of Kellett's Land, by means of which it is hoped that the Jeannette will attain her object. The fact that extremely thin and fragile ice exists in this direction, and that an open sea has been seen by Anjou, Wrangell, and Kellett, tend to corroborate the theory of the advantages to be attained by the choice of this route.

Note.——We last week omitted to state that the whole of our engravings representing the young Princes on board the Britannia were taken from photographs by Messrs. W. and D. Downey, of 61, Ebury Street, Pimlico, whose list of photographs includes some excellent portraits of the various members of the Royal Family, as well as other distinguished personages.

HOME.

Political Affairs.—An account of the Reception of Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury in the City on Saturday last will be found in "Our Illustrations" columns.—On Friday, Lord Salisbury received at the Foreign Office a deputation, representing the Conservative Associations of South-East Lancashire and the City of Manchester, who presented him with a congratulatory address, in replying to which his lordship said that popular approval was not built up on a minute and curious scrutiny of details, but on broad general principles, upon which latter the Government had acted.—On Tuesday, another deputation, consisting of 900 gentleman bearing addresses from Conservative Associations from all parts of the country, were received by the Premier and Lord Salisbury, who spent nearly an hour in shaking hands with them. Both Ministers spoke in acknowledgment of the congratulations they had received, the Earl of Beaconsfield remarking that he hoped they had brought back not merely an honourable peace, but also the settlement of a great many disquieting subjects which had for years caused anxiety to the civilised world. He afterwards pointed out the necessity for party organisation, remarking that it was a great error to suppose that opinion when organised lost something of its genuineness and force. Lord Salisbury said that amidst the constant calumny to which they had had to submit, the Plenipotentiaries felt sure the time would come when they would obtain an equitable and intelligent recognition from the country they had served.—The London and Westminster Working Men's Constitutional Association held a demonstration on Monday in Englefield Park, near Reading, the seat of Mr. Benyon, ex-M.P. for Berkshire, and passed resolutions expressive of confidence in the Government. On the same day there were Conservative gatherings at Bournemouth and at Peamore.—On Wednesday Sir Edward Hertslet, C.B., was entertained at dinner at Richmond in recognition of his recent services at the Berlin Congress. Replying to the toast of his health, he said that the Earl of Beaconsfield went to Berlin not alone with his reputation as a statesman, but with his life in his hand, letters threatening assassination having been sent him before he left London—More letters have passed between Mr. Gladstone and Captain Burnaby. The ex-Premier admits that the Captain's citations are perfectly fair, but assures him that he has never described Russia as "the torch-bearer of civilisation," but simply said that "Russia carried the torch of civilisation amidst barrels of gunpowder." The Captain retorts that this seems to him an exemplification of the old adage that language was given to man to enable him to disguise his thoughts, and pungently remarks that be recognises in Mr. Gladstone's letter "his well-known hatred of verbal quibbles."—The Marquis of Lorne has written to his constituents, resigning his seat in Parliament, remarking that he does so only because, through the favour of the Queen, he has now an opportunity of serving a country most dear to all in the United Kingdom. Lord Colin Campbell, a younger brother of the Marquis, is a candidate for the seat. His politics, he says, are those which his family have held for many generations, politics guided by the principle that moderate changes, made cautiously on the ancient lines, are the best means of maintaining and strengthening the institutions of the country. He adds that he is in favour of extending the county franchise, and that he regards with anxiety any arrangement which can bind this country to support the Turkish Government in the anticipation that it can be effectually reformed.

Miscellaneous.——St. Lubbock was very generally worshipped on Monday last, and as the weather held fine during the greater part of the day the pleasure-seekers must have enjoyed themselves greatly. The theatres, parks, gardens, and popular places of resort in the suburbs had their full share of patronage, whilst by road, river, and rail, thousands of nature-loving tourists got as far as possible from the noise and smoke of the Modern Babylon. There was a railway accident at New Cross, and another at Stepney, on the Great Eastern line, in each of which a number of persons were slightly injured; and on the Thames at Lambeth four lads lost their lives by the upsetting of a boat. The day was also observed at many place in the provinces, the borough of Wigan holding high festival over the opening of a public park.—On Saturday, the Duke of Cambridge, in his capacity of Ranger of Regent's Park, opened the new Gloucester Gate Bridge, and at the subsequent luncheon, after commenting on the beauty and utility of the bridge, he spoke of the Indian Contingent which he had recently reviewed at Malta, saying that they deserved well of their country, for they had largely aided in the preservation of the peace of Europe.—On the same day Sir James Hogg opened a part of the new street running from Oxford Street to Bethnal Green, and laid the first stone of the new offices of the Holborn District Board of Works, which is to be erected at the corner of Liquorpond Street and Gray's Inn Road.—On Saturday, the steamer Napoli, the first of a line from London to Larnaca, started from Gravesend, and the passengers sent the following telegram to the Queen: "A few loyal subjects, passengers on board the Napoli, being the first steamer sailing from the river Thames to your newly-acquired Island of Cyprus, beg leave to tender their respectful homage before leaving."—The millenary celebration of the signing of the Treaty of Peace between Alfred the Great and Guthrum, on the defeat of the Danes at the Battle of Edingorth, in the year 878, was celebrated on Wednesday at Wedmore, near Weston-super-Mare.—There is some talk of enclosing Clerkenwell Green, but the project is denounced as an attempt to rob the people of the only place in which they can meet without expense to discuss their grievances, and it is threatened that the railings will be pulled down as soon as erected.—Much damage has been done in various places in the country by the thunderstorms which have prevailed during the last few days. At Morley, near Leeds, on Tuesday, a powder magazine was struck by lightning and exploded, and several persons were badly injured, but no lives lost.—On Wednesday great damage was done to the proof-butts at Woolwich by a fire, which is supposed to have been caused by one of the powder-tubes escaping unburnt from the gun, and igniting after reaching the butts, which are solid timber structures filled with sand.



PARLIAMENT

The conclusion of the debate on the Eastern Question might reasonably have been expected to leave the House of Commons in no mind for fresh work. We have already reached the limits of a Session unprecedented in point of length since the Abyssinian War. Not much substantial work has been done, but the strain upon all concerned has been very great. There have been late sittings, protracted debates, and animated scenes, all culminating in a week of steady debate upon the foreign policy of the Government, which began at five o'clock on Monday, concluding, with the interval of Wednesday, at half-past two on Saturday morning. But the mere fact that there has been so much talk accounts for the considerable balance of work which must be done. In the present week and during next week more real work will be done than has been accomplished in any preceding section of six weeks. The circumstances of the House are at this time of the Session highly favourable to getting work through. The gentlemen who have borne the heat and burden of the fight of words begin to disappear when the day of prorogation comes within the distance of a fortnight. The attraction of Parliament to them is the opportunity for making long speeches on subjects which attract public attention. These being exhausted, or the interest of the public exhausted, these gentlemen anticipate the prorogation, and are already scattered far and wide in search of the rest which none would give them more gladly than those who are bound to listen to them.

In addition to these there is another section of members who take their chief delight in work. Of such is the remarkable man, familiarly known as "the Admiral," but officially styled Sir William Edmonstone, the member for Stirlingshire. The object of the Admiral's Parliamentary and political ambition is to occupy the first place in the Buff Book which records the respective attendances at divisions. It is probable that the Admiral will come out first, his chance being made by the fact that a fortnight ago, when Lord Beaconsfield was making his speech in the Lords, on his return from the Congress, Sir William Dyke was accidentally shut out from the division lobby, not having time to scamper back to the House of Commons. The Admiral is always in his place, and will sit till any hour in the morning. Endowed with the possession of a stentorian voice, the Ministers never lack a cheer. He can always be depended upon to help to make a House, or to sit till any hour in the morning to pass through a Bill, the only difficulty experienced with him being on the occasions when it has been to the interest of the Government to count out the House. To get the Admiral out under such circumstances has demanded much tact and insistance. But these are the only circumstances under which he has been known to express an opinion of his own. The Admiral is a type perhaps a little exaggerated, not in description but in fact, of some fifty or sixty members who respond to the Ministerial whip. This compact little body can be got together and kept together to do anything in the way of advancing the business of the nation, and during this week their fidelity has been severely tried. They were hard put to it on Saturday morning, when, after the exhausting division and the exciting debate, it was quietly proposed from the Treasury bench to go on with the Scotch business. It was no use protesting against this. Moreover, it was felt that since the Scotch business must be disposed of, and as time was growing short, the opportunity here made was not to be thrown away. Irish members would probably have commenced a series of motions for the adjournment. The Scotch members, after an ineffectual protest, buckled to, and it was twenty minutes past four in the morning before the House adjourned. During the early days of the current week the same devotion to work has been required at the hands of the faithful few. On Monday Supply was the first order of the day. But the approach to Committee was barricaded by a long succession of notices of motion. These were so many and so miscellaneous that the Government thought no one could be serious, and had expected forthwith to get into Committee. Their delusion was, however, removed by Mr. Gorst, a gentleman who sits on their own side of the House, and who displays quite exceptional and altogether inconvenient notions of independence. Mr. Gorst, who seems to have many sympathies in common with hon. gentlemen who sit immediately opposite him, had placed on the paper a notice to call attention to the execution of a native of Tanna on board H.M.S. Beagle. This is a matter which has throughout the Session been exercising the mind of gentlemen like Mr. Evelyn Ashley, Mr. Alderman M'Arthur, and other hon. members in that part of the House whose belief that a dark-skinned native is a man and a brother is something more than an expression. Other notices had been given, but had not succeeded in finding a place. Mr. Gorst, more successful, brought the case forward on Monday, and as it turned out it might have been settled in half-an-hour if the First Lord of the Admiralty had only chanced to follow the member for Chatham. But unfortunately the Attorney-General was put up as the mouthpiece of the Government, and another proof was added to the long list which supports the curious statement that the Attorney-General has never opened his lips from the Treasury Bench without seriously damaging the Government. On Monday he made a most extraordinary speech, admitting nothing, defending everything, and, as Sir William Harcourt said, speaking more like a counsel for a prisoner at the Old Bailey than a Minister of the Crown discussing a Constitutional question. This unfortunate speech had the effect of rousing the whole of the Opposition, and member after member rose, including the ex-Attorney-General and the ex-Solicitor-General. After the affair had gone on for fully three hours, Mr. W. H. Smith rose and announced that the very thing which Mr. Gorst had urged had actually been done. A circular had been sent out by the Admiralty, instructing officers in command of ships as to their course of conduct under circumstances similar to those in which the commander of the Beagle found himself. Of course this settled the matter, and the motion was by consent negatived. But to this hour it remains a mystery why the Attorney-General should have stepped in; and why Mr. Smith, feeling the urgency in point of time, should have remained so long silent.

Even yet the House was not allowed to approach Committee, Sir George Campbell having something to say about silver currency, Sir Charles Dilke about Perak, and Mr. Evelyn Ashley about slavery. Then Lord George Hamilton made his statement on introducing the Education Estimate, which led to a long debate, to which Mr. Gladstone, in spite of having paired for the Session, contributed a speech. It was one o'clock in the morning before the money began really to be voted, and having once tasted this gratification, Ministers were not to be denied their full share. They kept the House literally all through the night, the day breaking before their patience and perseverance were exhausted. The business of this night is the history of the week. Estimates have been taken on every day. There have been long speeches on controversial matters, and then, when the speakers have been worn out, the Government have turned on their mechanical force, and, by sitting late, have got many votes.

On Tuesday night the rare and mysterious penalty of "naming" a member was inflicted by the Speaker. The culprit was Major O'Gorman. While Colonel Stanley was speaking, the Major interrupted almost every sentence of his speech with a stentorian "Hear, hear." When called upon to apologise, he declined, and insisted that he was within his rights, and might, if he chose, fling in a "Hear, hear" after every comma and semicolon of Colonel Stanley's statement. The result was that he was "named," and ordered to attend in the House the following day. On Wednesday, in obedience to the summons, the gallant Major appeared in his usual place below the gangway, and, observing that he had acted "under the greatest possible exasperation" (produced, it is understood, by affairs unconnected with the debate in question), expressed the deepest regret for his conduct. His apology was cordially received by the House, and so all ended pleasantly.

The End of the World is confidently expected by the Indian Wahabees on the 11th of next July. A certain priest in the Mosque at Medina has recently been visited by the Prophet Mahomet, who laments the degeneracy of his followers, and attributes the late droughts and famine to the neglect of his precepts, and to the apathy and corruption of the judges who govern his people. Since his admission to Paradise, the Prophet adds, only seven Mussulmans have attained to eternal bliss. Accordingly, so unsatisfactory is the present state of things that Allah has decided that the sun shall rise in the west instead of the east on July 11th, and on that day all who call themselves true believers shall be struck with blindness, and dissolution shall immediately follow. This warning is detailed in a proclamation posted in nearly every mosque in Northern India, and the priest favoured with the Prophet's visit declares "if there be a word of falsehood in what I have stated let my face be blackened for ever."

The Sale of Ex-Queen Isabella's Jewels has been concluded this week in Paris, the proceeds amount to 137,480*l.*

Mr. Darwin has been elected a Corresponding Member of the Botanical Section of the French Académie des Sciences in the place of the late Mr. Weddell, of Poitiers.

Jan Van Eyck, the old Flemish artist, who first brought painting in oils into practical use, is to be commemorated at Bruges by a statue, which will be unveiled by the King of the Belgians on the 18th inst.

The First Lady Lawyer in Switzerland who has ever obtained the degree of Docteur en Droit has just successfully passed her examination. Mdlle. Fanny Berline comes from St. Petersburg, and has been studying at the Berne University.

A Novel Hive has been adopted by some Yorkshire bees, according to the Live Stock Journal. Two hives of bees were being taken along a street in Leeds last week, when a swarm flew out, and took possession of a street lamp, from which all attempts to dislodge them have hitherto failed.

The Free Opening of the Grosvenor Gallery on Saturdays and Sundays has been highly appreciated by the humbler classes. More tickets were applied for than could be issued, and on Saturday and Sunday last 3,500 and 2,000 persons respectively passed the turnstile, all the Sunday visitors being admitted by tickets obtained by application to the Sunday Society.

The Voyage Round the World which has been projected in France for the last 18 months, and to which we have already alluded has at length been undertaken, and the Juno started from Marseilles for Gibraltar last week for an eleven months' tour. She is an English built steamer of 1,150 tons and 580 horse-power, carries 20 passengers, two reporters, a number of professors and the necessary officials, and is admirably fitted up both for pleasure and scientific purposes.

The Paris Salon will close on the 10th inst., having remained open some six weeks longer than usual. This has been a most disastrous season for the Salon, as, owing to the superior attractions of the Exhibition, few people have visited the Palais de l'Industrie, and still fewer have bought anything, so that many artists who look on the annual Salon as a sure harvest, cannot afford to undertake any large picture for next year. The models are still worse off, and wander vainly from studio to studio, while many have returned to Italy in despair.

Chinese in the United States have some reason to complain that the boasted Republican equality is in many cases preached and not practised. Thus a Chinaman who had lived for twenty-eight years in New York has been refused naturalisation as an American citizen on the plea that the earlier naturalisation laws alluded only to white persons, and the later laws only made exception in favour of persons of African descent. So the Chinaman, being a Mongolian, or of the yellow race, is neither white nor black enough to vote. Certainly not a "happy medium."

Exhibition Souvenirs continue to be the rage in Paris, and while humble visitors content themselves with a penny medal, a twopenny fan bearing a plan or picture of the buildings, or a pen, paper-knife, or tiny opera-glass, containing microscopic views, wealthy Parisiennes wear the "Exhibition Bracelet," a gold circlet, ornamented by a representation of the Trocadéro in bas-relief, and pierced with innumerable holes, through which can be seen minute pictures of the gardens and the animals illustrating the four quarters of the globe.

An Ordination of Buddhist Priests is held every year at Kooshan, in China, on the eve of the great teacher's supposed birthday, and a correspondent of the Foochow Herald notes the ceremonies on the occasion. The candidates for Holy Orders, each attended by two priests, knelt before tables which stood about the temple, and on their shaven heads were placed from three to a dozen lighted pastilles of incense, which were left to burn into the flesh. Meanwhile the priests recited texts, and in twenty minutes the ordination was over. Another priest, anxious to become a Buddha himself, was standing before the three great images of the deity, quietly burning his finger off, and hoped that, when two more of his fingers had been consumed by slow degrees, he would have obtained his object. The baptism of a fresh image of Sakya-Muni by some eighty Buddhist priests concluded the ceremonies.

The American "Nautilus" has safely accomplished her adventurous trip across the Atlantic, and arrived off the Lizard last week, bad weather having obliged her to put into an English port instead of going on to Havre. The voyage from Boston occupied forty-five days, and was enlivened by a rough sea and foggy weather, but all went well with the passengers, two brothers named Andrewes, genuine Americans of twenty-five and thirty, who are respectively a joiner and pianoforte maker, and who had never before been to sea beyond coasting in fishing boats. The Nautilus is somewhat larger than the City of Ragusa, which accomplished a similar feat a few years ago; her length is 19ft., and breadth 6 ft. 7 in., while she draws 6½ in. of water, and is decked, with a small aperture cut for entrance. She has now left for Havre, whence she will travel down the Seine to the Paris Exhibition.

M. Victor Hugo at Home is amusingly sketched in a recent volume by M. Gustave Rivet, a Parisian author, who gives some interesting details of the poet's style of working. M. Hugo never devotes himself to one book alone, he has always four or five subjects in hand, and rarely knows which he shall finish first. In the morning he sets to work at whatever subject takes his fancy, and after giving a few hours to poetry, he will turn to a novel after lunch, and finish the day by writing on an entirely different theme from that of the morning. Thus M. Hugo has now six prose works in progress—"Torquemada," "Les Jumeaux," "La Grandmère," "L'Epée," "Frère de Gavroche," "La Forêt Mouillée," as well as four poems—"Les Quatre Vents de l'Esprit," "Toute la Lyre," "Les Colères Justes," and "L'Année Funeste." "Ninety-three" was the only exception to this method of composition, M. Hugo having shut himself up in Guernsey for six whole months of steady labour on this one book. M. Hugo's geniality towards strangers in his Guernsey home laid him open to many inquisitive visits. Thus, one tourist calling on the poet, prolonged his call to an unconscionable length, and though the conversation flagged and finally dropped altogether, he still sat as though waiting for something. M. Hugo guessed that his visitor wanted to carry away some poetic phrase which he might repeat, so opening the window looking on to the sea he exclaimed, "You perceive, sir, I am here on the first tier of immensity." The stranger was satisfied, bowed, and at once took his leave.

FOREIGN

The Eastern Question.——The Austrian occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina is being energetically continued, but in some places the Austrians are meeting with considerable opposition, and there have been several serious encounters and some bloodshed—the insurgents showing no small aptitude for entrapping the invaders into ambuscades. The resistance it is thought is fanned by the Montenegrins, by the fanatical party in Constantinople, and in some degree it is said by the Russians, as the St. Petersburg press has shown itself eminently hostile throughout towards the occupation of the provinces by the Austrians. The most serious encounter recorded as yet has taken place between Maglai and Zepce, whither Marshal Philippovic had despatched a reconnoitring expedition under Captain Millinkovic. Arriving, on August 2, at Maglai, the Austrians were well received, but on nearing Zepce they were assailed by a heavy volley of musketry, which forced them to withdraw to Maglai, where they found the aspect of the people wholly changed. As Maglai is situated in a defile, they were forced to pass through the town, and the inhabitants, shutting themselves up in their houses, poured a terrible cross fire upon the troops, killing upwards of seventy. The advance of the main body, under General Philippovic, is extremely slow owing to the heavy rains, which render the roads almost impassable, and by swelling the torrents destroy the bridges, which have to be repaired before the march can be resumed. Considerable progress is being made, however, and a terrible revenge is expected to be taken upon the treacherous denizens of Maglai. Another sharp engagement occurred on Monday at a sharp turn in the River Bosna north of Kosna, when the troops were assailed by a brisk fire from a large body of some 1,500 insurgents, who had taken up their positions on a declivity overlooking the valley. They were, however, ultimately dislodged and driven back. At Gracanica also there has been a two hours' engagement, while to turn farther south, on Sunday there was a battle with 500 insurgents near Citluk in the Herzegovina, in which the Austrians were wholly successful. On Monday the Austrians, under General Theodorovitch, peacefully occupied Mostar, the Herzegovinian capital—a piece of good fortune that had not been expected, as the town was reported to be in a state of anarchy, and, indeed, the Kaimakan and his adjoints were found to have been massacred by the insurgents. Serajevo (Bosna Serai), the Bosnian capital, however, is now completely under the rule of Hadji Loja, the fanatical Dervish insurgent chief, who is calling together all the insurgents to oppose the Austrians, and who has declared the city subject to the religious and civil rule of the Koran. It is this fact that has given rise to the suspicion that the Porte is tacitly exciting the insurgents, more especially as the Sheik-ul-Islam is known to be warmly opposed to the occupation, and is even said to have sent emissaries to rouse up the fanatical feelings of the population. There is no doubt whatever that the relations between the Porte and the Vienna Cabinet are in an extreme state of tension, and it is said that Caratheodori Pasha has been instructed to insist that a term of years shall be fixed for the Austrian occupation, and, should this request be denied, to at once return to Constantinople.

In the Turkish capital itself there is as usual a division in the Council, the war party doing their utmost to overthrow Safvet Pasha, whose influence with the Sultan, however, has at present prevailed over all their intrigues. Considerable irritation is expressed with Austria for her promptness in undertaking the occupation before the Convention was signed, and there are innumerable rumours of what the Porte does and does not intend to adopt. The Russians are still at San Stefano, and, notwithstanding that they are being decimated by disease, they appear in no hurry to leave their quarters, though it is said that the Ambassador has promised that the troops shall be withdrawn as soon as Varna and Batoum have been surrendered. With regard to Varna, many of the most important works have already been given up, but as to Batoum, notwithstanding a courteous reminder from the Russian Government, the Porte has as yet taken no steps in that direction. Some Bulgarian prisoners who were being conveyed in an Austrian steamer from Varna to Constantinople have been detained by the Austrian captain, who declines to deliver them up; the Turkish authorities, however, declare that they are purely criminal, and not political offenders.—The Commander of the British Fleet and General Dixon have dined with the Sultan.—General Todleben has expressed his regret at the firing on the British man-o'-war's boat in the Gulf of Saros, and explains that the Cossacks arrested the officers because they were in civil dress.—The International Commissioners in the Rhodope district are busily investigating the asserted Russo-Bulgarian atrocities, and the Russian Commissioner has returned to Constantinople, declaring that his colleagues are searching for Russian excesses rather than examining into the best means of pacifying the district, and arranging for the return of the refugees as directed by the Berlin Congress.

The ratifications of the Berlin Treaty were exchanged at the Radziwill Palace, Berlin, on Saturday. As the Turkish ratification had not arrived, the Ottoman Ambassador made a declaration that the Sultan had performed the act of ratification, and that thenceforward he would recognise the validity of the Treaty.

In Cyprus, General Wolseley is rapidly carrying out his work of organisation, and Civil Commissioners and garrisons have already been appointed to the five provinces—Limasol, Famagosta, Kernia, Paphos, and Larnaca. The blue-jackets, also, have been relieved at Nicosia by the 2nd Ghoorkas and the Engineers, but according to a Times telegram the Indian troops are complaining of garrison-work out of India, and want to return home. They will, it is thought, be sent back in October.

France.——The forthcoming Senatorial elections of January next, when a third of the elected Senatorial body will be renewed, are already exciting considerable attention, and the Republicans have sent out circulars urging the deputies, and provincial and municipal councillors, who form the elective body, to return Liberal candidates, and thus, by giving the Republic a tangible majority in the Senate, to avoid the chance of any future conflict between the two Houses, and consolidate the Republican form of Government. These elections will certainly be of the greatest importance. Should the Left obtain a decided majority in the Upper House, it will be a death-blow to the hopes of the Conservatives, who, as their aid will no longer be required by the Republicans, will thenceforward have very little influence upon the conduct of affairs. There seems little doubt, also, that the Republicans will obtain a majority, for the Conservatives, being split into three parties, are anything but homogeneous, and only combine on the eve of a battle when it is too late to adopt any joint line of action. Moreover, the municipal delegates are mainly Republican, and the circulars of the Left have been opportunely issued at a time when, as the Councils-General are about to meet for their summer session, electoral prospects will not unnaturally be busily discussed. The Conservatives also are forming committees, but have not yet adopted any decided policy.

Paris is in despair, as her cabmen have struck, and her omnibus service, ever over-crowded, is far from being equal to the emergency. For once considerable sympathy is felt for the men, who are all employed by the "Compagnie des Petites Voitures," which hold the monopoly of the cab traffic of Paris, and which have raised the "average" which each cabman has to bring in to 32 francs—a rate which necessitates sixteen hours' constant work. Moreover, the cabmen complain that the horses are badly cared for, their bedding being composed, up to recently, of coal slag. This has since been changed for sawdust, but even this is almost always in a state of putrefaction. In the mean time, with the exception of a few vehicles driven by grooms and stable-helps, Paris is cab-less—a serious inconvenience in an over-crowded city possessing no underground railway, and with a great influx of travellers daily.—The crowds continue to flock to the Exhibition, which last Sunday was visited by 112,000 persons, and the receipts for the first three months have amounted to above 203,000*l.*, or nearly 8,000*l.* in excess of the receipts of the first four months of the Exhibition of 1867. The free organ concerts at the Trocadéro Hall began on Wednesday, when the hall was crowded to excess, some 3,000 persons being turned away from the doors. The captive balloon is equally popular, and on Sunday there were ten ascents, some 300 persons taking the opportunity of having a good bird's-eye view of Paris. Of these, 250 paid the fee of 20 francs. The distribution of the prizes of the Exhibition next month will be attended with great ceremony, and the Prince of Wales, and various other Royal visitors, are expected to be present.—There are no theatrical novelties this week, nor is there any social news of any outside interest, beyond the award of the Prix de Monthyon (a prize of virtue, value 100*l.*) to the Abbé Roussel, and the Prix de Rome to M. Edmond Grasset, a young painter of some twenty-six years. The subject this year is Cato of Utica, despairing of the success of the Republic, preparing to kill himself. Feeling the point of his sword, and finding it sufficiently sharp, he exclaims, "Now I am my own master."

Germany.——The official returns of the election show that the Conservatives (amongst whom, be it said, are many and diverse shades) have carried the largest number of candidates, and that they now number 112 against 77 in the last Parliament. The Liberals only muster 106 against 176, and the Socialists 2 against 12. The Ultramontanes are 92 strong, having gained one, while the Guelphs, Poles, Danes, and Alsatian opposition remain the same—26; the Alsatian Loyalists, however, numbering four against five. There are, however, sixty-one elections to be decided by a second ballot, which may yet change the face of affairs. A Congress of German Finance Ministers is being held at Heidelberg, the chief subject deliberated being the state of the German revenue, which last year fell some 750,000*l.* short of the estimate, and the deficit had to be made up with the French occupation money. The rumour that the interviews between Prince Bismarck and Monsignor Masella, the Pontifical Nuncio, have led to some arrangement between the Prussian Government and the Vatican, are gaining ground, although it is difficult to understand how any such arrangement can tally with the sentiments so decidedly expressed in the Crown Prince's letter declining to abrogate the Falk Laws. The Emperor is still at Teplitz, is greatly improving in health, and has received a visit from the Emperor of Austria. The Emperor William will probably prolong his stay, and not go back to Berlin in time for the Princess Marie's wedding. His would-be assassin, Dr. Dr. Nobiling, is also recovering from his wounds at Berlin, and has again attempted suicide, this time by cutting his arteries with a pair of scissors left by an incautious attendant on his pillow.

India.——The weather reports still continue encouraging, and all anxiety concerning the Bombay Presidency is at an end. In Madras the number on the relief works is decreasing, and if the favourable weather which has set in continues for some time longer, no fears need be entertained of a renewed famine. The salt duty has been reduced in Bengal, and there is now a uniform duty through the greater part of British India of two rupees eight annas per maund.

Miscellaneous.——The late Queen of Spain is to be commemorated by the erection of a magnificent basilica, towards which 9,000*l.* a year is to be furnished out of the Civil List; while ex-Queen Isabella has, at the request of her son, contributed her jewels at Atocha towards the expenses. The rumours of King Alfonso's bad health are contradicted.—Switzerland is rejoicing at having obtained the grand diploma of honour for her horological display at the Paris Exhibition, while the Americans have only been awarded a gold medal.—In Hungary considerable alarm has been excited in Ministerial circles through the defeat of the Minister Tisza, and the general success of the Kossuth party in the recent elections.—Italy is mourning the death of Cardinal Franchi, the Pontifical Secretary of State, who has been succeeded by Cardinal Antonio de Luca, a man of seventy-two years of age.—From Egypt we hear that the Nile is rising rapidly and favourably, and, although somewhat late, is satisfactory for every crop except cotton.—The great fire at Mundalay (Burmah), which threatened to consume the whole city, has been extinguished with the loss of 4,750 houses.—In South Africa affairs are rapidly becoming quiet and Sandilli's brother has surrendered unconditionally.

THE COURT

The principal members of the Royal Family are now assembled in the Isle of Wight. The Queen was joined at Osborne on Saturday by Prince Leopold, and the young Princes and Princesses of Wales, who had been staying with Her Majesty, went to Portsmouth to meet their father and mother on their way to Cowes. In the evening Admiral Fanshawe dined with the Queen. Next morning Divine Service was performed at Osborne before Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice, and Lord John Manners and the Rev. G. Connor joined the Royal party at dinner in the evening. On Monday, the Queen gave audience to Lord John Manners, who afterwards left Osborne, and in the afternoon Prince Leopold went out in the Alberta, and steamed round the Eurydice in Sandown Bay. The Princess of Wales and her children visited Her Majesty on Tuesday morning.—The Queen drove to Sandown Bay last week and inspected the wreck of the Eurydice, and the works in progress. Her Majesty and the Princess Beatrice will leave Osborne for Scotland about the 19th inst.

The Prince and Princess of Wales concluded their visit to Goodwood at the end of last week, spent a night in town, and left for the Isle of Wight on Saturday evening. They went on board the Osborne at Portsmouth, where they were joined by their children, and anchored in Cowes Roadstead. The Prince was present at the House Dinner at the Yacht Squadron Castle on Monday evening, and his yacht the Hildegarde with the Prince on board was amongst the competitors for the Queen's Cup on Tuesday. The Hildegarde, however, failed to obtain a place, a sudden gust when the vessel was off Osborne House doing her some little damage, and thus impairing her speed. The Prince and Princess and their children watched the usual display of fireworks in the evening.—The Prince and Princess visit Southampton next week to lay the memorial stone of St. Mary's Church, and at the end of the month the Prince and Princess will go to Abergeldie. A hut for the convenience of the Prince while deer-stalking at Lochnagar has been built at Allyguisach. In September the Prince goes again to Paris to be present at the prize distribution at the Exhibition, and also to witness a review at Vincennes.—The Prince and Princess have sent a donation of 105*l.* to the Maintenance Fund of the London Hospital.

The Duke of Edinburgh remains at Cyprus in the Black Prince. Tuesday was the Duke's thirty-fourth birthday.—The Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne have gone to Kissingen. They stopped at Frankfort on their way, and were visited by the Imperial Prince and Princess of Germany, who are staying at Homburg.—The Duke of Connaught was at the Court Theatre on Tuesday. The Duke and Prince Leopold have been elected honorary members of the Grand Lodge of Freemasons of Scotland.

The ex-Empress Eugénie is in Vienna, where she has been visited by the Emperor and Crown Prince, and has dined at the Imperial Palace. From Vienna she goes to Arenenberg, and will be joined there by Prince Louis Napoleon, who is still on his Scandinavian trip. The Prince has been staying with the Swedish Royal Family at Christiania, and accompanied the Crown Prince to the silver mines at Kongsberg and to the Telemarken, the Swedish Switzerland.—The Crown Princess of Denmark gave birth to a daughter last week, and is not progressing very favourably.—The Prince and Princess of Joinville have made the ascent of Mont Blanc.

THEATRES

We had occasion to notice some time ago the production of a new comedy, entitled Auld Lang Syne, written by Mr. G. L. Gordon, and brought out at the Park Theatre. Mr. Gordon is better known in the provinces than in London. He is a young actor who, at present at least, aspires to walk in the footsteps of Mr. Byron; accordingly, he not only writes plays, but is careful in every case to provide himself with a prominent part specially designed, as it would appear, to afford him opportunities for the utterance of puns and humorous observations, sometimes relevant, but more often wholly irrelevant to the story of the piece, or the particular scene which is for the time being in progress. Mr. Byron's method is very well known; it consists chiefly in imagining a character which, though not strictly belonging to the play, is rarely absent from any of the scenes. The excuses for his appearances are various, but under all conditions the object is the same. Sometimes this hanger-on of the plot is simply a good-natured meddler, sometimes a trusty and devoted friend of the hero and heroine; but come when he will he has always something to say, and as a rule his observations do not fail to provoke laughter. In all this, so far at least as intention extends, Mr. Gordon follows Mr. Byron in the very minutest particular. He too is content to be a hanger-on of the plot, so long as he can secure the ear of the audience; but unfortunately when Mr. Gordon speaks his efforts to amuse are not always successful. To tell the truth, his witticisms are very often of a poor and obvious kind, and sometimes his sentiments are a little vulgar; these faults, moreover, are aggravated by the circumstance that when he has to deliver an elaborately silly observation, he delivers it with a certain deliberation and emphasis indicating a confidence in his own power to amuse which is not justified by the result. With all these faults, however, there is promise in Mr. Gordon's productions; nor is his acting wholly devoid of merit. His comedy, as we pointed out at the time of its production, exhibited at least some knowledge of what will produce effect on the stage; and some power of delineating character. Unhappily these qualities, though not wholly wanting in his second venture, produced on Saturday evening at the same theatre, are not in this instance exhibited in the same degree. Mr. Gordon's latest production, which bears the title of A Treaty of Peace, is a sort of combination of comedy and melodrama in which traces of reminiscences of various successful plays may easily be detected. The groundwork is clearly derived from the late Mr. Robertson's Ours; a situation at the end of the second act, in which a lady is unjustly charged with unpatriotic and perfidious conduct, awakens recollections of M. Sardou's Dora; the incident of the marriage which is null and void because the parties are respectively members of the Roman Catholic and the Anglican Church, and have omitted to go through a double ceremony, is one which Mr. Wilkie Collins, taking a hint probably from the Yelverton trial, has made familiar; while the melodramatic ruses and surprises which are supplied in liberal quantity may be said to be the common property of suburban dramatists. Of the plot of Mr. Gordon's drama it is enough to say that it is a story of the Crimean War, opening in England and concluding in the trenches of Balaclava. Mr. Gordon's appearance in the piece—such as it is—arises out of the notion of a newspaper correspondent, who, being intimately acquainted with the military hero, naturally follows him to the Crimea. Of the style of this journalist some notion may be derived from his observation that "A Russian suggests a Tartar, and a Tartar suggests a tart, and a tart suggests piecrust, and piecrust is like Russian promises, made to be broken." The sentiments with which the play is liberally stocked are creditable to Mr. Gordon's patriotism, if not to his wit and good sense; but A Treaty of Peace, with its bewildering accumulation of impossible incidents, cannot be called a good play, though it is provided by the management with picturesque and effective scenery.

Unfortunately we are called upon to record the production of a still less satisfactory drama, which, under the title of That's Why She Loved Him, has been brought out at the Aquarium Theatre for the special entertainment of Bank Holiday audiences. The author of this play is Mr. Such Granville, a gentleman who, like Mr. Gordon, both writes for the stage, and takes as a rule a part in his own plays. Mr. Granville is but little known to playgoers, a circumstance which must be attributed to the somewhat brief duration of his appearances, which are as a rule confined to the dullest season of the theatrical year. His play is a tedious and absurd production, unredeemed by any freshness of invention, or gleam of wit, and not supported by any talent worth mentioning in the performance.

The GAIETY has rarely been closed since it first opened, but this year a temporary suspension of the performances has been deemed necessary for the purpose of redecorating and improving the interior. The interregnum, however, is already over; the Gaiety is once more open, brilliantly decorated without by the latest developments of the art of lighting by electricity which Mr. Hollingshead has brought with him from Paris, and renovated and redecorated within, with excellent taste. Improved arrangements have also been made for the comfort of visitors—a matter in which this popular house enjoys an unrivalled reputation. Miss E. Farren, Mr. Terry, Mr. Royce, Miss Vaughan, and all the other leading performers of Mr. Hollingshead's company, reappeared here on Monday in The Grasshopper, and Mr. Byron's burlesque of Faust, the performance of which was witnessed by a crowded and enthusiastic audience.

A clever little musical sketch, satirising the china mania, and bearing the title of Cups and Saucers, has been added to the attractions of the OPERA COMIQUE, where Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's comic opera, H.M.S. Pinafore, is enjoying, notwithstanding the hot weather, a scarcely diminished popularity. The author, composer, and principal performer of Cups and Saucers is Mr. George Grossmith, jun.

Mr. Tom Taylor's interesting domestic drama, Mary Warner, has been revived at the LYCEUM after an interval of eight years. Miss Bateman (Mrs. Crowe) is as forcible as ever in her delineation of the much-enduring heroine, and she was excellently supported by Mr. Billington as George Warner, by Mr. Fernandez as the real culprit, Bob Leavitt, and by Miss Virginia Francis, as Leavitt's unfortunate wife. Mr. E. Lyons and Mr. Pinero also deserve a good word for the manner in which they respectively portrayed a good-natured prison warder and a police magistrate, while "Little Nellie" (though we are sorry that at her tender age she should be kept up every night till past eleven) is a very engaging baby actress as little Mary Warner. Mr. Pinero's farce, Two Can Play at that Game, which precedes the drama, is a smart little affair.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——The Sussex fortnight, as it is called by followers of the turf, comprising Goodwood, Brighton, and Lewes Meetings, concludes this week, the racing being prolonged, as is usual at Lewes, till Saturday afternoon. The weather, on the whole, has been very favourable, making the sojourn on the south coast most enjoyable; but it can hardly be said that the racing has been quite up to the mark. The concluding days at Goodwood, like the opening ones, were marked by walks-over and small fields; while the race for the Cup was about the poorest affair of its kind witnessed for many a year. For this we could only bring to the post two animals to oppose the Austro-Hungarian mare Kincsem, one being Pageant, an animal which, we believe, has never won a weight-for-age race, and the other Lady Golightly, who could never be considered actually first-class, though she has done some smartish things. The foreigner had an easy victory, and the result is little short of a disgrace to the English turf. However, there is no saying how good Kincsem may really be; but we do know that she has now won thirty-seven races without a single defeat being recorded against her; and this cannot be said of any horse which ever trod the turf. To the credit of Goodwood, it may be added that the two-year-olds which performed there showed more than average class. At Brighton the fields were hardly as large as might have been expected from the entries. Honours were pretty equally divided on the first day between favourites and non-favourites, and, consequently, accounts between backers and bookmakers. Little Harry was taken against three others for the Bristol Plate, but he could only finish third; and the two favourites for the Stakes, Shillelagh and Rhidorroch, could not get a place between them in the small field of six, the winner turning up in Don Carlos, whose previous running justified his being the least fancied of the party. The Marine Stakes, always a popular sprint race, produced just a dozen runners, and in this Dunmow, who was equally favourite with King David, was successful. Ventnor, another favourite, won the Patcham Stakes; and, on the next day, the Pavilion Stakes, making the sixth race he has scored off the reel. The rich Corporation Stakes for two-year-olds fell to White Poppy, who got away with a good start and was never headed, the penalised Rayon d'Or, a winner at Goodwood last week, being second. Kaleidoscope in the colours of his new owner, Lord Rosebery, won the Ovingdean Stakes in gallant style; and Pageant made some amends for his defeat at Goodwood by securing the Cup for Mr. Gretton. For this Rhidorroch, by running second, showed far better form than he did in the Stakes on the previous day, when he was the absolute last. Placida, who seems still improving, had no difficulty in winning the Grand Stand Plate.—Croydon, on Monday, had a Bank Holiday Meeting instead of the usual meeting; and at Ripon some fair North Country horses have tried conclusions.

CRICKET.——Though the thunderstorms and heavy rain in some places have interfered with cricket, on the whole the weather has been favourable for it since our last notes. Gloucestershire and Nottinghamshire after a three days' fight had to make a draw of it. The most noticeable feature of the game was Mr. W. G. Grace's 116 in his second innings. He was at the wickets close on five hours and a half, and his score is the highest obtained by him this year.—Surrey, which in the previous match with Sussex a little while back proved victorious, has again beaten her antagonists at the Oval, winning by nine wickets.—The Canterbury week, with its private theatricals, balls, and social gatherings, has maintained its prestige, though the clashing with Cowes Regatta cause a slight diminution of company. Kent was in form, as became the occasion, and with her Thirteen beat All England, a very strong team, by eight wickets.

YACHTING.——According to annual custom the yachting at Cowes follows Goodwood. This week the racing is under the auspices of the Royal Yacht Squadron, and only vessels belonging to that fraternity can compete for the several prizes. Next week will be devoted to the contests promoted by the Royal Victoria Yacht Club, Ryde being head quarters. On Monday, at Cowes, Her Majesty's Cup for yachts of all classes was sailed for, eleven vessels, of which seven were schooners, joining in the fray. Additional interest was felt in the race, as the Prince of Wales, on board his own schooner Hildegarde, took part in it. She however lost her foretopmast near the Nab, and so was practically out of the race, which was eventually won by Mr. F. S. Stanley's Formosa, though the Enchantress came in a few minutes before her. On the second day the 100*l.* prize given by the Royal Yacht Squadron for yawls of not less than 30 tons of any "Royal" Club was won by the Jullanar. It was a splendid race, the Corisande coming in first, but Mr. Malley's craft winning by time allowance.

PIGEON SHOOTING.——The much-anticipated match for 500*l.* a side, between Mr. Aubrey Coventry and the redoubtable Captain Bogardus, came off on Tuesday, at Brighton, in the beautiful park of Mr. Benet-Stanford. The shooting was neck-and-neck all through, and at the ninety-seventh bird the Captain was only one in advance. As they each killed the rest of the hundred, the American became the winner by a single bird, the score being seventy-nine to seventy-eight. It is hardly necessary to say that there was a very large assemblage present, and that the excitement as the match progressed was intense.

CHURCH NEWS

CHURCH PATRONAGE.——In a sermon at Didsbury Parish Church on Sunday, the Bishop of Manchester spoke at considerable length on the question of purchase in the Church, with special reference to the parish of Didsbury. He said, "Let us acknowledge it to be a scandal, and try to remove it, but let us also thank God that the evil is much less than some suppose it to be. Clever writers, no doubt, can bring objections against every form of patronage; if it is in the patronage of the Lord Chancellor or the Premier it is said to be political; if it is in that of the Bishop, it is nepotism; if it is by trustees, it is partisan. And though to some minds patronage by the parishioners might seem to be most free from objection, I know of two instances where incumbents who were elected under that system were financially ruined by the cost of their election, and one of them was morally ruined; and the incidents have always been all those of political election. I have been asked, 'Why not adopt the congregational principle?' But the Church of England does not recognise the principle of congregations, and I should be sorry if it did. It recognises parishes, and choice by congregations would be impossible in the Church of England unless its constitution were utterly changed from what it now is." His lordship added that things were not much better amongst the Nonconformists.

VARIOUS.——The Archbishop of Canterbury has issued to the clergy of his diocese a recommendation that those who have during the past months prayed for peace should now—through the general thanksgiving—return thanks to God that their prayers have been thus far answered.—The Duke of Norfolk and Lord Denbigh, have been commissioned by the Pope to request the protection and assistance of the British Government, in case of need, for the missionaries who will be immediately despatched to promote education and religion in the island of Cyprus. The refugee priests from the provinces whence Russian cruelty expelled them will be the first chosen for the mission, especially as they are well acquainted with the language. They will introduce the Latin rites instead of the present Syro-Maronite, which have prevailed for the last 200 years.—A deputation of Irish Roman Catholics are about to make a journey to Rome for the purpose of presenting the Pope with the sum of 2,500*l.*, the "Peter's pence" offering of the archdiocese of Dublin.—On Friday last a meeting of the London Young Men's Christian Association, took place at the Institution in Aldersgate Street, to welcome a number of delegates from similar associations in America, who are now in this country on their way to Geneva, to attend a conference of members of Young Men's Christian Associations all over the world. Mr. S. Morley presided, and a number of addresses were delivered by the delegates. It was stated that the number of Young Men's Christian Associations in the United States was nearly 1,000.—A meeting in support of the missionary work carried on in the diocese of Maritzburg, Natal, was held on Tuesday at the Cannon Street Hotel, under the presidency of Mr. A. J. Beresford Hope, M.P. The Bishop of Maritzburg gave an account of efforts which has been made to extend Christianity in Natal; and resolutions advocating an extension of the work were adopted.—The Jewish Chronicle of Friday last announces the death on the previous Wednesday, of Dr. Abraham Benisch, who was for nearly a quarter of a century the editor of that journal. "With this bare statement of the fact (the present editor remarks) we are compelled to stay our pen—for it was the expressed injunction of the deceased that no 'obituary' of him should be published. Sympathetic hearts will share our sorrow and respect our silence."

New Music

MESSRS. STANLEY LUCAS, WEBER, AND CO.——Of four creditable songs, the music by B. Hollander, "Tu me demande, Riense," words by Emile Richepin, for a tenor, is the best. Next in order comes "Treuer Tod" (True until Death), words by Th. Körner, for a baritone; "Thou Standest Near," words by F. Ruperti; and "Ah, Si Vous Saviez," words by Sully Prudhomme, are ultra-sensational, suitable for "lovers, and lovers only."—A brisk ballad for a bass is "There was a King of Thule," the words from Goethe's "Faust," music by M. White. —Poetical, but melancholy enough to satisfy the most dismal taste, are the words of a poem by Adelaide Proctor, "A Tryst with Death," the appropriate music to which is by J. Schoubach. The compass is from C below the lines to F on the fifth line.—Three well-written songs, music by R. Guerini, are "The Fountain," words by J. R. Lowell, bright and sparkling as its name implies; "The Kiss," one of Lord Byron's tender poems, very suitable for a youthful tenor; and a meet companion for the above, "The Young Rose," words by T. Moore.—Cheerful, and at the same time very sentimental, are two songs, music by Eaton Faning, R.A.M., a most promising young composer, "One for Another," words by Edward Oxenford, and "When the Gorse is in Blossom," written by Gordon Campbell. Both are narrative songs of medium compass, published in two keys.—The words of a tenor song, "Regret," written by C. J. Rowe, are superior to the music by P. Bucalossi; but neither displays originality of ideas.—Operatic fragments for the pianoforte are but seldom satisfactory; hence two pianoforte pieces by Alexandre Billet, namely, "Reminiscence du Freischutz," and "Le Nozze di Figaro," reminiscence pour le pianoforte, are satisfactory only to the composer, who can do better when he takes the trouble.—Worthy of its title is a "Rondo Grazioso," for the pianoforte, by J. Baptiste Calkin, a really excellent morceau.—Nine pleasing trifles, entitled "Episodes," for the pianoforte, by Frederick Westlake, may be learned by heart, and played at appropriate five minutes.—The same may be said of "three short pieces" for the pianoforte, by G. J. Van Eyken: No. I., "Sarabande;" No. II., "Intermezzo;" No. III., "Echo Song."

WILLIAM CZERNY.——A well-written duet for soprano and contralto is "Good Night," music by F. Wickman, German words by C. D. Manfred, indifferently translated by Mrs. Noble, R.A.M. The above-named translator has done much better with the Italian poetry of Signor L. Farnese, in "Una Sera in Riva al Mare" (Holy Faith and Love), a charming song for a mezzo-soprano or tenor, music by D. Carmusci. Two good schoolroom pieces for the pianoforte, by A. Buhl, are "Lydia," a valse de salon, and "Bon Voyage," a galop de salon. Very brilliant and showy is a paraphrase on "La Danse des Sylphes," from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," for the pianoforte, by D. Vmisanges.—From 32 to 42 of "Moments de Loisir," morceaux classiques et populaires pour violon et piano, are more or less good in their way. No. 32, "Une Petite Feuille," is tuneful and easy; as is also No. 33, "Moment Musical," by Schubert; No. 34, a "Mazurka Gracieuse," by Chopin, requires thoroughly good playing; No. 35 is a well-known "Gavotte in A," by Gluck; No. 36, a melodious "Romance," by Henselt; No. 37, a quaint "Air de la Pentecôte," by Bach; Nos. 38, 39, and 40, are lively and cheerful—"Humoresque," by Beringer; "Hornpipe," by Handel; and "Fragment from a Quintett," by Schumann. No. 41 is a "Pastoral Romanza," by Wilson, a very good study; No. 42, "Air de Suzanne," by Handel, a romance en Fa pour violin (ou violoncelle), with a pianoforte accompaniment," by Edouard Marlois, is a meet companion for the above dozen works.

MISCELLANEOUS.——Three songs, music by C. A. Ranken, are not up to his usual mark of excellence. The words, by C. D. Larmont, of "Memory's Leaves" are truly poetical, therefore this is the best of the songs; "Thou Art My Love," words by W. Murray, is a commonplace composition on both sides; precisely the same may be said of "Alone," words by Edwin Waugh (Messrs. Ewald and Co).—Dr. F. Lloyd Fowle has composed a tuneful "Hymn of Peace," which he may more practically employ in his church choir than for private use (Messrs. Warren and Son).

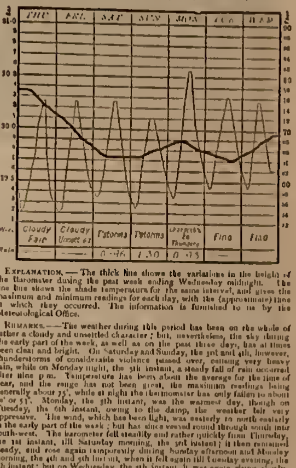
WEATHER CHART FOR THE WEEK

AUGUST 1ST TO AUGUST 7TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.——The thick line shows the variations in the height of the barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum readings for each day, with the (approximate) time at which they occurred. The information is furnished to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.——The weather during this period has been on the whole of rather a cloudy and unsettled character; but, nevertheless, the sky during the early part of the week, as well as on the past three days, has at times been clear and bright. On Saturday and Sunday, the 3rd and 4th, however, thunderstorms of considerable violence passed over, causing very heavy rain, while on Monday night, the 5th instant, a steady fall of rain occurred after nine p.m. Temperature has been about the average for the time of year, and the range has not been great, the maximum readings being generally about 75°, while at night the thermometer has only fallen to about 56° or 57°. Monday, the 5th instant, was the warmest day, though on Tuesday, the 6th instant, owing to the damp, the weather felt very oppressive. The wind, which has been light, was easterly to north-easterly in the early part of the week; but has since veered round through south into south-west. The barometer fell steadily and rather quickly from Thursday, the 1st instant, till Saturday morning, the 3rd instant; it then remained steady, and rose again temporarily during Sunday afternoon and Monday morning, the 4th and 5th instant, when it fell again till Tuesday evening, the 6th instant; but on Wednesday, the 7th instant, it was again rising slowly. The barometer was highest (30·33 inches) on Thursday, the 1st instant; lowest (29·70 inches) on Tuesday, the 6th instant; range, 0·63 inches. Temperature was highest (81°) on Monday, the 5th instant; lowest (54°) on Thursday and Friday, the 1st and 2nd; range, 27°. Rain has fallen on three days; total amount, 1·89 inches.

THE COMING GROUSE SEASON promises to be one of the most satisfactory known since the outbreak of the disease in Scotland. As last season was wet the birds were comparatively little disturbed, and the mild winter has been equally favourable to them, report declaring the grouse to be as forward now as at the beginning of September last year. The prospects of deer-stalking seem equally bright.

INDIAN FORGERS are as undoubtedly clever counterfeiters as their British brethren, but their deficient knowledge of the English tongue frequently causes them to make curious mistakes. Thus the Times of India tells us that a remarkably skilful imitation of a Government currency note of the Bombay circle has recently come to light. The note purports to be one for Rs. 1,000, and is evidently the work of an ingenious native artist; but unfortunately for him he spells "promise" without the final vowel. The note is said to be a wonderfully good specimen of hand-printing; but it is nevertheless not a forgery, for either from an imperfect acquaintance with English vocables, or from prudential motives, the name of the Bombay Commissioner of Paper Currency has been written "C. E. Chumparum," instead of C. E. Chapman. Otherwise the imitation is so good that the note was unsuspectingly received by a native merchant of Calcutta in the course of business.

"Who taught you about the saints, Monica?"

AMONGST ALIENS

By FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE

AUTHOR OF "A CHARMING FELLOW," "AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE," "BLACK SPIRITS AND WHITE," ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

"But, Catty dear," said my sister to me the next morning when we were pacing slowly together, arm in arm, out of the sunshine into the shadow, and out of the shadow into the sunshine, in the gardens of the Villa d'Este, "Catty, dear, I cannot think that Vittorio meant to deceive me."

Lucy was still pale and weak, with heavy circles round her pretty blue eyes, and her gown, which had fitted her so neatly two months ago, hanging loosely about her meagre form; but the blue eyes had a bright, steady look of resolution in them which was new, and her slender figure no longer drooped in the listless way which it had so pained me to see. We had talked and talked half the night through; and for the first time for many weeks I had felt that Lucy was speaking her whole mind, and her whole heart, which was better, to me. The veil through which we had been seeing each other dimly was gone. My own candid, simple-minded, little Lucy had come back to me, and my heart was lightened of a load. The very half soft, half stubborn, way she had, of persisting in her own opinion about that poor creature, Vittorio Corleoni, reminded me of the fair mite of a child, with a wide forehead and sensitive mouth, whom my brother used to call little Square-toes in her nursery days; declaring that her small shoes with straps to them (how small they were!) had a certain air of innocent obstinacy, which gave them a mysterious resemblance to their owner.

"Lucy," said I, "we will not discuss Don Vittorio unless you choose. But if we are to discuss him I must speak out my thoughts, must I not?"

"Y—yes, Catherine." Then after a minute's pause she added more firmly, "Yes. Speak out. It is best, although it may hurt a little for the moment. And, Catherine, I have been thinking and thinking, and trying to see things sincerely; and one thing I have seen. And that is, that if what you say pains me, what I say may equally pain you!"

"True, Lucy. Fairly and honestly said."

I was pleased to hear her say this—none the less pleased because I thought it augured worse for the influence over her of Monsignore Chiappaforte, and the special advocates of his Church, than any utterance from her lips which I could recal. And on this clear and open footing we discussed together the whole story of Don Vittorio's wooing from the beginning, and of the Princess's singular sweetness, followed by sudden severity, and of Monsignore's part in the little drama. The cool, easy, matter-of-course way in which Monsignore had accepted it as certain that Don Vittorio meant to deceive Lucy, and betray her trust and love, had, I could see, perilously shaken that dignitary's position in my sister's estimation, even if it had not toppled him over altogether. I well knew that Monsignore would never have spoken as he did speak had he known that Lucy was within earshot. He might, indeed, have expressed the same meaning, but in a very, very different tone. However, I did not insist on this point, thinking it best to leave time, and reflection, and her own conscience to do their silent work in her mind. But she clung to her belief in Don Vittorio's truth and honour with a tenacity that made me sad. And yet I loved her for it.

"Why Catherine, can I doubt him merely because others do? I should be——" She paused, and the tears sprang to her eyes and her cheeks flushed; but she bravely finished her sentence without a sob.—"I should be as bad as the Princess thinks me, if I didn't believe in Vittorio with all my heart."

"Ah, my child, don't nurse vain hopes and illusions!"

"As to hopes—no. I see now very clearly that we were both foolish. Who am I that he should stoop to marry me? It was a foolish dream, and I see now that it was selfish of me to think of—of being his wife. He ought to marry a lady of his own rank, with riches and beauty, and all good gifts far above mine. And I—hope he will. But I don't want him to forget me altogether. I want him to think of me always as wishing him well and happy, and praying for God's blessing on him and his. As for me, I shall never care for any one else,—never, never. But I dare say that some day I shall be glad to think that I didn't ruin his life, and separate him from his own people. And he will get over this trouble, and love some one else,—as I never, never, can. But then—men are different. He won't be to blame, Catherine."

The tears were streaming down her pale cheeks now, but yet her face had a look of serenity through it all. It was better for her to talk freely than to keep her innocent sorrows to herself. "And so, perhaps, Lucy may be spared the rude disenchantment which I feared for her; and may be able to look back in future years, when she is a happy wife and mother, on this love-story with a pleasant tenderness, as one remembers the dreams of childhood."

Thus ran my thoughts. For, you see, I paid very little heed to Lucy's protestations that she could never, never love any one else. She believed it. But at her age, and with her character, that was as natural as that she should be mistaken in so believing.

"No," said she, drying her eyes, as she stood with her face turned towards the great plain, with Rome rising from its misty horizon like a phantom city; "No, that is over for me. But human beings have different gifts and different missions, and perhaps too much earthly happiness may clog the wings of the spirit,—especially if it is but a weak, faltering spirit like mine,—and some of us may need sorrow and disappointment to teach us the beauty and value of a prayerful life."

"Well," I answered, "'Laborare est orare,' you know, Lucy. And I must not lose any more of the daylight, but set to work on my study of that gentle damsel, Monica."

I cannot tell why,—I have never been able to account for the thought coming into my head precisely then, and not sooner,—but the fact is, that scarcely had I uttered the last words about Monica, when a sudden idea—almost a conviction—rushed into my mind in connection with her, and sent a hot, startled flush over my face. Lucy did not see it, for she was still gazing out at the view in an absent-minded way. We left the Villa d'Este, and returned to our lodgings together. I thought my sister had had walking enough, and advised her to lie down and rest awhile whilst I worked. She declared that she was not tired, and that she wished to do something for me, who was always so industrious and ready to work under difficulties; and she proposed to finish a piece of needlework that I had in hand. But when we had climbed up the dark, dirty stone staircase leading to our abode, she was obliged to own herself very weary, and to take my advice about lying down.

"I shall only lie still some half hour or so, Catherine," she said, "and then come and have a look at your study, if I may. I should like to see Monica again, too. I wonder what became of that poor girl,—her brother's sweetheart, you know. Poor thing! to be taken away from her home and her innocent country life, and the love of an honest man,—and then deserted! How sad it is to think of! I have thought of that girl several times since you told me the story."

It disturbed me greatly to hear her begin on this theme, after the idea which had flashed into my mind in the Villa d'Este; and I had not been in presence of my model two minutes before she (Monica) said abruptly, staring at me loweringly with her great dark eyes, "You never told me you knew him, when I was talking to you so free and open the other day."

I knew as well what was coming as if I had had it printed clearly on a page before my eyes. But it was necessary to preserve my cool self-command with Monica, under penalty of forfeiting what little influence I had acquired over her. So I answered quietly, "In the first place, draw that plait more forward, and let it shade the throat,—so!" (I was pointing at the tresses of her wonderful blue-black, coarse, thick hair). "And in the next place, speak clearly if you want me to understand you."

INDIAN GROOMS AND BHEESTIES IN CAMP AT LARNACA

THE OCCUPATION OF CYPRUS

She had mechanically obeyed my injunctions as to the disposition of her hair, but continued to glare at me with an expression like that of a buffalo-calf;—if you have never chanced to see one of those savage denizens of the Campagna, I may tell you that the habitual expression of a young buffalo is not prepossessing, being at once sullen and distrustful; whilst that of an old buffalo is in general diabolic.

"Well," resumed Monica, after a short pause, "if you don't know him your sister does. I saw her on Wednesday coming out of the gardens of the Villa d'Este, and I said to some one I know,—he wheels the barrow to pick up the dead leaves in there,—'That's an English girl,' said I, 'her with the hair like gold, and the face like the Madonna in our church at home.' And he says, 'Well, I should think I know that! She comes here every day to walk, and she's a grand Signora!' I laughed in his face, and called him pumpkin-head, and I says, 'She a grand Signora? Go, you fool! She's only a poor teacher, and her sister is an artist who paints for money!' Grand ladies never do anything for money—do they?"

"H'm! I can't undertake to answer for them, Monica."

"Well, anyhow you and your sister are not grand ladies, are you?"

"Certainly not. As to that there can be no manner of doubt."

"Ha! I told Cecco so. But he's as stubborn as our old black mule, and he stood me out that she was a grand Signora because the parish priest made so much fuss about her, and took off his hat, and because a grand Signore walked about in the gardens with her, and rode away on a horse that shone like a ripe chestnut. 'What!' says I, 'a horse that shines like a chestnut! Is the man—may be he's considered handsome, with gold-brown hair on his face, and a gold chain, and spurs that go clink, clink on the stones?' And when Cecco said 'Yes,' that was the man, I asked his name—may the fiend carry him away! —and Cecco told it me, and then it all came back, like when you wake up in the morning and remember yesterday, and I knew that that accursed Signore who sent Pasquale to the galleys was Vittorio Corleoni."

"Oh! Turn your head a little more to the right."

"Well, but say, how did your sister come to know him? And why did you say nothing about knowing him when I spoke to you the other day? Are you a traitress, too? I thought you always said what was true."

It must not be supposed that this estimate of my veracity was by any means wholly complimentary in Monica's opinion. She had never been taught to look on truthfulness as a virtue, and there might easily arise occasions on which truthfulness would appear to her in the light of mere imbecility, and lack of resource. Still the fact that she had come to expect the truth from me as a matter of course, naturally strengthened my influence over her. And her ignorance and credulity, where she did believe, were as boundless as her power of attributing evil motives, and cherishing cunning suspicions, where she doubted.

"No, Monica, I am not a traitress, as you call it. But you forget that I did not know the name of the gentleman you had been talking of. I believe you did not know it yourself."

"Ay! I had forgotten it. At least I had it in my mind somehow;—hid away in the dark. His father has an estate over yonder," jerking her head towards the south, "where I come from. He goes there to shoot. He, that Vittorio,— —maledictions on his head!—don't go there now. He is afraid perhaps!" Here Monica laughed, a fierce, scornful, tuneless laugh, and then with a deep guttural "Ah-h-h!" she spat on the floor, and made a contemptuous gesture with her quick brown hand.

"Come, come! Sit steady," said I, authoritatively.

"Madonna mine, when I think of that beast——!"

"Don't think of him. You have thought of him enough. Think rather of some good person. It will be better for you."

This idea, being a novel one, seemed to take hold of my young European savage, and kept her quiet for a time. I profited by the peaceful interval, and by the meditative expression of her face, always pathetic in repose, and worked away zealously.

"I don't know who to think of," said Monica, after a while, looking up at me blankly.

"Sit still, at any rate! I have just begun to get the look I wanted!"

At this moment Lucy came into the room, and, standing behind my easel, softly clapped her hands in approval. "Oh, Catherine, how beautifully you are getting on!" she cried. "This head is the best thing you have ever done!"

"Which would not be saying anything stupendous in the way of praise, either! Still it is, of course, satisfactory to recognise some progress; and I think this study does show some improvement. But this monkey is the most tiresome of sitters. If she would be quiet for one half hour it would be worth a hundred francs to me."

"Let me talk to her, and try to keep her amused. What sort of things do you find to say to her?"

"Well,—our range of topics is not large. Just now I advised her to think of some good person, and I believe she tried;—but apparently she never knew any good persons!"

"Who came into your mind, Monica, when you were trying to think of some good person?" added Lucy, in Italian.

Monica regarded her doubtfully, and shook her head. "I suppose the saints are good," she said, "but I don't know them, and they live up in Paradise."

"Who taught you about the saints, Monica?"

"Padre Bossi, our curate. He's dead. He was ever so old."

"Well, he was good, was he not?"

"No. He used to beat the boys over the head when they laughed at Vespers."

This was undoubtedly disconcerting. However, after a minute or two, Lucy, who had taken out her needlework, and seated herself in such a position as to attract Monica's head and throat into the right turn for my purpose, softly resumed, "Is your mother alive, Monica?"

"Mamma? No; Mamma is dead. Daddy is dead, too. My grandmother is alive. She lives here in Tivoli."

"Poor Monica! My mother is dead, too."

The girl fixed her eyes contemplatively on Lucy. "Was she pretty, your Mamma?" she said, after a short pause.

"Yes; I believe she was. I do not remember her. I was a little baby when she died."

"Ha! I can remember my Mamma. She was handsome, I can tell you. I am like her. I am a fine girl, you know, only the accursed fever has made me yellow in the face."

I don't think any home-bred English person could believe with what absolute phlegmatic simplicity, and absence of blushing or bridling, Monica pronounced the dictum that she was a fine girl.

"Tell me about your Mamma, Monica," said Lucy, in her sweet, coaxing little voice.

At first Monica seemed unable to find anything to tell; but a few skilful questions set her on the right track, and soon she was in a full flow of talk, recalling this and that circumstance of her childhood, with a plaintive, thoughtful look in her magnificent eyes (which look was chiefly the result of an effort to remember, and had nothing to do with soft emotion. But no matter! It came out adorably on canvas), and a subdued tone in her harsh voice, caught by instinctive imitation from Lucy's.

"There," said I, releasing the thumb of my left hand from its durance in the hole of the palette; "enough for this sitting. Lucy, I am ever so much obliged to you. You have been as potent over this untamed young animal as Orpheus over the lions and tigers. Isn't she like a panther? However, to-day, I have really done a good stroke of work."

The sitting had been highly successful and satisfactory to us all three. And Monica inquired with much interest whether the Signorina Lucia would be there next time. "Because," said she confidentially to me when Lucy had left the room, "she diverts me; and I like to look at her curls. They are like the Gesù Bambino's, in the manger, at Christmas. Have you ever seen that? But, oh no! I forgot. You are not Christians, you two. Some foreigners are Christians, though; I've seen them at Mass."

"Look here, Monica: if you would like to have the Signorina Lucia here at your next sitting, you must promise me to be good——"

"Oh, I'll be good! I'll swear if you like, by——"

"No, no; I don't wish you to swear. You must promise to be good; and you must promise something else. You must promise me faithfully not to speak to the Signorina of Don Vittorio Corleoni."

She broke out into a string of oaths which would have been forcible in the mouth of a carter, and ended by saying disdainfully, "I talk of him? I spit on him. There!" And suiting the action vigorously to the word.

"The worst of it is," said I, coolly, "that you don't spit on him, but on my floor. I cannot allow that sort of thing in my studio."

I had often observed that Monica, despite her more than bucolic ruggedness and roughness, was, like most of her country people, vulnerable to sarcasm. Any approach to being ridiculed stung her severely, whenever she perceived it. So now she turned angry in a moment, contracting her black eyebrows, and looking at me with fierce, flashing eyes.

"Well," I asked, as coolly as before, "is it a bargain?"

"Why shall I not speak of that devilish beast to her?" returned Monica, sullenly. Then, with a quick dart of suspicion, "Ah, you like him! He is your friend, eh? I must say nothing against him, eh? Wait! You'll see if I care for him, or Don Gregorio, or any of them. Don Gregorio may take off his dirty old hat if he likes, as for me, I——"

"Not on my floor, Monica," I said, very quietly holding up at the same time a warning finger.

For an instant she looked undecided; but then with another quick impulse she began to laugh, showing her square white teeth, and wiping her lips with her apron. Seeing her in this mood, I smiled too, and added, "Come, I don't mind telling you this much: I dislike and despise Don Vittorio Corleoni as much as you can. He is no friend of mine, or of my sister's. His mother has behaved unkindly to her, and—frankly—I don't love any of the family. But, for reasons which you cannot understand, I will not have them talked of to my sister. If you don't choose to obey me, you must not come here. You know that I mean what I say."

Monica had listened with an eager and a brightening face. It delighted her to hear me say that I disliked the Corleonis. "His mother, too, eh!" she said, nodding her head contemptuously. "She was unkind, was she? They are beasts all! An accursed family! And I hope the saints will send them all to perdition!"

With which pious and original invocation of the good offices of the saints, Monica threw a bright tartan shawl (my gift to her) over her peasant costume, and prepared to depart. But before she went away she gave the promise I had required of her, merely making the condition that I should allow her to ease her mind occasionally by talking of "that accursed one" to me, whensoever the spirit should move her.

CHAPTER XII.

MY sister gradually recovered from the shock of the Princess's letter. Nay, to say the truth, she recovered from it more quickly than I did. Her very humility helped her. In the gentleness of her nature she bent like a reed before the harsh wind; but, like a reed, she rose again when it had passed. I was less flexible. I could neither submit nor forget. My soul protested and cried out against the treatment Lucy had received; and even if it had not been in my character to feel the injustice of this injury keenly, the sight of Lucy's pale face would have been sufficient to keep my indignation alive. For, although I have said she recovered from the shock and prostration occasioned by that cruel letter, yet she was very far from being the sunny-tempered Lucy with blush-rose cheeks whom I had brought from England a year and a half ago. Poor little thing! I began to feel that, for her, the blossom and sweetness of youth had been rudely destroyed. That flower fades for us all. It is the doom of earthly things. But for the happier sort of mortals it changes naturally and imperceptibly, as the fresh green of spring gives place to the gold and russet of July and October in their appointed seasons; and I had hoped that my Lucy might be numbered among the happier sort of mortals. Certainly our poverty and obscurity would not have hindered her happiness, for she had been as cheerful as the day until lately. Poor little thing! Well, I could but work hard in the present, and hope in the future. Lucy was but eighteen, after all.

One or two days passed quietly. Don Gregorio did not come near us. And, indeed, I believe that I had frightened him nearly out of his wits, for when one morning I chanced to see him talking to a farmer in the street he turned away, and darted off up a bye-lane in a violent hurry, leaving his interlocutor gaping after him, utterly unable to discover what it was that had put the reverend gentleman to flight. Monsignor Chiappaforte, however, did not retire from the field and wash his hands of us after his somewhat stormy interview with me. He came again the very next day, but without asking to see either me or Lucy. He merely left his card, with a polite message of inquiry for the Signorina Lucia. Our landlady, S'ora Nanna, was greatly impressed by these attentions, and began, I think, to consider us personages of some importance, which up to that time she had evidently not done, I am bound to say.

At length, one afternoon when I returned from painting out of doors, I found Monsignore in our sitting-room with Lucy. He saluted me courteously, and I could not help admiring the tact and discrimination of his behaviour towards us both. In general I had thought his manner below his reputation for talent; but upon this occasion Monsignore was superior to his usual self from a histrionic point of view. He adapted his face, his voice, and his manner to the circumstances of the case. It was the more clever, inasmuch as Nature had not fitted him for the part of a feeling friend. Like one or two other persons conspicuous for jollity, and renowned for bonhomie, whom I have met with, Monsignor Chiappaforte's smiles and ready laughter always appeared to me to indicate an almost absolute moral isolation—a curious and painful want of sympathy. I know that he did not produce this impression on every one. On the contrary, the world said how delightfully genial Monsignore was. But for my own part, rightly or wrongly, I found his uniform hilarity almost repulsive; and when Monsignor's infantine laugh raised answering smiles on every face around, it was an odd and unpleasant sensation to be conscious, as I was, of a dreary depression of spirits.

However, to-day he was serious, placid, and friendly in his tone. I know not what he had been saying to Lucy before my arrival; but after I joined them he talked pleasantly enough, and avoided all subjects which might have aroused emotion. He talked of the places of interest in the neighbourhood, of Hadrian's Villa, of the Villa of Varus, and so forth. Perhaps his antiquarian lore was not profound; but it was certainly great in comparison with our ignorance. And, in spite of my dislike and distrust of the man, I found myself listening with interest to what he had to say. Among the excursions he recommended was one to Monte Gennaro—the Mons Lucretilis of Horace—and to the site of the poet's villa, near Licenza. On the subject of this latter Monsignor grew warm. He, for his part, was convinced that the ploughed field, under whose soil the peasant proprietor will show you a fragment of mosaic pavement, was the veritable site of Horace's Sabine farm. Other archæologists differed from him here, it is needless to say, and differed from each other; and every one of them irrefragably proved himself to be right (at least to his own satisfaction) by masses of quotations from all sorts of authors.

"Ah, I wish you could see the view from the top of Monte Gennaro, and then get down to the farm close to Licenza!" said Monsignor. "A charming excursion! You could go on ponies. I made it on foot when I was a schoolboy at Mondragone with my tutor, Don Anselmo—a very learned man, a great classical scholar, one of the vieille roche who belonged to the days when we had some learning and culture in Rome. We did not teach boys and girls out of the gutter, music and algebra, to be sure; but then, en revanche, our professors had some erudition—could even speak and write their own language correctly, for example, incredible as the statement may appear to you nowadays!"

So Monsignor chatted on for some quarter of an hour, and when he took his leave I felt more charitably disposed towards him than I had ever done yet. I asked Lucy what he had been saying to her before I came in, and she answered with a serious look that he had been speaking of the consolations of religion.

The unexpected break-up of our relations with the Corleonis released us from the obligation of returning to Rome at the expiration of a fortnight, and I thought it would be well for us to prolong our stay at Tivoli for a few weeks. It was a great point with me to keep Lucy away from the associations of our Roman life, until she should be strong enough in mind and body to bear the sight of the familiar places and people without breaking down. I proposed to her, therefore, that we should remain in Tivoli until the end of April, and she acquiesced in the proposition with gentle listlessness. Yes; let it be as I pleased. She would willingly remain. She wanted to see my picture begun, but she supposed I might work at it here as well as in Rome. Of her own feelings or wishes not a word did she say. This listlessness it was, in truth, which made me anxious on her account. It was so unnatural at her age, and so foreign to her former warm-hearted, eager way, that I could not help fearing it indicated a morbid state of bodily weakness. Almost rather would I have seen her give way to passionate regrets, which would have worn themselves out, than accept her sorrow with this uncomplaining quietude.

There was only one thing which seemed to arouse her interest and take her out of her sad meditations, and that one thing, strangely enough, was the company of my model, Monica. Perhaps it was the fact that Monica was utterly removed from participation in the story of her life in Rome; perhaps Lucy, in her kindness of heart, wished to exercise a good influence over the undisciplined creature; perhaps the mere novelty and strangeness of Monica's uncivilised sayings and doings really amused her;—in short, whatever were the cause, it is certain that Lucy never looked and spoke so like her old self as when she sat by, needlework in hand, whilst I painted from Monica, and listening or talking to that wild daughter of the Campagna. On her part, Monica had some attachment for Lucy, in her rough way, and a great admiration for her delicate, blonde beauty. But she assumed a protecting air towards my sister which was very comic and curious.

"Poveretta!" she would exclaim. "Poor little thing! Just see her fingers sewing that handkerchief. How small and fine they are,—fine, fine! And her curls are as soft——! just like the Gesù Bambino. Don't let her sew too much. She'll be tired." Or else, "Why does not the Signorina divert herself more? She never goes to hear the band play on Sundays. She has no diversions,—and she is so young! You ought not to let her be so melancholy. Mamma mia! would I sit at home like that, and never enjoy a festa?"

Once, by way of drawing her out, I said, "Well, but how is it that you don't mind my being melancholy, as you call it, Monica? I never go to hear the band play, either."

She looked at me quickly, with her head on one side. "Ah si! Per bacco, that's true enough!" she replied, after a second's pause. "And you're not old. How old are you?"

"Twenty-four."

"E—e—e—eh! That's more than I thought. Still it's not so very old. But,—you ain't so pretty and fair as the Signorina Lucia. Her skin is like the wax angel in the presepio at Christmas, and her curls are as soft—just like the Gesù Bambino, as I always say. Poveretta! she ought to have some diversion."

"Well, well, Monica," I answered one day to a speech of this kind; "she shall have some diversion. We will make a beautiful excursion to Monte Gennaro, and to Licenza. It will be lovely one of these fine spring days. And if you're good, and sit nicely for me all this week, you may come too. You said you wanted to go to Licenza."

"Yes," answered Monica, "so I do. I want to see my aunt, granny's youngest daughter, who lives there. Granny's too old to go. But—will that divert the Signorina? Once I went to Licenza for my cousin's wedding. We had a tambourine, and we danced. That was famous! But,—only just to go there in the daytime and see all those big hills, and the river, and the women washing on a work-day—h'm! I don't believe that will divert her!"

And Monica shook her head with a disappointed air. Still the promised excursion was something to look forward to, and she was on her best behaviour for several days, to induce me to let her go.

I should not have thought of attempting it, except for the hope that we might have Signor Sandro with us on the occasion. He had sent me one of his brief, hieroglyphical communications by post, informing me that he thought he should come over to Tivoli for a day or so, to look at my work, and get a breath of country air. If he would accompany us, I thought the excursion might be managed; and for my own part I was very anxious to make it. Lucy showed little interest in the project, or indeed in any project or incident of our daily lives. She seemed to me to be like a person breathlessly waiting for an expected footstep, to whom all other sounds are merely disturbing. An eating suspense wore her spirit day by day. Once, when I said some word to her about the necessity of rousing her mind from vain regrets, she burst into tears and exclaimed, "Oh, Catherine, if he would but come and speak to me, or write, or make one sign! I know all is over between us. I am resigned to that; I would never complain of it. But this blank silence is too dreadful. I imagine to myself a thousand painful things. What may he be thinking of me? Who knows what he has been told? There must be some misapprehension in his mind, or he would never leave me pining in neglect like this. He couldn't be so cruel, Catherine!"

What could I say to her? To tell her that I believed Vittorio capable of almost any degree of cruel selfishness would not have mended matters, on the other hand, to defend him was impossible to me. I could but assure her of my unchanging love, and hold her poor curly child-like head against my breast, and let her cry.

Meanwhile I revolved in my own mind what I would say in my letter to the Princess. I was firmly determined that I would write to her, and now the idea that I might succeed in drawing forth some explicit statement of Don Vittorio's intentions spurred my purpose. Any certainty, however painful, would now be better for Lucy than her present state of agitating suspense, for under it lurked—I could not help seeing it—a wild hope, a vain trust, in Vittorio's vows. To me, his cowardly abandonment of her was as plain as if he had spoken it to me in the clearest words. But she could not see it as I saw. Could she have done so, she would have merited some part of the Princess's reproaches, instead of being the most trustful and unsuspecting of creatures.

New Novels

"BROTHER GABRIEL," by M. Betham-Edwards, author of "Doctor Jacob," &c. (3 vols.: Hurst and Blackett).—This story is, no doubt, clever after a fashion—Miss Betham-Edwards could hardly write anything of which so much at least could not be said—but it strikes us as far-fetched and improbable, and altogether less satisfactory than any former novel of its author's that has fallen in our way. It is, in a measure, built on the same lines as Werner's "Am Altar," a couple of English translations of which we reviewed a week or two back. Brother Gabriel is a young Franciscan, an inmate of a monastery in the French provincial city to which the author gives the name of Les Ponts, who is led to renounce his vows and his faith, partly by coming to believe that dominion over the minds and consciences of men, and not spiritual holiness, is the aim of the modern Church of Rome; partly, though only half-consciously, through the influence of the beauty of Zoë Delmar, a lady whom he has met on the occasion of his visits, at recreation times, to her cousin and his dear friend, Lionel Delmar, a distinguished American savant approaching middle age. But Zoë, though once, as the only means of saving the young monk's life from the furious Republican mob, who are going to drown him, she declares that she loves him, has, in truth, nothing but a sisterly affection for him, her whole heart being given to Delmar, who cannot marry her because he has a wife in the background in America. Nevertheless, when Brother Gabriel, after having abandoned his convent, comes to her and beseeches her not to desert him in his loneliness and trouble, but to take pity on his helplessness and ignorance of the world, and teach him how to live, Zoë, a woman with no near ties, feels herself bound to be to him all that a loving sister might be, even to casting in her lot with him, and sharing his house. That scandal should arise from such an arrangement seems to us very much less surprising than it does to poor Zoë; but we need not tell more of the story, except to say that there never is any ground for the scandal, that Zoë in the end becomes the wife of her cousin, and that Brother Gabriel has to be disposed of by death. The situation appears to us eminently unreal, as we cannot suppose that any woman of six or seven and twenty, who knew the world, would have undertaken to play such a part as Zoë's; and Gabriel is a personage who, neither as monk nor as Christian unattached, gets any hold on our interest or regard; but our objection is rather to the whole subject of Miss Betham-Edwards's story than to any particular detail in the treatment of it. We cannot help thinking that the "emancipated" monk or nun, like the runaway wife, are people whom the novelist had better let alone. Nor, as far as we can see, has the author much knowledge of that monastic system she criticises so glibly and confidently, or, for that matter, of Catholicism at all. Let us say, however, that her pictures of old French towns and French country landscapes show no falling off in her well-known power of description.

"The Lord Hermitage," by James Grant, author of "The Romance of War," &c. (3 vols.: Chatto and Windus).—There is no occasion to say more concerning the general character of this novel than that it is just one of those romances of love and warfare which we have been accustomed to receive from the author's hands. Much of it is occupied with episodes in the Crimean War, in which the hero, Julian Melville, as he is called, plays a distinguished part. Mr. Grant's pictures of battle and of camp life are drawn with his usual vigour and spirit, but we do not think he is altogether justified in leading his readers to think that such an unmitigated ruffian and barbarian as Colonel Ivan Mouravieff may be taken as a fair specimen of the officers of the Russian army. But the point in the tale open to most exception is the introduction of such a mysterious being as Salome, whom we seem intended to identify with the daughter of Herodias, who danced before Herod Antipas, condemned, as the punishment of her sin, to roam up and down the earth a "Wandering Jewess," unable to die or grow old, but possessed of more than mortal power and knowledge. In his preface the author apologises for such a character by the plea that he has only, in Lord Lytton's words, "availed himself of the marvellous agencies which have ever been at the legitimate command of the fabulist." This is very true, but it does not seem to have occurred to him that when Lord Lytton made use of these marvellous agencies, as in "Zanoni" and "A Strange Story," like the true artist that he was, he toned, so to say, his whole story to be in keeping with them. He would have been altogether incapable of letting a Zanoni figure as a character in such a tale as "My Novel." Mr. Grant's Salome is in the most violent and jarring contrast with all her surroundings, and her introduction upon the scene a thorough artistic blunder. However, it is perhaps unlikely that a blunder of this kind will very seriously affect the readers whose tastes Mr. Grant principally consults.

"Summer Snow," by Sarah Tytler, author of "Lady Bell," &c. (Marcus Ward and Co.).—This little volume, which forms one of the "Bluebell" series of novels, strikes us as quite one of the best stories we have ever had from its author. That diffuseness which is too apt to be a besetting sin with Miss Tytler was here rendered impossible by the limits within which she was working, and the result is that her very pleasant and pretty tale is told without the least approach to repetition or redundancy, and never flags for a moment. Christophine Russel is a very natural and fascinating little heroine both in her somewhat self-conscious, though unaffected, grief for the loss of the boyish lover she had only known for six weeks, and who has died, or, at least, is universally believed to have died, in Brazil a little more than a year before the story opens, and in the gradual awakening of her genuine womanly love for this young Hal Butler's middle-aged relative, "Uncle Dick." Very good, too, is Debby Butler in her first impulse of indignation at the "treachery" and "slyness," as she chooses to consider it, of her uncle and the girl who, she thinks, ought to consider herself as good as her brother's widow. Mrs. Russel, Christophine's optimistic mother—a veritable female Mark Tapley in her way—is another excellent character. In every way the book well deserves to be a general favourite.—We have also received "Roydenhurst," by Hester Hope (3 vols.: Remington and Co.), a novel the plot of which involves legal impossibilities, and which does not otherwise call for notice.

THE READER

"LES ORIGINES DE LA FRANCE CONTEMPORAINE—THE REVOLUTION," Vol. I., by H. A. Taine, translated by J. Durand (Daldy, Isbister, and Co.).—In the first portion of his "Origines" M. Taine had sketched the corruption and the weakness of that "Ancien Régime," which, though long torn up root and branch, still leaves some threads and fibres in the body politic of modern France. In the present he proceeds to paint from contemporary documents and records—letters of clear-headed observers like Malouet, Gouverneur Morris, Arthur Young; confidential correspondence of administrators and functionaries—the whirl and fury of the Revolution. Heavier indictment against the wild democracy has seldom perhaps been penned. It is a dance of madmen suddenly let loose, a stampede of furious and frightened cattle, this movement, which begins with the capture of the Bastille, and goes on in blind obedience to the mob-orators of the Palais Royal. Yet the picture, for all its richness of detail, is somewhat lacking in justness of proportion. Indefatigable in research, and studiously anxious to write as coldly as though the subject were a revolution of old Florence, M. Taine has little of the historic power which can bring out, through masses of small details and superficial causes, the deeper principles in obedience to which the whirlpool will be again succeeded by the strong and rapid stream. The picture of the Revolution we gather thus far from his pages is at once too bad and too simple to be wholly satisfactory. Give to the many-headed beast his freedom—augment the difficulties of the time by a series of bad harvests and consequent distress—dissolve all bonds of discipline and order by the voluntary abdication of legitimate authority—place on the one side a feeble King and Court, a noblesse and a higher clergy inspired with the new doctrines of humanitarianism and concession; on the other the masses, the serfs of yesterday, half maddened with the belief that the new era has dawned at last in which the wrongs of centuries will be righted—give statesmanship the Contrat Social for its sole text-book—and set in the midst of all this as the only people who know in some degree what they want, the proletary and the criminal, the outcasts from every country of an unhappy world, the withered or the unripe fruit of the professional classes, the adventurers and the social failures, to whom the new Revolt holds out the first clear prospect of "getting on," and there you have, M. Taine seems to say, the France of '89-'91, the France of the Constituent Assembly, of Mirabeau and Lafayette, a mad, disordered, miserable France, yet even so just a little better, if only for the possession of one or two statesmanlike leaders, than the later France of the Second Assembly and the Convention. Gradual reconstructive reforms are out of the question, for everything must be begun anew in obedience to "les principes," and the sole experts at such work are the officials of the old régime, and therefore men to some extent discredited. Regular government is impossible, for subordinates do not recognise the authority of their superiors, nor communes the supremacy of the Central Government. No doubt a vigorous and striking sketch, backed up by an almost excessive iteration of corroborative facts. But is it a full account of an event which was not after all a dreamer's nightmare, but the birth-throe of a new France?"

Under the slightly meretricious title of "Amours of Great Men" (2 vols.: Tinsley Brothers), Mr. Albert D. Vandam tells anew some eleven stories—the majority somewhat threadbare, a few, however, not too familiar to the general reader—of the loves (but rarely hallowed by the Church, or smoother in their course even when so hallowed) of famous men of the last seven centuries—Abelard, Petrarch, Dante, Raphael among the better known; Hans Memling, Clement Marot, Lope de Vega among those for whose bonnes fortunes we must turn aside to the by-paths of history. But the two volumes, which would be passable enough were these same stories simply told—for Mr. Vandam has been at some pains to get up his subjects—are fairly spoiled by ponderous philosophising upon the love which is half-sensuous, half-spiritual, which flatters itself at least that it is the latter, while beyond doubt it savours of the former—philosophising, too, not always in the highest taste, but in the tone of one who would gladly be "deliciously wicked," and only succeeds in being prosy. We would not dissuade our readers from the book, for some of the stories—those of Lope de Vega, of Molière, of Mirabeau more especially—may interest them; but we should recommend them to skip the preface, the moralisings, and the epilogue.

"Goethe," by A. Hayward, Q.C., the new volume of the Messrs. Blackwood's series of "Foreign Classics for English Readers," is a volume which in most respects is charming, in some a little disappointing. As a biography—even after G. H. Lewes, whom, be it said en passant, it corrects on one or two points—it is almost perfect, written with all the easy grace of the practised chronicler of literary and social greatnesses, and with that thorough mastery of the subject which was to be expected from the man who introduced "Faust" to English readers some five-and-forty years ago. And in the case of Goethe, whose life was so essentially "objective," whose "unswerving tendency," to quote the letter of his friend Merck, "was to give a poetical form to the actual"—a little, perhaps, at the cost of the men and women, but more especially of the women, on whom he experimented—the biography is the master key, not only to the character, but to the writings. But we are by no means sure that Goethe may not be studied too exclusively from this point of view, and we could quite have welcomed another chapter on the inner meaning of that strange Second Part of the "Faust."

A famous book for youthful readers is "John Dean of Nottingham" (Third Thousand: Griffith and Farran), by W. H. Kingston, with the more exceptional merit of being mainly true. The story, in fact, of young Jack Dean, the gentleman's son, who first turned cattle drover, then drifted (heaven knows how) to sea, then became captain of a man-of-war, next helped Czar Peter to form a Russian fleet, and died at last a prosperous gentleman at Wilford, on the banks of "silver Trent," is a veritable fragment of old Notts chronicles, whatever be the exact truth of the adventures with pirates by sea, or plotters against Dutch William and the Protestant Succession on land, with which Mr. Kingston has embellished it. For the schoolboy who loves a story of the sea we could not easily name a healthier or a more interesting little volume.

"A Handy Dictionary of Commercial Information" (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.), by C. T. Blakeley, of the Board of Trade, seems well adapted for every-day reference in school or counting-house or ordinary life. Though far from exhaustive the notices under each heading are clear and to the point, and, where necessary, carefully corrected by the light of recent Consular Reports. Altogether a very useful book to turn to for a short offhand account of the commoner objects and appliances of commerce.

In its new edition—the fourth—Mr. G. F. Heath's "Fern Paradise" (S. Low and Co.), enriched with two new sections on a "Fern Paradise at Home" and on "the Hygienic Influence of Plants and Rooms," and splendid with an array of photographs and engravings, claims notice now as a volume for the drawing-room. Readers will not regret its purchase should it induce them to employ the cheap and graceful fern for the adornment of window, flower-basket, or aquarium.

"The East Anglian Holiday Annual," published by Mr. P. Soman, of the Norwich Argus, will favourably compare with similar productions which mark the advent of the holiday season. The reading, which consists of thirteen miscellaneous articles, is light and pleasant. Several of these most appropriately contain references to East Anglia, in which district tourists have found pleasant rambling grounds and delightful spots for pitching their tents.

"Grafting and Budding" (Macmillan and Co.), from the French of M. Baltet, is an excellent translation of a famous French manual of a branch of horticulture in which our neighbours outre mer have for some time been first without a second. Tools, modes of grafting, affinities of species, lists of the trees and plants best multiplied by grafting—the amateur gardener has but to turn to the chapter to find at once the latest and best directions on the point.

Less technical, but still more delightful, is the volume in which, under the title of "Flowers: their Origin, Shapes, Perfumes, and Colours" (Hardwicke and Bogue), Dr. J. E. Taylor discourses of the Flora of the world, not as so many genera and species, but as a part of the great system of creation, in origin as old as are the fauna, and equally traceable in ascending forms from complex to more simple throughout entire geologic æons in the long struggle for existence, adapting themselves to be propagated by agency of wind or of insect, developing different shapes under the influence of soil and climate, marked off like the fauna into so many separate zones, exemplifying like them the survival of the fittest and the sacrifice of the individual to the general weal in modes that almost seem to border on the instinct of the animal. The discoveries of Wallace, Darwin, Lubbock, Belt, &c., have been most dexterously utilised to tell the story of "Flowers" in the most attractive and suggestive way.

With the end of the London season appears the annual shoal of guide books. As Paris is the chief goal of travel this year, we may mention first "The English Guide to the Paris Exhibition" (Mason), a fairly trustworthy little volume, with a map, and a few notes on the Salon, which will safely steer the casual visitor through the manifold attractions of the Champ de Mars and Trocadero. As the Guide, by the way, is intended for those dispensing with a catalogue, it is manifestly useless to mention the names of pictures without their numbers.—"Jones' Journey to Paris" (F. Warne) is a perfect gastronomic index, as the place and menu of each meal consumed by the writer and his wife are scrupulously recorded, their adventures being otherwise unexciting.—"The Comic Guide to Paris," from the French of A. Huart (Richardson and Best), had better have been left in its native tongue, as it is both coarse and foolish in English. There are not many spots in the Playground of Europe unvisited by the inquiring Briton, and it will not be the fault of the author of "Davos Platz" (Stanford) if that Alpine village is not overrun by "sick and sound." Lying snug in a high valley of the Grisons, Davos is as healthy in winter as in summer, for here natives die only of old age, and consumptive visitors grow strong and well, and, while a peaceful spot for invalids, it is equally pleasant for mountaineers owing to the variety of excursions around. Scenery and climate, people and history, meet with a full and enthusiastic description; and if Davos possess half the advantages herein claimed, southern sanatoriums may shut up their hotels, for their occupation is gone.—Returning to our own country, the same publishers furnish a fresh edition of their valuable "London Guide."—For practical use to a stranger pressed for time, "Seven Days in London," by F. Gosman (Richardson and Best), may be heartily commended. Excursions for each day are carefully compiled, and a separate map appended of the district to be traversed, while useful information respecting sights, transit, &c., is not forgotten.—"From Bournemouth to Bridgenorth in a Yellow Cart" (Provost) is a pleasant excursion worthy of imitation, and had the authoress paid as much attention to the scenery on her way as to the churches and the hymnals therein used, she might have greatly improved her narrative. Let her take a lesson from Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, whose "Companion to Killarney" (Marcus Ward) is delightful from the utter absence of the usual guidebook style. Forty years ago they described the Irish Lakes, but the many recent changes have induced them to compile a new volume. Unfeigned love for the district speaks in every line, and even such national drawbacks as beggars and rain are treated as curious studies of character and a pleasing variety of climate, while the useful side is not entirely merged in the picturesque, due directions respecting travelling and accommodation being provided.

THE ISLAND OF CYPRUS

ITS GEOGRAPHICAL FEATURES

CYPRUS, about which all the civilised world is now talking, is the most easterly island of the Mediterranean Sea, being situated between latitudes 34° 30′ and 36° N. and longitudes 32° and 35° E. In shape it is something like the outspread skin of a quadruped; its extreme length being about 150 miles, and its average breadth throughout the greater part of its extent being from thirty-five to fifty miles; its greatest breadth, however, from Cape Kormakiti on the north to Cape Gatto on the south is fully sixty miles; while towards the north-east a kind of promontory juts out, which is forty-five miles long and about ten wide. Its area is calculated at about 3,684 miles, and it is thus the third largest island in the Mediterranean, coming next after Sicily and Sardinia. Larnaca, which is the principal port of the island, is distant from Port Said, at the mouth of the Suez Canal, about 240 miles, from Malta 970, and from Mersine, the port of Cilicia, 160 miles. A great part of the island is occupied by two ranges of mountains, both of which have a general direction from east to west. Of these the most extensive as well as the most lofty is that which fills up almost the whole of the southern portion of the island, sending out subsidiary ranges or spurs in every direction. The highest peak of this range is Mount Troödos (anciently called Olympus), the height of which is 6,590 feet, those next in size being Adelphi, Mount Machera, and the isolated peak at the eastern extremity of the range near Larnaca, which is known as Oros Stavro, or the Hill of the Holy Cross, and is much frequented by pilgrims, it being believed that half of the true Cross was there deposited as a relic. The northern range of mountains runs from Cape Kormaciti (the ancient Crommyon) to Cape St. Andreas. Its elevation is not so great as that of the southern range, its highest summits not exceeding 3,200 feet, but it is remarkable for its continuous and unbroken character—consisting throughout of a narrow rocky ridge, descending abruptly on the one side to a narrow plain bordering the coast, and on the other to the great expanse of Messaria, which extends right across the island between these two mountain ranges, and from the Bay of Morphu to that of Famagosta. This plain is watered by two streams descending from the mountains in the south, one of which turns eastwards towards the Bay of Famagosta, whilst the other flows westward into the Bay of Morphu. In ancient times this plain was famous for its dense forests, but these have long since disappeared, the timber having been much used by the Phœnicians for ship-building and as fuel for smelting copper. The whole plain is now utterly bare and treeless. This changed condition of things has its natural effect upon the rivers, which are mostly mere streams partially dried up in summer time; even the Pedieus, which has its outlet close to Salamis, does not reach the sea during the dry season, and its stagnant waters form marshes which contribute much to the unhealthy character of the district. There are smaller plains in the southern part of the island, and these as well as the strip of level land on the northern coast are districts of great fertility. One of the greatest disadvantages of Cyprus is its lack of natural harbours. Larnaca and Limasol, the chief trading stations at the present day, have only open roadsteads, whilst Salamis, the chief port of the island in antiquity, and Famagosta, which held that position under the Venetians, were artificial harbours, the works of which have long since fallen to decay.

HISTORY OF THE ISLAND

CYPRUS holds a prominent place in mythological lore. It was at Paphos that Venus or Aphrodite, who was also called Cypris, first landed after being born of the sea-foam; it was in the forests of Idalium, the modern Dali, that Adonis was slain by the wild boar; Mount Olympus (and not the Caucasus) is also alleged to be the true scene of the terrible punishment of Prometheus, and it was a King of Cyprus who became enamoured with the marble statue carven by his own hands and afterwards endowed with life by the goddess of Love. The actual history of the island is of a very chequered character. It was anciently divided into many small kingdoms, which were sometimes at war with the neighbouring powers of Greece and Asia Minor. It was first colonised by the Phœnicians, from whom it passed to the Greeks, and subsequently to the Egyptians and Persians. When the victorious Alexander the Great appeared, the island declared for the Macedonian conqueror, and after his death it became a portion of the Greco-Egyptian kingdom under the Ptolemies. The last of these princes was unfortunate enough to offend the Romans, who sent Marcus Cato to take possession of the island. The King hearing of the expedition killed himself, and Cato, seizing upon the treasury, sent a large booty to Rome, and Cyprus became a Roman province. On the division of the empire it fell to the Byzantine rulers. The Arabs conquered it in 648 A.D.; and after several vicissitudes, we find it existing in 1191 as a separate principality. During the third crusade the authorities were imprudent enough to drive off an English fleet which had been driven thither by a storm. This roused the ire of Richard Cœur de Lion, who took the island, and ceded it to the Knights Templars, against whom, however, the native tribes revolted, so that Richard reassumed the sovereignty, and gave it to Guy of Lusignan, the expelled King of Jerusalem. This was in 1192, and for nearly three centuries the Lusignans reigned, and the island flourished under their rule. In 1458 John III. of Lusignan died, and left the kingdom to his only legitimate child, a daughter who was, however, soon dispossessed by her natural brother James, assisted by the Mamelukes of Egypt. James married a Venetian lady, who, surviving both her husband and son, abdicated the throne in favour of the Venetians, who held it until 1571, when it was wrested from them by the Turks, to whom it has ever since been subject. There was an insurrection in 1764, which, though unsuccessful, took three years to subdue, and another in 1823, when there was a fearful massacre of the Greek population. In 1832 the island was occupied by the troops of the Pasha of Egypt, but it was restored to the Sultan in the following year. It is now, as every one knows, under British Government, our flag having been hoisted at Nicosia by Admiral Lord John Hay, on the 14th ult., and Sir Garnet Wolseley, the new Governor and Commander-in-Chief, having taken possession in the name of Her Majesty on the 23rd ult.

CLIMATE, NATURAL HISTORY, AND PRODUCTIONS

MOST extraordinarily contradictory statements have been made in the newspapers in respect to the climate of Cyprus, discrepancies which may, perhaps, in some measure be accounted for by the fact that the two portions of the island, which are divided by the principal chain of mountains, are subject to quite different temperatures. In the north the heat of summer is moderated by the winds from the snow-clad heights of Karamania, whilst the southern frontier is exposed to hot winds, which come from every point of the compass, from the deserts of Kurdestan on the north-east, the sands of Palmyra on the east, the great Arabian desert on the south-east, and from Egypt and Syria on the south and south-west. According to the most reliable authorities, the climate is not essentially unhealthy, although cleanliness, regular living, and suitable clothing are necessary to the preservation of health, especially for new comers. Malignant fevers are very rare, fevers generally are not common, and cases of ague are neither frequent nor severe. Rain is very scarce in summer, and the rivers consequently are very shallow, and in some cases, owing to absence of good outfalls, spread themselves out in the form of stagnant marshes, a source of disease which can only be got rid of by a proper system of irrigation, which woold also effect a great change in the productiveness of the land. The soil is eminently fertile, and though agriculture is in a very backward condition, and much of the island is entirely uncultivated, the vegetable products are considerable. The average annual yield of corn is about 112,000 quarters. Cotton of the finest quality is grown, and amongst other productions are madder, opium, colocynth; oranges, lemons, pomegranates, raisins, and other fruits. The carob, or locust bean, is also very plentiful, and olive trees were formerly very numerous, but the island now consumes all the oil which it produces. Tobacco is grown in small quantities only, in consequence of the vexatious Turkish taxation. Many wild flowers of the most beautiful kinds thrive upon the waste lands, on which also grow wild herbs, thyme, and other odoriferous plants. No fewer than 1,000 different sorts have been discovered in the island. Cyprus is the native place of the cauliflower, which gardeners have developed by a process of natural selection from the Brassica oleracea, the part eaten being the deformed flower-stalks. Although much havoc was made among the timber trees of Cyprus by the ancient ship-builders and copper-smelters, there are still considerable forest tracts in which the cypress, pine, olive, oak, myrtle, and laurel abound. Upon the pastures are reared many oxen, sheep and goats are also reared in large numbers, the flesh being exported for the use of the Turkish army. Feathered game, and fish of all kinds are abundant, there are also foxes and hares, and wild boars are to be found in the forest of Acama, in the western extremity of the island. Dr. Clark says that snakes and other hideous and hurtful reptiles are common, and amongst the other pests of the island he mentions Tarantulæ, and a large spider called the "Galeode of the Levant," the bite of which is very dangerous, and speedy in its effects. Other writers, however, affirm that these terrifying accounts are purely mythical, and that so far from the snakes being venomous, they are the constant playfellows of the children, and that the Cypriotes studiously avoid killing them from a superstitious belief that it is unlucky to do so. It is, however, acknowledged that grasshoppers and locusts, the latter especially, did occasionally great damage to the fields, but in 1868-9 they were almost exterminated by means of a system of trapping them, which was the invention of an Italian settler. His plan was to note the course which the young locusts took, and to dig transverse pits or ditches across it, erecting on the farther side of each ditch a screen some eighteen inches in height. The marauding insects, being young and unable to fly far, marched straight into these traps, and were then easily disposed of. In ancient times, according to Strabo, Cyprus was not only famous for its valuable copper mines, from which its name is supposed to be derived, but gold, silver, and precious stones, including the diamond, emerald, jasper, opal, and agate, were also found there. The localities of these treasures are now unknown, and though copper, asbestos, talc, rock crystal, coal, and various other minerals are known to exist, until recently the Ottoman Government forbade the working of the mines. There are numerous marble and plaster quarries, and talc is very common, especially near Larnaca, and is used for the roofs of houses. Salt is also largely produced on the sea-coast, some 200,000 cwt. being annually exported. Thirty years ago the salt lakes of Larnaca were leased for 400*l.*, but they now produce a clear revenue of 20,000*l.* The list of commodities would not be complete without mention of the famous Cyprus wine, of which there is an average yearly export of 1,246,000 gallons, although the trade has been greatly discouraged by duties amounting to no less than 37 per cent. The principal vineyards are situated around Limasol, and the wine grown is of five qualities. Commanderia, the finest and most in request, is named after the ancient "Commandery" of the Knights Templars; the ordinary kinds of wine are heady, and have a somewhat disagreeable flavour of tar, the results of being kept in tarred casks. Mr. R. Stuart Poole, in an article in the current number of the Contemporary Review, expresses the opinion that it might be well to attempt some improvement of the ordinary wine by inviting some intelligent Germans, skilled both in the cultivation and preparation of wine; but he adds that they should not be permitted to meddle with the Commanderia. Some old families have kept wine in their stores for two and even four hundred years; and it is on record that in 1859 a cask of Commanderia, fully three hundred years old, was sent to Queen Victoria, "as a tribute of respect from the inhabitants of the island which had once been under the sway of one of her predecessors, Richard Cœur de Lion."

THE INHABITANTS

THE population of Cyprus has been variously stated at from 100,000 to 200,000; but the wide difference between these figures will surprise no one who reflects that the only basis of calculation are the returns of the Turkish tax-gatherers.

The Cypriotes are tall and well made; the women being considered very handsome and graceful, though somewhat inclined to corpulency. They make free use of cosmetics, dye their hair and eyebrows with "henna," and wear dresses of the most brilliant colours, with a profusion of gold coins, chains, and trinkets. Their attire consists of an upper robe of cloth, velvet, or silk; an under garment of silk, breeches or drawers, fastened at the ankle, and half-boots of yellow leather; whilst their head-dress is formed of muslin kerchiefs folded so as to form something like a helmet, some eighteen inches in height; and from it depends a veil without which no Oriental lady would think of appearing abroad. They are said to be extremely indolent and voluptuous, and to retain their youthful appearance until between forty and fifty years old; and they very frequently re-marry after they have become great-grandmothers. Both sexes are fond of ease and pleasure; this is possibly in part due to the enervating climate, and in part to the oppression to which they have been so long been subject. Consul Lang, in his Report upon the Industrial Classes of the Island, divides them into three classes: the first includes tailors, shoemakers, carpenters, masons, blacksmiths, cartwrights, and such like, whose earnings vary from three to five shillings a day; the second class are town-labourers, such as porters, boatmen, and domestic servants, who earn from one shilling and sixpence to two shillings and sixpence a day; and the third and most numerous class consists of agricultural labourers, who in harvest time may get as much as three shillings per day, but the rest of the year only receive from elevenpence to one shilling and threepence a day. Their work, however, is rude and simple in the extreme, and the amount of labour which they perform is not to be compared to that done by European workmen. Their mode of life, too, is very simple and inexpensive, and the wages above quoted are certainly not bad when compared with the purchasing power of money, which Mr. Lang tells us is as follows: "In the necessaries of life 15*l.* in Cyprus equals 25*l.* in England. In luxuries 20*l.* in England equals 30*l.* in Cyprus." Owing to the great admixture of different races, Cyprus is a kind of modern Tower of Babel as far as language is concerned. The literary language in historical times has always been Greek, but this has become blended with various dialects brought by emigrants from other countries. Italian is mostly used in commerce, and it and Turkish are spoken generally by the better class, French being very little used. From some ancient inscriptions which were discovered by Mr. Lang, it is conjectured that the aboriginals who occupied the island before the Phœnicians went there, and who are supposed to have been descendants of Javan, one of the sons of Japheth, had a language of their own. Whether these primitive inhabitants had any notion of religion is unknown. The worship of Aphrodite or Venus, and of Jupiter prevailed in early times, and was continued until Paul and Barnabas journeyed through the island as missionaries, and converted the Pro-Consul, Sergius Paulus, by their preaching, and by their miraculous punishment of Elymas the Sorcerer, vide Acts xiii. At present the majority of the inhabitants are Greek Christians, though there are many Armenians and Maronites, with some believers in Islam. The Archbishop of Nicosia is the independent head of the Greek Church in the island; he is assisted by three Bishops, whose Sees are respectively located at Larnaca, Kerinia, and Baffo; and there are no fewer than 1,700 priests under his jurisdiction. Now that the island is under British rule, there is already talk of making some missionary effort on behalf of the Church of England. In art and literature the Cypriotes of modern and mediæval times do not appear to have ever greatly distinguished themselves. Some specimens of the ability of the ancients as sculptors may be seen in the British Museum, and they were also skilful in embroidery. Enclos a prophetic singer, who is said to have foretold the birth and greatness of Homer, was a native of the island, and amongst the ancient poets were Stasinos, the author of the Cyprian Iliad; Cleon, who first wrote the story of the Argonauts; Hermeius, a lyric poet, and Sopatros, a dramatic writer. The general bulk of the people are now extremely ignorant.

THE PRINCIPAL TOWNS

THE ancient towns of Cyprus, according to Strabo, were Arsinoë and Soli, on the northern coast, east of Cape Acamas, which had harbours; Limenia, in the interior; Lapethus, to the east of Cape Crommyon, founded by the Spartans, then Agideus, Aphrodisium, and Carpasia, near to which last-named town was Mount Olympus (not the Olympus near Larnaca), on which was a temple dedicated to Venus, which men only were allowed to enter. Passing round Cape Andreas, near to which are two small islands, called Kleiades, or Keys of Cyprus, and proceeding along the coast we come to Salamis, at the mouth of the Pediæus, said to have been built by Teucer, the brother of Ajax, when he migrated from his native place, the Grecian island of the same name. Farther south was Ammochostos, of which it is said the modern name, Famagosta, is a corruption, a place of importance under the Lusignan dynasty, and the chief port and fortress of the Venetians. It is now chiefly interesting for its ruined palace and churches. Next came Leucolla, near Cape Pedalion, a lofty tract of country called the Table of Venus. To the west of Cape Pedalion, on the site of the modern town of Larnaca, was Citium (the Chittim of Scripture), which was the birthplace of Zeno the Stoic. It is now the chief port of the island, the seat of the British Consulate, and is connected by telegraph with Latakia on the Syrian coast, through Nicosia the capital. West of Citium was Amathus, and Palæa inland. To the westward of Cape Kurias (Gatto) was Curium, with a port built by the Argivi. Around the bend of the coast, which here trends towards the north-west, there were the towns of Treta, Boosura, and Palæ Paphos (Old Paphos), another Arsinoë, with a port, temple, and sacred grove, and New Paphos, which was built by Agapenor, an Arcadian chief, who, while returning from the Siege of Troy, was driven ashore during a storm, and founded a kingdom there. In the time of Augustus the town was destroyed by an earthquake, but it was rebuilt and became a place of some importance in spite of the insecurity of the harbour, which was only frequented in summer. Its modern name is Baffo, but it is now a very small place, although it is the See of a Greek Bishop. Lefkosia, or, as it is more commonly called, Nicosia (the ancient Ledra), is situated near the centre of the island, and is surrounded by beautiful gardens. It is the capital, and was formerly the abode of the Lusignan Kings of Cyprus and was then much larger than now, the Venetians having destroyed some portions of it to strengthen that which they retained. For the last 300 years the Turkish governors have resided there. Besides the churches, a description of which will be found in another paragraph, it has a market, a caravanserai, the Governor's Palace, the gateway of which is still ornamented with the Venetian lion in stone. The Venetian walls are still standing, but the ancient mansions are fast falling into ruin, and the streets, like those of most Eastern towns, are narrow and dirty. The town has a small trade in raw cotton and wine, carpets, cotton prints, and morocco leather. The three last-mentioned, with that of silk cloths, are the only manufactures of the island. The leather dressers have a secret method of preparing it, which is said to make it more durable and more brilliant in colour than that produced elsewhere.

Of the roads of Cyprus we are tempted to say, as a certain writer did respecting the snakes of Ireland, "There are none." Certain accustomed routes from place to place are of course recognised, but during the three hundred years of Turkish misgovernment no new roadway has been constructed, nor apparently anything done to repair those which previously existed. The favourite method of travelling is by saddle-mules and donkeys, and the camel is largely employed as a beast of burden. The muleteers, who also act as guides, are noted for their honesty and civility, but their great fault is lack of punctuality.

THE CHURCHES OF NICOSIA

THE Church of St. Sophia at Nicosia is, next to the Cathedral at Famagosta, the most important Christian edifice now existing in Cyprus. Both of these remarkable buildings have suffered much at the hands of the Turks, who, in converting them into mosques, left no effort untried to rob them of their ecclesiastical character. Notwithstanding this, these churches still retain much to interest the lover of mediæval architecture.

The Church of St. Sophia consists of a nave of grand height, terminating in a short apsidal chancel, aisles, and two western towers, the upper portions of which are entirely destroyed, and are replaced by two rather ugly minarets. The west front, in its former condition, must have been a singularly striking and original architectural composition. The west wall of the nave stopped short at the east side of the towers, and was there pierced by a magnificent Gothic window of six lights, which still exists tolerably perfect; below this window is the chief portal to the church. The space between the two towers was two storeys high, the lower formed a deep vaulted porch; the upper formed a vaulted gallery open to the exterior, so that both the great west window and the portal below it were seen through deeply-vaulted spaces. The effect of these great masses of dark shadow contrasting with the bright sunlight upon the solid towers must have been solemn and striking to a wonderful degree. As the Kings were crowned in this church, it is very possible that this great external gallery may have been in some way connected with the coronation service; perhaps the King appeared in this gallery in his crown and robes, to show himself to the people, as the Pope does after his coronation at St. Peter's, Rome. The whole building is lighted with magnificent "decorated" Gothic windows, very similar to those of Exeter Cathedral, and is supported by vast flying buttresses. There can be little doubt that the architect was a Frenchman, and the date of erection must be somewhere between the years 1260 and 1290. There is a little ancient glass existing in the west window; but the Turks have greatly disfigured the noble interior. The chancel is screened off and serves as a gallery for the women. As in the English and French cathedrals there is a "triforium," or shallow gallery, all round the building.

The dimensions of the church are about 300 feet by 112 feet. Like the churches in Spain and Portugal, there is no external roof over the vaultings, &c., as will be seen from our view showing the buttress staircase. The "extrados" of the vaults is visible from the exterior; with this exception, the whole treatment of the church is purely French, and, singular to relate, it is totally unlike any ecclesiastical building in Syria or Palestine, but in many respects it bears a resemblance to the great Cathedral at Famagosta. The little Church of St. Nicholas (or Nichalous) as shown in our view close to the larger Church of St. Sophia, is a small Byzantine building of quite an Eastern type, and has a low central octagonal lantern crowned with a flat dome, so common in the Syrian churches, and also to be found in the early churches in the south of France, Spain, Greece, and Armenia. The doorway is ornamented with sculpture. There is a third ancient church in Nicosia, originally dedicated to St. Catherine. It is a small, but early, building. It is much to be desired that some architect would carefully examine and illustrate these most interesting examples of Gothic architecture. As in Cyprus, the French architects of the Middle Ages were called upon to perform exactly the same task which our architects have to accomplish in India, and there can be no doubt that a careful examination of these churches would offer many valuable hints and suggestions. For instance, what could be a finer treatment for a hot climate than the noble open vaulted gallery which adorned the west front of St. Sophia at Nicosia? The Churches of St. Sophia and the Cathedral at Famagosta throw a most remarkable light upon the history of the island, as they prove that during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the civilisation of Cyprus was to a great extent French in character, and that the old Greek element had disappeared both as to religion and customs. No buildings of such a distinctly Northern Gothic type are to be found anywhere else out of Europe, and it is greatly to be hoped that they will receive protection at the hands of our Government, and will be preserved from further injury or destruction.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL REMAINS

PHŒNICIAN, Assyrian, and Greek antiquities are very numerous in Cyprus, and some of them are very beautiful. General Cesnola, the American Consul, has recently published a very interesting account of his excavations during a residence of ten years on the island. He says that the fortifications of Famagosta are as intact and impregnable as when first built by the Lusignans out of the ruins of ancient Salamis, the old bronze guns of the Venetian Republic are still mounted on the bastion, and the military governor with a company of artillery resides in a small fort overlooking the sea and flanked by a round tower called "Torre del Moro," which is said to have been the headquarters of the Venetian Lord-Lieutenant Christoforo Moro (the Othello of Shakespeare). The town is stated to have had at one time no fewer than three hundred churches, of which only two now remain. The places at which explorations have been most successful are Idalium, Golgos, Curium, and Amathus.

PROBABLE RESULTS OF BRITISH RULE

WHATEVER divergence of opinion there may be as to the justice or policy of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, there can be no question but that the radical change now being effected in the system of government must prove of enormous benefit to the island of Cyprus. Not only will all classes and creeds creeds be placed in the full enjoyment of civil and religious liberty; but many physical improvements will be effected with all possible dispatch, good roads will be made, harbours will be established, and many of the towns will be improved and enlarged. European capitalists are already flocking to the island, eager to commence business either as farmers, merchants, or manufacturers; and in a few years we may expect to see Cyprus holding a very different position in the commercial world to that which she now occupies.

With regard to the strategical value of the island, it must be remembered that while the Convention binds us to do no more in the way of aiding Turkey than the force of circumstances might compel us to do should Russia attempt to make any farther advance into Asia Minor, we are enabled by the possession of Cyprus to organise a military and naval depot much closer to the shores of Asia Minor than we otherwise could do, and this must operate, to some extent at least, as a check on any possible designs in that direction which the Czar may yet entertain. In any case, England can hardly be charged with cupidity in acquiring the island, since we have agreed to restore it to the Turks in the event of Russia retiring from Kars, Ardahan, and Batoum, and have engaged not only to carry on the government of the place without cost to the Sultan, but to hand over to him any surplus revenue which may be produced. Sir Garnet Wolseley has been joyfully received by the inhabitants, who have sense enough to know that many beneficent changes in their condition will be made without delay, and that there is abundant promise of a future of happiness and prosperity for their island which in the past has so continuously groaned beneath the yoke of her oppressors.

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

"INDIAN Grooms and Bheesties on the Field" represents a body of camp-followers attached to our Indian contingent, who are now encamped near Larnaca. The grooms are provided with a sort of whip-duster made of horse-hair, with which to keep the flies from fretting the officer's horses. The Bheesties, or sick-bearers, carry a kind of palanquin, or litter, for the use of the invalid or wounded soldiers, whilst the Musucks, or water-carriers, bear skins of water for the relief of the thirsty.—"Drinking Cyprus Wine" is a sketch taken in the British division of the camp at Larnaca.—"Hoisting the British Standard" is from a sketch by Mr. J. M'Carthy, the military surgeon in charge at Nicosia, and is thus described by him—"To officiate at this ceremony, a party of three officers, and fifty-three rank and file, composed of Royal Marine Artillery and Light Infantry, under the command of Captain Kelly, R.M.A., were landed at Larnaca, from H.M.S. Minotaur, on the night of the 12th July, and marched inland to the capital city, Nicosia, a distance of about twenty-five miles. A great demonstration took place on our arrival there. We were met at the south gate by some thousands of people, and escorted by them, amidst loud cries of 'Zita,' Brava, Queen Victoria,' through all the main streets of the town. These were so narrow and the crowd so dense that this promenade of about one mile was one of the most fatiguing parts of our journey. After a short rest at the Turkish barracks the men were paraded in front of the flagstaff, and the British flag hoisted by Captain Rawson, of H.M.S. Minotaur, the troops coming to the salute, and the multitude cheering vociferously. Admiral Lord John Hay then announced to all assembled in a brief, clear speech that he had taken possession of the island in the name of Queen Victoria. This called forth new applause, and the ceremony, which made an interesting addition to our Empire, concluded. The crowd dispersed rapidly, and in a few minutes the ground was left to the solitary sentry whose proud duty it was to be the first to guard Old England's banner in our new possession." The subjects represented in our other engravings of Cyprus have already been alluded to in the foregoing account of the island. They are from photographs kindly lent to us by Mr. Dominic Colnaghi, who was for some time British Consul in the island.

Magazines

IN the Fortnightly Review for August Mr. S. Laing, M.P., discusses "The Convention with Turkey," urging the same criticisms and objections that were put forward by himself and the other speakers on the Opposition side during the recent debate in the House of Commons. To give an outline of his arguments is thus unnecessary, and would, besides, take up too much space; but the gist of his contention is that, "under the pretext of strengthening our Indian Empire against Russian aggression, we are incurring certain and immediate dangers which far outweigh the remote and improbable contingencies of which we are afraid, and acting in diametrical opposition to the teachings of Indian experience and the maxims of Indian statesmen." Mr. Anthony Trollope gives us a sketch of a visit paid by him "the other day" to Iceland—lively and entertaining enough, though hardly containing any fresh information of importance; and Mr. W. R. Greg attempts some "Rectifications" of certain economical views expressed by Mr. John Morley in his article on the late strike in Lancashire, in the previous number, which appear to him unsound, and likely, if unopposed, to prove mischievous. M. de Laveleye's article on "Belgian Politics" is able, and may be read with interest even by those who are very far from being in sympathy with its tone. All political questions in Belgium, according to the writer, are now resolved into the one contest between the Liberals and the clergy. The struggle which has long been in progress on the Continent between the "modern spirit" and the older spirit represented by the Papacy may be watched and studied most conveniently and advantageously in Belgium. It is quite evident that M. de Laveleye's interest in this struggle is not that of the mere on-looker.—Mr. Saintsbury, this month, analyses with his wonted ability and discrimination the writings and genius of Henry Murger, the author of "Scènes de la Vie de Bohème;" and the fierce party pamphlet, entitled "The Political Adventures of Lord Beaconsfield," is apparently brought to a conclusion. The writer's comparison between the respective manners and characters as orators and leaders of the House of Commons of Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone is very good, and well worth quoting had we the space for it, but, as we have before remarked, his intense and rancorous animosity towards Lord Beaconsfield deprives his estimate of that statesman of any claim to real or permanent value. The estimate, in fact, refutes itself by its extravagance. No one not blinded by passion would deny Lord Beaconsfield's right to eminent rank among the leaders of party in this country, but the compound of charlatan, visionary, and adventurer, "the Cagliostro-Chatham," of the writer's over-heated fancy could only have won power and distinction among contemporaries ready to be made the victims of the "confidence" trick.

A very noticeable feature in the Nineteenth Century is an article by Mr. E. D. J. Wilson on "The 'Friends of the Foreigner' Seventy Years Ago," giving a most instructive sketch of the policy of carping and cavilling, depreciation of English successes, and prophecies of English failures, pursued by the Whig Opposition under Lords Grey and Holland, and Tierney, Romilly, and Brougham, throughout the Peninsular War. The sketch, we say, is instructive because, as Mr. Wilson points out, "It is seen that the Opposition at the present day has reproduced with painfully curious exactitude the errors which shattered the Whig party two generations ago as an organised political force, and established the supremacy of the Tories in the State for a quarter of a century. . . . In every controversy to assume that this country is in the wrong, to attribute base motives, to predict disastrous consequences, such have been the persistent 'notes' of Liberal criticism ever since the Conservative Government came into power."—Miss Florence Nightingale's article on "The People of India" deserves a much fuller notice than we can afford it here. We can only say that the points Miss Nightingale insists on most strongly are the necessity, with the view of preventing famines, of providing the natives of India, and especially of Southern India, with improved irrigation, and, farther, of furnishing them with some just and legal means of help against the exactions of the money-lender.—Mrs. Fawcett attempts a reply to Mrs. Sutherland Orr's paper on "The Future of Englishwomen," published in the Nineteenth Century for June—as it seems to us with but indifferent success. As a reason for thinking that the "emancipated" woman of the future will not be so very different from the women the world has been accustomed to see, Mrs. Fawcett bids us consider the case of domestic servants. These "are entirely self-supporting and independent, with a career, and, in a humble way, a competency of their own." Yet we do not find them without the capacity for love, or any way disinclined towards matrimony. It is obvious to remark on this that these women are doing essentially women's work, and have not been trained as men to compete with men in the battle of life—that is to say, have been uninfluenced by the conditions which Mrs. Orr apprehends may have so portentous an effect.—Mr. W. H. Mallock contributes a very clever and interesting "Colloquy on Recent Art," the drift of which is to insist that the art of painters like Mr. Burne-Jones and poets like Mr. Swinburne is the art of a debased and depraved age, which has lost the sense for moral good and evil. "The world," says the chief interlocutor, "has been taught that its one standard of action, its one thing to live for, is happiness in this life. This teaching is gradually changing the world." No one has so delicate, though it may be so unconscious, a sense of this change as a gifted artist, and the change is to be traced most clearly in such an artist's pictures. Happiness in this life is to be the aim of the world, and what that happiness is to be like we may gather from such pictures as the "Laus Veneris" and the "Chant d'Amour." Mr. Mallock's argument is in effect one we have had from him more than once before—that the old morality will not stand without the support of the old faith. His paper is, at any rate, most suggestive of thought, and well worth careful attention; as are also Lord Stratford de Redcliffe's "Recollections of the Revival of Greek Independence," which relate his personal experiences from August, 1823, to November, 1827; and Mr. Grant Duff's notice of "Senior's Conversations," though we have no room left to speak of either paper at length.

In the Cornhill we are gratified with another of Mr. Leslie Stephen's ever-welcome "Hours in a Library," devoted to the first Edinburgh Reviewers, a body of whose merits as critics and politicians Mr. Stephen entertains but a very poor opinion. "Let us speak the plain truth at once," he says. "Every one who turns from the periodical literature of the present day to the original Edinburgh Review will be amazed at its inferiority. It is generally dull, and, when not dull, flimsy. . . . As a rule one may most easily characterise the contents by saying that few of the articles would have a chance of acceptance by the editor of a first-class periodical to-day; and that the majority belong to an inferior variety of what is now called 'padding.'" Nor is Mr. Stephen content with generalities, but examines in succession the writings of Horner, Brougham, Jeffrey, and Sydney Smith, pointing out that the work in each case is often poor and commonplace, and never attains real critical value. We have from Mr. W. G. Palgrave a most glowing picture of "Malay Life in the Philippines." He discourses with positive rapture not only of the tropical beauties of this earthly Paradise, but of the simple and primitive virtues of its Malay population, most of whom seem to have embraced Catholicism, or such a version of it as their minds are capable of receiving. We appear intended, indeed, to regard the Philippine Islands as a Garden of Eden into which what Mr. Palgrave now considers the serpents of European enterprise and European capital have not yet penetrated.—The article on "The Origin of Fruits" contains some curious and original speculation; and that entitled "Orpheus and Eurydice: the Lesson of a Bas-Relief," some delicate and clear-sighted criticism on the right manner of regarding works of art; and we have also a very readable account of Lessing's life and works.

Belgravia contains one of Mr. R. A. Proctor's popular scientific papers on "The Moon's Myriad Small Craters"—a paper which is a very happy example of the method of first advancing by strictly à priori reasoning, and then considering how far the results thus arrived at will bear out and agree with the facts of the case as they are known to us. Mr. Proctor believes that the innumerable small craters to be observed in the moon by the aid of powerful telescopes are due to the action of meteors; but we must leave readers to learn his reasons for this judgment for themselves. We do not know that there is much else to call for attention in the magazine, unless it be an attempt to establish a parallel between Finn MacCool, a hero of Celtic legendary lore, and the Falstaff of Shakespeare.

ALL THE WORLD AT PARIS

CHAPTER II.

"Mais, Monsieur Martin, avez-vous vu Paris?" "Oui, j'ai vu Paris; c'est un chaos, c'est une presse dans laquelle tout le monde cherche le plaisir."

I DID not tell you that Lilly drew, and that I (Lolly) wrote the diary, and read up the guide-books.

In fact Lilly is artistic; I am literary; papa is mechanical, mamma economical; Charlie diabolical.

Well, then, to begin the diary.

Papa never goes anywhere without that other child of his, the boot-cleaning machine. This morning he and Charlie got up very early indeed, and cleaned all the boots outside the doors on our floor, and the affair would have gone off very happily, if they hadn't forgotten which boots belonged to which doors. This delayed us a little. Then we started for our first day at the Exhibition.

Papa had not forgotten his ticket with the photograph at the back. When the exhibitors were all requested to send two portraits of themselves to Paris, they were delighted. They imagined that one would go to form a vast album of exhibitors, itself to be exhibited; while the other would probably be given to Marshal MacMahon.

Papa went straight up to town to the London Stereoscopic Company, and was photographed with his hand on a boot-cleaning machine.

At the gate he presented this carte.

Four or five sergents-de-ville and two or three soldiers had to compare it with the original. "C'est lui," "Mais non," "C'est bien lui," "Pas du tout," they jabbered. At last the "Ayes" had it. Papa was admitted, doubting his own identity, and we followed, after witnessing from afar that dear face torn feature from feature.

Detestable tribe of the type Javert! But for you our first impression of the Great Exhibition of 1878 had been a charming one. Now it seems nothing but the apotheosis of the mouchard.

After the policeman, the first thing we saw was an arm-chair on wheels (fauteuil roulant). Papa sank into it (beginning to realise his own identity, for he weighs eighteen stone), and Lilly, wanting to sketch, perched on the front seat. Had she been dressed in any other fashion than the present this would have been impossible.

Then we started on our pursuit of knowledge.

I carried the guide-book. My mind (such as it is) and the body of our "tug" (or French dragoman) were torn this way and that by questions and jerks innumerable.

How glad I was when it was over, and we were basking in the solemn calm of the table d'hôte. What a convivial repast it is! What a feast of reason and what flow of soul! If cheerfulness promotes digestion, then a dinner at table d'hôte never can digest!

We formed a little oasis of chat by ourselves, but the rest of the people sat bolt upright, like sphinxes, each trying to read the riddle of the other, and wincing and winking nervously if they caught one another's eye.

Even wine cannot warm the hearts of diners at table d'hôte, not even ordinaire at two francs the bottle.

Every one was grateful to Providence when something occurred in the court outside—something to look at. We turned with the rest, and saw a procession of men carrying baths marching in review past us. How very embarrassing! Papa had ordered a bath apiece for us, and they must needs come just at this awkward minute. We tried to look unconscious, but Charlie said aloud, "There are our baths."

MUSIC

COVENT GARDEN PROMENADE CONCERTS.——These entertainments, though of a mixed character, do much good after their kind. Many are attracted exclusively by the music, a still larger number by its surroundings—the show, and glitter, and bustling animation of the scene. The Messrs. Gatti have already for some years proved themselves skilful purveyors, able to satisfy both sections of the community. How these gentlemen are accustomed to decorate the arena in which the performances are held, so as to gratify sight-seers, who, like Othello, "care not greatly for music that may be heard," and how they provide comfort, by consolation behind the orchestra, for amateurs who can endure an operatic "selection," or a galop, but would be bored by a symphony or a concerto, need hardly be said. In their way, in short, they are the best of caterers. We shall, therefore, avoid details referring to this special department of their undertaking, limiting ourselves to some few remarks about the music. Signor Arditi having seceded, the Messrs. Gatti could not have done better than obtain the services of Mr. Arthur Sullivan as chief conductor; though not a few may express surprise at the fact of the composer of The Light of the World, &c., occupying a post so seemingly out of his sphere. Nevertheless, his presidence can only tend to good; and if such a public as that which flocks to the Promenade Concerts can by any means be educated into a love for what is musically pure and healthy, he is just the man to achieve that miracle, being, as he undoubtedly is, the most popular musician of the hour. Mr. Sullivan has begun well by providing a very efficient and powerful orchestra, some eighty in number, with M. A. Burnett as chief violin, comprising in its ranks many of the most practised executants we can boast—such an orchestra, by the way, as not only would have shown a good front at the Trocadéro against any competitors, but have played somewhat better music than that selected by Signors Faccio and Pedrotti, in honour of Milan and Turin. The overtures to Oberon and Guillaume Tell, which respectively began and terminated the first part of the programme, convincingly established its excellence in all particulars, as also the thorough competency of the master who held the bâton. Another noticeable point was Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto in G (first of his only two), the solo part in which was played with more than ordinary ability by Miss Josephine Lawrence, a young artist of genuine talent, who has well profited by the instructions received at different periods from Madame Arabella Goddard and Mr. Franklin Taylor—both examples for any promising aspirant. Miss Lawrence was much and deservedly applauded, especially after the slow movement and finale. The first for the unaffected expression, the last for vigour and neatness, were unquestionably the most commendable features in her rendering of a concerto which, perhaps, has put to a crucial test the fingers of more pianists, from the highest to the lowest, than any other work of the kind these forty years. The other orchestral display was in the "bruyant" prelude to the wedding-scene of Wagner's Lohengrin. This, side by side with the pieces we have named, despite its overwrought instrumentation, sounded tame enough. The remainder was devoted to vocal solos in which Mdlle. Alma Verdini, Miss Anna Williams, Messrs. Maybrick and Edward Lloyd assisted. The honours of the evening fell to Mr. Lloyd, who in Sullivan's "Once again" (among other things) obtained an encore too unanimous to be declined, and thus we were treated to another ballad from the same pen. Miss Williams gave "Robin Adair" with charming simplicity, and Mr. Maybrick his own "Tar's Farewell," to which many would have preferred his "Nancy Lee." Mdlle. Verdini, a stranger of prepossessing appearance, made considerable impression in an air from La Traviata, but was more successful in the second part of the concert with the once so popular waltz by Venzano, "Ah che assorto," in which her facility and the legitimate quality of her upper tones were heard to signal advantage. A pot-pourri upon the most familiar melodies in Mr. Sullivan's Sorcerer, ingeniously arranged by Mr. Jacobi, in which the band of the Coldstreams, under Mr. F. Godfrey, joined the regular orchestra, and a cornet solo, played by Mr. H. Reynolds (Schubert's "Ständchen"), were also conspicuous in the second part. In the absence of M. Métra, the duties of assistant-conductor were fulfilled by Mr. Cellier. A symphony by Beethoven is to be performed every Monday during the series of concerts; so that we shall have from No. 1 (already given) to No. 8—the whole "glorious company," with the exception of the most glorious of all—the "Choral." On every Wednesday we are promised a so-called "Classical Night." At the first of these (on Wednesday last) the great orchestral pieces were Schumann's Symphony in B flat (No. 1), and Beethoven's great overture to Leonora (Fidelio)—generally, but, as some will have it, erroneously accepted as "No. 3." To this feature of the Promenade Concert scheme, however, we must refer more particularly on another occasion.

WAIFS.——At the last concert in the Kurhaus, the great violinist, Joseph Joachim, played Spohr's ninth concerto, the andante from his own Hungarian concerto, and some pieces by Bach. He was received with great enthusiasm. On the same occasion Mr. Sebastian Bach Mills, the famous American pianist, gave Chopin's concerto in F minor.—Madame Christine Nilsson has left Mont d'Or, and is now in Paris. She returns shortly to England. All idea of her revisiting the United States is for the present abandoned. The reports of her monetary losses in America, are, we believe, much over-stated.—It appears that the "Monday Popular Concerts" held in the Town Hall, Melbourne (Australia), "have become an institution." Mr. Arthur Chappell should be proud to know that the influence of his example has penetrated to the antipodes.—Mdlle. Kraus having returned to Paris, the production of Gounod's new opera, Polyeucte, cannot be much longer deferred.—A French adaptation of Aïda, produced at the Théâtre Lyrique (Salle Ventadour), does not seem to have created a very strong impression, the cast of the dramatis personæ being not over-powerful.—The Academy of Fine Arts has come into possession of the annuity of 6,000 francs bequeathed by Rossini for the best poem and its best musical setting. The candidature is open to all comers, year after year.—The vocalising students from Upsala and Christiana, so well received at the Trocadéro, have sung precisely the same pieces as we heard in London, (at St. James's Hall), two years ago. Their répertoire does not appear to be very extensive.—The veteran Scandinavian fiddler, Ole Bull, still keeps a firm grasp of the instrument to which he owes his fame. He is now giving concerts in Norway, with Mdlle. Stella Faustina (the "Adelina Patti en herbe," who was to have come out this year at Her Majesty's Theatre), and M. Maurice Strakosch.—The marble bust of Franz Schubert, erecting at Stuttgardt, the capital of Wurtemberg, is shortly to be inaugurated.—The amateurs of Turin, vain of the success obtained by Signor Pedrotti at the orchestral concerts in the Trocadéro, Paris, have presented him with a magnificent conductor's stick.—The "Charles Albert" Requiem Mass for 1879 is to be composed by Giuseppe Vaninetti.—Massenet's Roi de Lahore will be given next season at Bologna, under the direction of Signor Faccio, the eminent Milanese conductor.—The projected celebration of the centenary of the Scala, at Milan, is abandoned, and the money subscribed will be devoted to repairing and redecorating the building (not, by the way, before it was wanted).—A collection of Hindoo musical instruments and writings on Hindoo music has been presented to the Royal Museum by the Rajah Sourindro Mohun, of Tagore, who, last year, made a similar bequest to the Museum at Brussels.—It is said that Mdlles. Valleria and Tremelli, as well as Signors Runcio, Foli, &c., from Her Majesty's Theatre, are about to make a concert tour in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, accompanied by M. Musin, as violinist, and Mr. F. Cowen as conductor.—A monument to the celebrated composer, Cimarosa, is, we are informed, to be erected in his native town, Aversa.

LEGAL

THE POISONOUS VIOLET POWDER CASE.——Mr. King, the wholesale chemist who manufactured the adulterated violet powder the use of which has caused the deaths of about a dozen children, was on Wednesday tried at the Central Criminal Court for manslaughter, there being six separate indictments against him. It will be remembered that the "violet powder," which is a compound of starch and orris root, was mixed with terra alba or sulphate of lime in order that it might be sold at a lower price, and that by some unexplained mistake, either on the part of Mr. King or of the persons from whom he purchased the ingredients in bulk, a large proportion of arsenic found its way into the powder, with the results above stated. It is only fair to Mr. King to state that as soon as he knew of the matter he did all he could to stop the sale of the noxious stuff, and the jury being directed by Mr. Justice Field, that to justify a conviction they must be satisfied that gross and criminal neglect had been proved, returned a verdict of not guilty in the only case tried. The other indictments were subsequently withdrawn, the judge remarking that there was no ground for imputing blame to Messrs. Fox, who had supplied the prisoner with the terra-alba. The public can hardly be congratulated on the result of the inquiry, which, however, may possibly lead to some good in the shape of more stringent regulations respecting the sale of poisons. The mere idea of a deadly drug like arsenic being sold by the ton is in itself alarming.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——There is great dissatisfaction existing in the ranks of the Metropolitan Police on the score of the alleged inadequacy of their pay. It is rumoured that they have determined to hold a mass meeting, and to present a petition to Parliament, if they do not soon receive a favourable answer to the petition which four months ago they presented to the authorities at Scotland Yard. Colonel Henderson has issued a circular telling them that the matter is being carefully considered, and advising them to refrain from any "unseemly conduct."—At the Derby Assizes the other day, Mr. Justice Hawkins refused to take any official cognizance of the High Sheriff of the county, because he appeared in Court in an ordinary morning coat, and moreover threatened to impose a fine of 50*l.* upon him if he again appeared without uniform or diplomatic costume. The High Sheriff "protested," but next day he very wisely donned the only uniform he possessed, viz., that of a captain of Volunteers.—The Town Council of Blackburn have sanctioned the payment of bills in connection with the late riots amounting to 3,358*l.*—Several actions for libel are now pending against our gossipy contemporary Truth. In one the plaintiff is a Turkish subject named Lambri, whose complaint is that he was accused of getting a living by cheating at cards and gambling at certain West End clubs. In another case, the plaintiffs, who are directors of the Westminster Aquarium, have asked the Divisional Court to issue a writ against the defendant for contempt of Court in publishing the defence which he intended to offer when the case came on for hearing. The Lord Chief Baron said he viewed the conduct of Mr. Labouchere with the strongest disapprobation; but these fresh libels were not likely to prejudice the trial, and were not a contempt of Court. Mr. Justice Mellor thought differently, and spoke of the course pursued by Mr. Labouchere as un-English, unjust, and unfair. As the court was divided in opinion, no order was made. In a third case, the musical critic of The Times, who had been accused of giving unfavourable notices of the performances of vocalists, unless they paid a kind of blackmail to an agent with whom he was said to be in league, applied for a criminal injunction, which was, however, refused, on the ground that he had his remedy by action or indictment.—Another libel action, brought by an ex-lieutenant of the Coldstream Guards against the Army and Navy Gazette, has ended in a verdict for the defendant, the jury adding that they had much pleasure in stating that they believed Dr. Russell (the editor) had no personal feeling against the plaintiff, and that he had not acted under any influence from the Horse Guards.—One of the Hindoo conjurors brought over to this country by Dr. Lynn was taken before the Brentford magistrates the other day for behaving in a disorderly manner at a house occupied by Dr. Lynn's brother. The Hindoo stated that he had gone there to see the Doctor, who owed him 30*l.* for arrears of salary. He was discharged with a caution, it being explained to him that he should proceed in the County Court if money was owing to him.—The call-boy at the Opera Comique, who was accused of stealing 90*l.*, has got off with the light sentence of three weeks' imprisonment, Mr. Vaughan having apparently been much impressed with his "smartness." He denied having stolen more than 5*l.*, and when asked to account for his having recently spent 17*l.*, he said that he "occasionally did a little betting."—The one-sidedness of the new Matrimonial Causes Act is exemplified in a case which was heard this week at Wandsworth. The husband, an army pensioner, complained that his wife frequently got drunk, and had thrice pledged everything in the house, which he had as many times redeemed. On the previous day she threw flower-pots at him, pelted him with eggs, bit his leg, and broke open the door of a room into which he had retired to avoid striking her. Mr. Paget suggested (he could not order) a separation, and the complainant expressed himself willing to allow his wife a maintenance, but the virago would not hear of such an arrangement. She had married her husband for better or worse, and would stay with him. She was remanded for a week.—The Fenian, Robert Kelly, who in 1871 was sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude for wounding Head Constable Talbot, has been liberated after serving seven years on Spike Island. His health is much shattered. It will be remembered that Talbot died of his wounds, and that Kelly was first tried for wilful murder but acquitted, it having been contended that Talbot's death had resulted from unskilful medical treatment.—On Tuesday, a man named Wood, the keeper of a public-house at Stepney shot a man through the heart, and immediately afterwards shot himself through the head, death in each case being instantaneous. Wood had been for some time suffering from delirium tremens.—Last week, at Burton, near Swindon, a widow named Seymour strangled her daughter, aged nineteen, and her daughter's illegitimate child, aged two years, by tying stockings around their throats, and afterwards committed suicide by tying a sash-line around her own.

Cr. 8vo., Cloth, 4s.

SEA SONGS. By W. C. Bennett. "While Dr. Bennett's new volume of sea songs is admirably qualified to attract maritime hearers, many of them are as well fitted to be sung in the drawing room as on the bosom of the Atlantic. Simple, free, flowing, and full of buoyant vigour, they are now stirring and joyous in tone, and again unaffectedly pathetic. Their writer has caught the genuine ring and flavour of salt winds and blue foamy waves. He gives us songs of parting—graceful, simple, and tender—songs that tell of lonely musings in tropic calms, of ships beating amid sleet and snow 'round the Horn,' stealing under clouds of canvas after flying foes, or sweeping into palmy isles over the Pacific swell; and he discourses with the fiery energy of diction of the great deeds of Blake and Anson, Vernon and Pellew—naval worthies whom his songs should make more than names to the people. In short, Dr. Bennett's new volume is altogether excellent, and can scarcely fail to attain extensive popularity."—Scotsman.

THE OCCUPATION OF CYPRUS—SKETCHES AT LARNACA

Topics of the Week

The Caucus System Again.——The remarks made by us last week on the excessive organisation of political parties received a striking illustration in the correspondence between Mr. Forster and Mr. Illingworth. The latter gentleman insisted that the former should allow himself to be proposed to the Liberal Three Hundred of Bradford as candidate for that city; the rule being that if the Three Hundred rejected him he should abide by their decision. Mr. Forster declined this honour; and we sincerely hope that every politician to whom a like suggestion is made will act with the same courage. The system which the founders of these societies are trying to impose on the country is simply this, that the political interests of every constituency should be in the hands of a few local busybodies. If a candidate meets their approval, he will be allowed to stand; if they are dissatisfied, he must abandon all hope of a political career. Were this beautiful ideal realised, statesmen would no longer exist. We should merely have a Parliament of nobodies, elected for the purpose, not of seriously considering great questions, but of voting straight. Men who respect themselves would retire in disgust from a calling which has hitherto always been able to command much of the highest intellect of the country; and citizens of independent judgment would cease to take part in elections which they could not hope to influence. If all this were mere speculation, it might be safely neglected; but the arguments against the caucus system are directly based upon the experience of the United States. We admit that in that country the system of replacing all officials at every change of Government is an additional source of corruption; but this system is itself the result of the excessive allegiance demanded from the individual by his party. Should the nation ever be ruled in the manner now proposed, we may be quite sure that the American principle will be carried out to its logical issues; and then we shall sink to the level from which our Transatlantic kinsfolk are in vain struggling to raise themselves. Our best chance of safety is to resist this dangerous innovation in its beginnings. Mr. Gladstone and Lord Beaconsfield have unfortunately committed themselves; but it is not too late for other statesmen to follow the example set by Mr. Forster, nor for the people themselves to assert their freedom against their would-be guides and despots.

The Grouse.——After many weeks and indeed months of anxious fears and hopes, the latter predominating, the grouse shooters have got to work. Reports from the moors, which in some seasons are concocted by fraudulent lessors and conniving keepers in order to entrap unwary Southrons, have been thoroughly substantiated as to their accuracy on the present occasion, and things have turned out as favourably as they had been painted. Hardly a semblance of the dreaded epidemic is to be found in any district; the young birds are numerous, strong on the wing, and very healthy; while the weather on the great majority of moors has during the few days of the shooting been all that could be desired. Large bags, too, the best criterion of all, are recorded in all directions; and that more prosaic test of a good or bad season, viz., the price per brace of birds at the poulterers, shows that grouse are abundant. The only drawback to the shooting which we have yet heard of is the fact that on some moors the birds have already begun to pack, owing to the dry weather; but this is a difficulty soon got over by having recourse to driving, which, notwithstanding all that is said against it by sportsmen of the old school, and its acknowledged inferiority as a sport to shooting birds over dogs, is still legitimate and enjoyable enough. A feature of modern grouse-shooting which seems to have made a marked advance this season is the renting of moors by "companies" on the joint-stock principle. Several well-known shootings, especially south of the Tweed, have this year been worked on this principle; and others have been opened on the ticket system. On the Bromhead Moors, for instance, on Monday last no fewer than thirty-two gentlemen, chiefly from Manchester and other manufacturing centres, availed themselves of this privilege, notwithstanding that 40*l.* per ticket was the figure paid for six days' ordinary shooting and two days' driving. At any rate this is a sign that there is plenty of money in some quarters, and no lack of love for sport.

Carrying Out the Treaty of Berlin.——When the Plenipotentiaries at the Congress separated, the general opinion was that all difficulties had been for the time overcome. No sooner, however, have the Powers directly concerned in the settlement begun to give it effect, than very serious obstacles have presented themselves. England, indeed, has quietly taken possession of Cyprus, the climate being her only enemy; but Austria has not had this good fortune. The Bosnians have vigorously resisted the occupation, and grave fears are entertained that there may still be a good deal of bloodshed. It is foolish to declaim against the action of the inhabitants; their hostility is only what ought to have been expected. Whatever is to be said of the poorer classes, the well-off proprietors have had every reason to like the administration of the Porte. They have been let alone, and they know well that, when Austria is predominant, there will be a vast amount of most effectual interference with their customs and prejudices. If we turn from Europe to Asia, we find a very similar spectacle. The Lazis of Batoum detest the idea of being handed over to Russia; they have hoisted the British flag, and proclaim that they throw themselves on British protection. The probability is, therefore, that Russia will have hardly less difficulty in getting hold of her new port than Austria has experienced in obtaining the mastery of Bosnia. Turkey is being severely lectured about this state of things; and she is warned that she had better show herself obliging, and convince these obstinate people that they must submit to the inevitable. This seems to us rather unreasonable. It was natural enough that the Turkish Government should accept the decisions of the Congress, for its very existence was at stake; but it is surely too much to expect that it should bring pressure to bear upon its late subjects to sever themselves from its rule. Those much-abused persons, "the Pashas," have the feelings of ordinary human beings; and neither Austria nor Russia will have any real cause of complaint if they are found secretly encouraging the rebels. It is of far more importance that these Powers themselves should receive some words of counsel than that advice should be thrown away on Turkey. Austria is irritated by the resistance she has met with, and there is danger that she will deal harshly with those who are doing everything they can to thwart her will. What Russia is capable of we all know; when withdrawn from European control, she stamps out opposition by ruthless cruelty. Were excessive severity to be practised in the present instance, either in Asia or in Europe, the consequences would be disastrous. It would arouse passions by which we should be brought face to face with the Eastern Question in a more threatening form than ever.

Swimming for Ladies.——With a view to illustrate how thoroughly ladies may acquire the art of swimming, and thus have the power not only of saving themselves, but others, in an emergency, it may be well to give further publicity to an incident which occurred not many days ago on the coast at St. Bees. A young lady, aged sixteen, the daughter of Canon Knowles of St. Bees, was bathing at high water, and as at this state of the tide the beach is very steep, and a strong under current exists, she was out of her depth in a few strokes. As is often the case under such circumstances, she lost her presence of mind, and had sunk twice. An alarm being given, Miss Fanny Helder, a daughter of George Helder, Esq., of Liverpool, ran to the spot, and without divesting herself of a single article of clothing, not even her hat, rushed into the water, swam to Miss Knowles, and succeeded in bringing her safely to land, though in rather an exhausted condition. Apart from this act being one of the greatest heroism, and so worthy of ardent admiration, it deserves special mention as an example to all ladies of the value of acquiring the art of swimming. It is sometimes said that the knowledge is all very well for men, but that it is almost useless to ladies, who cannot put it in practice when encumbered with their clothes. The above incident shows that this is not the case, and even though it may be admitted that a dress and petticoats are an impediment to ladies swimming, it must be remembered that their bodies have greater powers of flotation than those of men, owing to the fact that their bones and muscles have less specific gravity. Not very long ago, when the Childwall Hall was lost, a Mrs. L'Estrange kept swimming about for two hours, and eventually succeeded not only in saving her own life but that of her husband. It is satisfactory to know that the value of swimming for women is becoming more recognised. The London Schools Swimming Club has taken the matter up, and a flourishing swimming class for girls has been established at Brixton, and a few weeks ago, as an illustration that girls learn to swim more easily than boys, it was stated that out of a class of thirty, whose instruction commenced late last season, no less than twenty-five were taught to swim in six lessons. What we now want are more facilities for ladies learning to swim, and more teachers. To say nothing of the use of the art, its practice is one of the most healthful physical exercises ladies can indulge in.

Extravagance in India.——Mr. Fawcett deserves the thanks of all who are interested in India for the admirable speech he delivered on Tuesday. We do not, indeed, agree with him in thinking that because Indian troops were recently brought to Europe the army in India may be diminished. That is a question for military experts; and so long as they are of opinion that the forces in our Dependency are not too numerous, it would be dangerous to weaken our powers of attack and defence. But he thoroughly made out his case that the expenditure of the Indian administration has passed far beyond just limits. Every year the Government demand more money, and in order to procure it they are forced to impose fresh taxes. This would be unobjectionable if the country were prosperous, and able to bear these increased burdens. As a matter of fact, however, trade advances slowly; and it was only by an extreme effort that the revenue, when much less formidable than it now is, could be raised. The consequence is that there is no class which does not suffer greater pressure than it can bear; and the humblest classes are those who suffer most of all. It is evident that we are here in presence of a great peril. We are all well aware that it would be disastrous for India if the British were expelled from it; there would be anarchy of the worst kind, followed by the most grinding despotism. But we cannot expect ignorant natives to see this. They feel the burden which crushes them at present, and there is real danger that their discontent may induce them some day to try to throw it off. In these circumstances there is but one thing for the Government to do; and that is to diminish the expenditure which makes unduly heavy taxes necessary. Indian officials of course assert that not a rupee which is now spent can be spared; but this is not what men like Lord Northbrook, who ought to know, maintain. Nor is it what was maintained by Lord Mayo, who saw the evil in its full proportions, and by unremitting labour did at last succeed in obtaining a surplus. If Lord Lytton were as much in earnest, we believe that he would be not less fortunate.

Corporal Punishment.——A trite subject indeed; but essay writers, whose name is legion when a substantial money prize is to be given away for the most successful theme on a given topic, are offered the opportunity of earning the tangible sum of fifty guineas by pointing out the injurious results arising from the corporal punishment of children except under due restrictions. They are further to dilate on the necessity for the total abolition of the cruel practice of beating children on the head and face, and the advantages to be obtained from the maintenance of discipline without the infliction of corporal punishment of any kind. The Marquis Townshend, moved to indignation by the apparent cruelty of a School Board pedagogue, offers the prize under the auspices of the Society for the Protection of Women and Children. Here, then, is a wide and fruitful subject for the essayist, though it is evident that to have any chance of the prize he must be a strong partisan of the anti-corporal punishment school. The only loophole left him for indulging in any private convictions on the other side of the question is the expression in the conditions—"except under due restrictions." At the present moment, if the advocates and opponents of corporal punishment for children—at least for boys—were polled, we are inclined to think that the numbers on either side would be pretty equal. There is still a large body of well-educated and highly-refined persons who believe that a boy's intellectual faculties are stimulated and his moral sense fairly preserved by judicious applications of some instrument of punishment to his epidermis, and who still look on Busby and Keats as types of the greatest of head-masters. Recent legislation also, in reference to garotters, and the strong demand for its extension to wife and woman beaters, indicates that there is a widely spread impression that in certain cases at least corporal punishment is a familiar expedient of great efficacy. On the other hand there are not wanting those who hold most strongly that corporal punishment effects no moral good either in the case of boys or men, but has a direct tendency to harden and brutalise them. We shall not pretend to decide between the two Schools; but we are strongly of opinion that no moral good is done to boys when corporal punishment is inflicted either by parents or schoolmasters in anger, or, to use a well-known expression, "after their own pleasure." Punishment thus inflicted begets anger in return, and if often repeated makes boys cowards, liars, sneaks, and bullies. All corporal punishment should be judicial, measured, passionless.

The Election of French Senators.——The General Councils of France will soon have to elect anew the seventy-five Senators whom it is their duty to appoint, and their action is looked forward to with intense interest by all parties. The Republicans, especially, are making strenuous efforts to secure a result favourable to themselves. If a majority of genuine Republicans were chosen, the consequences would be of the highest importance; for M. Gambetta would then have his way in both Chambers, and it would be almost impossible for the reactionary factions to repeat the experiment with which they alarmed France last year. There is good reason to hope that this desirable end will be attained, and that thus the Republic will be finally established; but the issue is not beyond dispute. As the main function of the General Councils is to attend to local matters, many of their members are elected merely because they are men of local importance; so that in most of these bodies there are men whose politics are as far as possible from resembling the politics of M. Gambetta. For the sake of peace many of the so-called Conservatives might now be expected to support the Republic. It clearly commands a majority of the nation; and by its admirable moderation it has effectually disposed of the wild terrors which the very word "Republic" once inspired. But Frenchmen must not be judged by the rules applicable to the political life of England. A French politician never knows when his cause is hopeless; and it must be remembered that there are multitudes who, if they no longer fear the Red Spectre, still believe that the Republic necessarily exercises an injurious influence. It keeps the priests within bounds which they would very much like to break through; and in the foreign relations of France it adopts a prudent rather than a "glorious" policy. People who resent this may be expected to oppose the Republic to the last; and while they have a remote chance of success they will exercise every energy to secure it. Fortunately, in the coming elections, there will at least be fair play. The result will not be due to wire pulling, but be the genuine expression of the convictions of the voters.

IZAAK WALTON.——Though almost two centuries have passed away since the Father of Anglers was laid to rest, at the ripe age of ninety, beneath the black marble slab, which still bears his name, in Prior Silkstead's Chapel, in the south aisle of Winchester Cathedral, no memorial had been raised to him in his native town of Stafford till within the last few days. Now, however, a marble bust, taken, we believe, from the picture of the old fisherman by Houseman, has been placed in St. Mary's Church, where he was baptised in the year 1693. At last, then, a neglect has been in some measure remedied, and the poor of Stafford, who still receive annual benefit under his will, will have a visible memorial of their benefactor, while "brethren of the angle" will have a shrine whither to make their pilgrimages. Though Walton seems to have left Stafford for London early in life, it was among the bright streams which are so plentiful about his native town that he first imbibed a love for angling, and a still greater love of Nature, and stored up materials for what may truly be called his immortal work, the "Complete Angler." If for no other reason, as the author of this and of the lives of several eminent English Divines, Walton is truly entitled to a memorial, and, indeed, to a more noteworthy one than that just raised to him. "The Complete Angler" has had its adverse critics—as, indeed, what book has not?—but probably hardly a volume in the English language has commanded more admirers. Dr. Johnson, a hater and abuser of angling itself, was never tired of praising Walton's book, and it was at his instance that the Rev. Moses Browne published the tenth edition in 1772; and Charles Lamb, himself no lover of the angler, in a letter to Coleridge, dated October, 1796, urges the poet to read it, in these words: "It would sweeten a man's temper at any time to read it; it would Christianise every discordant, angry passion: pray make yourself acquainted with it." But, whatever the critics may say, the fact remains, that "The Complete Angler" has gone through well nigh sixty editions in this country alone, to say nothing of those published abroad. Of how many other books could this be said?

OUR ILLUSTRATIONS

THE OCCUPATION OF CYPRUS

AS last week we gave a general description of the island of Cyprus, we need now only refer to our engravings. The first British encampment was formed at Chikir, about five miles from Larnaca, on a site which is said to be very healthy, and well supplied with water. Our first sketch, on page 153, represents the capture of "An Unwelcome Visitor" in camp. Snakes are very common in the island, but authorities differ on the question whether or no they are venomous. No. 2 shows Sir Garnet Wolseley entering the room where he was formally installed as Governor of the island. The apartment was a small one, with bare stone walls; the passage leading to it was crowded with men, women, and children, some half-naked, others gaily dressed for the occasion. The ceremony was brief and simple. Sir Garnet Wolseley took the oaths of allegiance and of office; and his proclamation was then read to the people, first in English, and afterwards in Greek and Turkish, the audience signifying their approval at almost every sentence. No. 3 brings us again to the camp at Chikir, where "Our Messman" is fain to protect himself from the tropical sun by fixing an umbrella in a friendly bush. No. 4 shows Mr. Forbes, the Daily News "special," riding into camp upon a Cyprian donkey, which, he says, took four hours to get over the five miles from Larnaca to the camp, and on the return journey lay down to rest, and was left enjoying a peaceful slumber, Mr. Forbes making his way back on foot.

ARCHITECTURAL ANTIQUITIES

The Cathedral at Famagosta is a remarkably elegant example of the French Gothic style of the fourteenth century, with a noble west front flanked by towers. Unlike most French and English cathedrals, it has no transept; however, both France and England present examples of large churches which are not erected upon a cruciform plan—for instance, the Cathedrals of Nantes, Bourges, and Llandaff. It is a common mistake to attribute to the Venetians the many beautiful churches which are to be found in Cyprus; but it is impossible to conceive anything less Venetian in character than the three noble churches of Famagosta; St. Sophia, Nicosia; and Delapais. The two former are thoroughly French in construction and detail; whilst the last named is undoubtedly the work of an English architect—at least, so far as its noble cloisters are concerned. These are fine examples of pure English Gothic of the fourteenth century. The nave of the church appears to be of an earlier date, resembling what in England is called the "Transition" style—a kind of architecture in vogue during the reigns of Richard the First and John; but, as this style was common to England and France, it would be difficult to say at once which country may claim the nave of the church at Delapais. With regard, however, to the cloisters, shown in our sketch, there can be no doubt, as tracery of a similar design to that in the arch above the Sarcophagus is to be found in several churches in the north of England, and is not to be seen anywhere in France. The ancient Sarcophagus shown in our illustration is Roman work. As is the case at Arles and elsewhere, it has probably been re-used in mediæval times—an example which the English Government followed in making use of Wolsey's sarcophagus to serve as a receptacle for the body of Nelson. "The Mosque of Mahomet's Nurse" is a building erected by the faithful to the memory of the Arab woman Halima, to whom the infant Mahomet was intrusted by his mother in order that he might have the benefit of the pure air of the desert. The child remained with her until five years old, and in after years the Prophet repaid her care by always exhibiting towards her every token of respect and affection.

on the self-same day seems improbable, but I think my diary will prove it.

Not to allude again to those unfortunate baths, when Lilly and I were up, we sat looking out of window at the chimney-pots and roof in front of us, wondering if it would ever hold up. It never did; so that we were forced to take a couple of cabs, which we directed to the Trocadéro. Lilly, whose pencil is never out of her hand, must needs try and make a sketch in the cab. Of course it is all wibbly-wobbly, and streaked with rain besides. I can't see anything in it. But the spectator must imagine himself in it, and then let his imagination supply the rest.

Now, at the Trocadéro we held a cabinet council as to what should be done, considering the weather. We held it by Gérome's statue of the Gladiator. Papa, who is Cæsar Imperator, and proposes and disposes as it seemeth best to him, said that as it poured with rain, and as fish were the only creatures not put to personal inconvenience by the rain, we should court the society of the fish, and assimilate their habits as much as possible. In a word, that we should pass our day in the AQUARIUM.

On the way there we turned aside and walked under the Cascade.

A capital idea to imitate the Falls of the Giesbach here! But Art cannot supply the scenery of Nature. In place of the Swiss rocks and fir-trees, we see now only the Café Espagnol Bottega, with its flag-poles, through the glaze of water. Art can make the stones overhead watertight, but cannot keep out the spray, which makes mamma, who is wearing her waterfall-fringe bonnet, put up her umbrella, and the Cuirassier yonder pull off his helmet.

We were taking this spray in at the pores while we philosophised about Art and Nature, when Charlie descried two Chinamen, whose pigtails suggested an irresistible comparison with our plaits.

(This boy's mission seems to be simply and solely to chaff, as he calls it, his sisters).

I grant you that the plait is horrible. Why should a pretty girl's face end in the unsightly tail of a skate? Besides, it doesn't suit me. I am obliged to wear it because it suits Lilly, and mamma wishes us to be uniform. Still to be compared with Chinamen, and to have it suggested by a copy-book text that the Chinaman accepts as a compliment our following his fashion of fan and pigtail, is very trying to sisterly affection.

Then we wade to the Aquarium. And here is another precious sketch to describe. We had to stand out in the rain, ankle deep in mud, while it was being done. And now I defy anybody to make head or tail of it.

But that's just the peculiarity of the original! As you look down into the Aquarium through one of its light-holes, fish and men are so mixed up that you can't tell which is which.

Ghostly figures of odd fish, Johnny Dories and Anne Chovies, sail silent past the window.

The water of the pond outside comes right up to their heads, and lazy carp flop against an old gentleman's gills and goggles.

We stayed amongst the fish until we felt we must rise to the surface and nibble something, sardines and silver spoons preferred. All the other cafés were being blown away. The waiters wound their napkins round their necks, and the Chinamen their pigtails. (Verily, Paris was, indeed, Lutitia Parisiorum—a city of mud). The flags all sank half-mast high, weighed down with rain.

On we plodded till we reached the Café Duval, and here the climax of our misery awaited us.

We had taken comfortable places near the kitchen. We had a very pretty girl, in mob cap and apron, pencil and book in hand, an arrangement in black and white, to wait upon us, and the sardine, long expected, was just served.

We were comforting ourselves by the reflection that people outside were intensely wretched—when bang! a water-pipe burst and syringed us and the rest near us as if we were all on fire. "Eau à discretion!" You ought to be ashamed of yourself for

AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE TO THE HOLY LAND, III.—PILGRIMS FIRING SALUTES AT THE REPUTED TOMB OF MOSES—"NEBY MUSA" laughing, sir. "My word," said Charlie. "Hang it!" said papa. And as for mamma, Lilly, and I, we might have said anything.

AN ARTIST'S PILGRIMAGE TO THE HOLY LAND

III.

THE burial-place of Moses, we are told in the last chapter of Deuteronomy, was where he died "in a valley in the land of Moab over against Beth-peor," but, it is added, "no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." Nevertheless between Jericho and the Dead Sea there is a Mahomedan shrine, "Neby Mûsa," which dates from the 13th century, and which Mahomedan tradition gives as the site of the great law-giver's tomb, and which accordingly is periodically visited by numerous Mussulman Pilgrims and fanatical Dervishes.

"Continuing our journey," writes our artist, "we went to Neby Mûsa, or Tomb of Moses, which is annually visited by Muslim pilgrims, some on their return from Mecca, and also by Arab tribes from all parts of Syria. During several days, about the middle of April, fanatical mobs camp in and about the ruins of the mosque and walls, within which is supposed by Mahomedans to be the Tomb of Moses. On the approach of fresh bands of pilgrims, salutes are fired from the mosque with old flint-lock guns and pistols. This is answered by the approaching Arabs or Turks, who beat drums and cymbals as they come up; their women generally marching in the rear, singing and clapping their hands. Each pilgrim discharges his gun in the air on entering the gate of the mosque. After the pilgrimage is over they return to their homes, pass through Jerusalem en route, and muster at the Mosque of Omar."

"AMONGST ALIENS"

"PEACE AND WAR"

THIS engraving shows H.M.S. Thunderer and the schooner-yacht Malora off the Isle of Wight, the idea of the artist being to show the contrast which exists between the light and graceful sailing vessel and the ponderous and apparently unwieldy bulk of the ironclad. From an æsthetic point of view, we imagine that no one would hesitate to prefer the beautiful yacht which "walks the water like a thing of life" to the ugly nondescript which, we believe, is known even amongst sailors as the "flat-iron;" but, in this age of utilitarianism, beauty must give way to power and strength—at all events for such purposes as the Thunderer is intended to serve. Besides there is undeniably a poetic fitness in the association of grace and beauty with "Peace," and the linking of "War" with repulsive deformity of shape and awkwardness of movement.

M. J. MASSENET

THERE have been but few instances of such a rapid rise in the musical profession as that of the popular composer in France, M. J. Massenet. Born at Montaud (Loire) on the 13th of May, 1842, he was a pupil at an early age of M. Ambroise Thomas, the Principal of the Paris Conservatoire, and so indefatigable was young Massenet in study, under the composer of Mignon, Hamlet, &c, that the aspiring student soon won the chief prizes for the pianoforte and organ, fugue, harmony, and composition, completing his scholastic triumphs by gaining "Le Premier Grand Prix du Rome," in 1865, which may be called the European "Riband" of music. M. Massenet lost no time in profiting by his studies in Italy and Germany, as already in 1868 he produced his Suite d'Orchestre," at M. Pasdeloup's Classical Popular Concerts at the Cirque d'Hiver; this work was followed in the same year by a choral symphony, entitled Pompeii executed at M. Arban's concerts. His first operatic venture was the setting of a one-act piece, La Grande Tante, the chief characters sustained by Mdlle. Heilbron and M. Capoul, at the Salle Favart. The composer's career, interrupted by the events of 1870, during which he was on military duty, was renewed in 1871, when his "Suite d'Orchestre," No. 2, illustrating Hungarian scenes; his Poème d'Avril (six songs), Poème Pastoral, his Poème du Souvenir—all cycles of melodies—were published, followed by his Scènes de Bal, Roman d'Arlequin, &c. His opening essay of a three-act lyric drama was at the Opera Comique, in 1872, Don César de Bazan, a subject so charmingly treated by the late Vincent Wallace, under the title of Maritana. This production, much admired for its orchestration, only secured M. Massenet a succès d'estime, but in January, 1873, the advent of a thorough master was recognised by his incidental music to the tragedy Les Erinnyes ("The Furies"). This play is an adaptation by M. Leconte de Lisle of the Greek Eumenides of Æschylus, one of his Trilogy, the Agamemnon the Choephoræ (Electra), and the Eumenides It was a most trying task for the young fresh musician to follow Mendelssohn in the illustration of Greek music as in the Antigone and in Œdipus; the more daring, indeed, was the attempt, as Mendelssohn, writing touching the proposal to him to set the choruses of the Trilogy, pronounced it to be a "most difficult and, perhaps, impracticable problem." M. Massenet, however, in ten numbers of the two acts—the first called Klytaimnestra, the second Orestes, has composed a score of remarkable power and picturesqueness, and characterised by classical elevation, and even at times grandeur. The music, after a long run at the Odéon, was given at the Théâtre Lyrique, in 1876. The Erinnyes was the precursor at the Odéon, on Good Friday (April, 1873), of M. Massenet's first attempt in the sacred school, an oratorio, or rather sacred drama, Magdeleine, with scenic effects, costumes, &c. This work created a great sensation, Madame Viardot Garcia appeared therein for the last time on the lyric stage; it was subsequently given at the Salle Favart, with Madame Carvalho and M. Gueymard, the tenor. A second specimen of sacred music was Ève, entitled by the poet, M. Louis Gallet, a Mystère, which was first performed at the Cirque des Champs Elysées in March, 1875, before a rare assemblage of artistic celebrities, amongst whom the most enthusiastic in applauding the music were MM. Gounod, Reber, Colonne, Wieniawski, Sarasate, Duvernoy, Pasdeloup, &c. M. Massenet had, indeed, passed the Rubicon by his last triumph; and the commission was awarded to him to compose a grand opera for the National Theatre. In April, 1877, came the important event, the realisation of the composer's aspirations, the production of his Roi de Lahore, the libretto by M. L. Gallet, in the New Grand Opera House, with such a mise-en-scène as can only be witnessed in Paris. Mdlle. Reszke, M. Salomon (tenor), and M. Lassalle (baritone), enacted the principal parts. The opera has had a long run in the French capital, and will be one of the attractions of the Exhibition. Italian adaptations have already been brought out in Italy at the Regio (Turin) and the Apollo (Rome), under the composer's direction, and when the opera has gone the round of Europe it will doubtless reach London; it was only after four years that M. Gounod's Faust was given here. M. Massenet is commissioned to compose an opera expressly for the Milan Scala; and he has a third oratorio in MS., La Vierge. The enthusiastic reception of his Shakespearian scenes (The Tempest and Macbeth), at the St. James's Hall, during the recent season, and of the numbers from his Roi de Lahore and his Erinnyes, at the Crystal Palace, which were conducted by himself, evidenced the high appreciation by English audiences of his compositions. M. Massenet was nominated Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, in 1875, by the French President; he is a Member of the Committee of Inspection of the National Conservatoire and of the Academy of Fine Arts. The future of the young and gifted musician will be watched with an interest which is not confined to his native country.

Our portrait is from a photograph by Pierre Petit, 31, Place Cadet, Paris.

THE LATE M. GEORGES BIZET

THE success of the late Georges Bizet's opera of Carmen, which was produced with such signal success at Her Majesty's Theatre in June last with Miss Minnie Hauk as the gipsy heroine, has excited considerable interest in the works and career of this talented composer, who died at the early age of thirty-seven in 1875. M. Bizet from the first showed unusual promise of musical talent, and we learn from M. Gustave Chouquet's article in the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" that he was a brilliant pupil and laureate at the Conservatoire from 1841 to 1857. He studied composition under Halévy, whose daughter he afterwards married. Before winning his "Prix de Rome," he produced an insignificant operetta, Docteur Miracle (Bouffes Parisiens, April, 1857); and after his return from Italy, composed Vasco de Gama (1863), which did not gain him much credit. At the Théâtre Lyrique were performed Les Pêcheurs de Perles, in three acts (September 30, 1863), and La Jolie Fille de Perth, in four acts (December 26, 1867). Djamileh (May 22, 1872) was not successful, but the interludes to L'Arlesienne (September 30, 1872), and his Overture "Patrie" were received with applause. Bizet's last effort was Carmen, which was produced at the Opéra Comique on March 3, 1875. This highly gifted composer and very talented pianist died almost suddenly on June 3, 1875. Much was expected from him. He was a musician of superior abilities, though his vocal style is deficient in ease.—Our portrait is from a photograph by Etienne Carjat and Co., Rue Notre Dame de Lorette, Paris.

BRITISH SAILORS AT TOPHANEH

EVER since the Crimean war Jack, or rather "Johnnie Bono," has been a great favourite with the citizens of Constantinople, and Mussulman and Jew, Greek and Armenian, are one and all ready to bestow a good-natured smile upon the frolicsome tar as he lolls about the narrow steep streets of Galata and Pera; while the contrast between his clean and cheerful countenance and the dull heavy faces of the Russians, who have so recently been parading the streets of the City of the Sultan, together with the notion that the British fleet would ultimately come to the relief of Turkey and the Turks, and the sudden disclosure of the Anglo-Turkish Convention, have made him more popular than ever. Nor does Jack the less approve of the alliance, as, with an Englishman's leaning towards the weaker side, he shows a decided liking for the Turk, and occasionally, as in our sketch, manifests his approval of Lord Beaconsfield's policy in a very decided manner. Tophaneh, we may add, is a water-side quarter of Constantinople adjoining Galata, and is chiefly renowned for its cannon foundry and stores (Top, cannon; Haneh, foundry), from which its name is derived.

THE MONSTER BALLOON AT PARIS

M. GIFFARD's gigantic captive balloon which is now making daily ascents in the Place de Carrousel is the largest aërial machine which has ever been constructed, and is more than quadruple the size of the captive balloon at the Paris Exhibition of 1867. M. Giffard's balloon is 180 feet high, and towers above the surrounding buildings of the Tuileries and Louvre like a great cupola. The balloon is mainly composed of layers of muslin, linen, and vulcanised india-rubber, the whole being enclosed in a huge netting. The car is circular, and is some twenty-five feet in diameter, and as only fifty people are taken up at a time there is ample space for the passengers. Although the most careful precautions have been taken against accident, the car is fitted up with ballast, grappling hooks, and all things necessary for a prolonged ascent in the event of the cable breaking which attaches it to the earth. This cable, which allows the balloon to ascend to a height of some 2,000 feet, weighs three tons, and is capable of sustaining a strain of twenty-five tons, or more than twice the greatest pressure which will be applied to its weakest point. The cable is attached to the centre of the bottom of the car, and, as shown in the accompanying diagram, is carried under a pulley, and through a tunnel to a huge winding drum, which is worked by two engines of 300 horse-power, and to which an ingenious automatic air break is attached. The pulley (H) is so arranged as to be capable of moving in every direction, so that to whichever point the wind directs the balloon, the pulley yields to the controlling force. From the height to which the balloon ascends a picture of the surrounding country can be obtained for some sixty miles round, while the view of Paris is changed according to the direction in which the balloon is blown by the wind, as it is capable according to the breeze of describing an immense circle. There are two escape valves for the gas attached to the balloon, one (B), placed at the mouth, which acts automatically upon the slightest expansion, the other being on the summit, and under the control of the aeronauts, who by the way are MM. Eugène and Jules Godard and M. Camille Dartois. The charge for the ascent, which lasts about twenty minutes, is twenty francs—not an exorbitant fare when it is considered that M. Giffard has spent more than 20,000*l.* upon his aerial infant.

DUBLIN ILLUSTRATED

A SPECIALLY-WRITTEN descriptive account of Dublin is commenced on page 169.

NOTE.——In acknowledging the source from which the illustrations of Cyprus contained in our issue of last week were taken, we should have said that they were from sketches (not photographs) by Mr. Dominic Colnaghi.

HOME.

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.—Sir H. Drummond Wolff, who has been gazetted a Knight Grand Cross of St. Michael, has left London to commence his work as our representative on the European Commission, to which, by the Berlin Treaty, is entrusted the reorganisation of Eastern Roumelia. The Earl of Donoughmore accompanies him as Assistant-Commissioner.—Mr. Roebuck has been honoured by Her Majesty with a seat in the Privy Council.—The Ministerial fish dinner took place at Greenwich on Wednesday; Lord Beaconsfield did not attend, but Lord Salisbury was present and was greatly cheered by the crowd which assembled on the landing-stage. The Premier left town for Hughenden earlier than was expected, but the vicar and some of his tenantry met him at the gate with hearty cheers.—A sporting contemporary is responsible for the statement that the man who called out "Traitors!" at the Guildhall reception is now lying dangerously ill from the mal-treatment which he received. It states that he had his nose broken and an eye gouged out.—Sir J. D. Astley, M.P., has been speaking to his constituents on the Eastern Question. He is sorry that we did not go to war; and, if reported correctly by the local newspaper, he is at least candid in saying why. "One reason why he was anxious to have a go, was that he had a boy who was just coming of age, and who wanted a commission in the army. If there had been a good war, and a number of soldiers had got killed off, they would be wanting men so badly that he would probably have got his commission without passing any examination." Perhaps we had better not trust ourselves to comment on this declaration.—Mr. Forster, M.P., has very properly declined to deliver himself bound hand and foot to the Bradford caucus, but means to appeal to the electors of the borough direct.—Telegrams from the principal cities in Australia have been received by the Earl of Beaconsfield, complimenting him for the part he took in the Berlin Congress, and congratulating the Government on the preservation of peace.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The naval review at Spithead on Tuesday, in presence of Her Majesty, was sadly marred by wind and rain, the weather being so bad that the projected manœuvring was abandoned. The Queen has since sent a message to the officers and seamen of the Squadron, expressing her satisfaction with the inspection. We reserve our account of the day's proceedings until next week, when we shall give a number of illustrations in connection with the event.—The despatch-boat Lively has been behaving in a manner far more lively than agreeable. On Wednesday, after landing a party at East Cowes, she "slewed round" and got into collision with the Royal yacht Alberta, which she badly damaged. Soon afterwards she ran into a private yacht, which immediately sank (fortunately there was no one on board), and finally ran ashore. All this happened in broad daylight and calm weather!—It is proposed to appoint a Special Committee to consider the question of the defences of Cyprus.—The opening soirée of the British Association was held in the Exhibition Palace, Dublin, on Wednesday evening, when Mr. W. Spottiswoode, the President, delivered the inaugural address dealing first with the purposes and prospects of the association, and afterwards the condition and tendencies of science. There will be no lack of entertainment for the assembled savants. The Mayor gives a banquet, there will be a garden party at the Viceregal lodge, conversaziones by the Royal Dublin Society and Royal Irish Academy, entertainments by the Lights Commissioners in the Bay, and excursions to various places of interest. To-morrow (Sunday) special sermons will be preached in the city by the Bishop of Derry, the Dean of Norwich, and the Archbishop of Meath. The sections meet in Trinity College, and amongst the guests are Mr. H. Stanley and Captain Burnaby.—The shabby manner in which the wives and families of the Reserves were treated during the time the men were with the colours has had the natural effect of producing much dissatisfaction. On Sunday a large number of the men held a meeting in the yard of the British Hospitallers' Society, and much angry feeling was exhibited. One man called out "We will not respond again," a declaration which, however unpatriotic, can hardly be wondered at under the circumstances. The Society have resolved to continue the relief to those men who have not been reinstated in their employment, and a second meeting was to have been held on Thursday.—On Monday Mr. Henry Irving laid the foundation stone of the Harborne and Edgbaston Institute, and was afterwards entertained at luncheon in the Masonic Hall, Birmingham, when he delivered an address on "Education and the Drama."—On Saturday, the contents of a Post Office van attached to a mail train, caught fire while on the way from London to Reading, and a ton weight of newspapers were destroyed.—On Monday a fire broke out in Chester Castle, but was quickly subdued, the more fortunately having regard to the fact that the building is only separated by a guard room from "Cæsar's Tower," which is now used as a powder-magazine for the military of the north-west of England.

THEATRES

THE play entitled The Woman of the People, now performing by Madame Beatrice and her company at the OLYMPIC Theatre, is so far superior to the common class of melodramas that it presents a story which is steadily pursued from the rise to the fall of the curtain, and that the scenes of terror and excitement which are inseparable from a play of this kind are not introduced like the duel and precipice scene in the unfortunate play of Vanderdecken, merely for their terrific and exciting qualities, but form strictly part of the development of the plot. This is a distinction important to be borne in mind; for it will, we believe, be found that the frequent failure of romantic dramas in recent times has arisen chiefly from the reliance placed by the writers on exciting situations, without regard to any purpose which they fulfil as parts of a regularly constructed fable. The truth is that there has been in this respect an advance in the public taste, insomuch that it is difficult now to understand how the melodramas which, a generation ago, attracted audiences even at our leading theatres—such plays for example as The Wood Demon and Castle Spectre of Matthew Lewis, or The Cataract of the Ganges, could ever have received a patient hearing. The Woman of the People is a rather coarse but pretty close rendering of a play that has been for the last thirty years a stock piece of the French theatres, under the title of Marie Jeanne, ou la Femme du Peuple, and has already furnished some scenes in a popular drama known by the title of Janet Pride. Its theme is the trials and miseries which may be brought upon a worthy woman by the intemperate habits of a husband not originally depraved or wanting in affection; and, though other threads are interwoven with this element in that ingenious way which is peculiar to the French authors, M. d'Ennery and his colleague, M. Mallian, and the destiny of the humble hero and heroine is inseparably associated with other sorrows, trials, and misdeeds, the actors in which move in a higher sphere of society, the life and adventures of Bertrand and Marie are always kept in sight from the day of the double marriage in the Près St. Gervais on which the curtain rises down to the final unravelling of the intricate tale. If the test of probability be applied to the leading incidents; if the spectator pauses to inquire whether Marie's child when, in despair of rescuing it from destitution and neglect, it is deposited by the mother in the box of the Foundling Hospital, would be likely to be stolen immediately by a scoundrel in a long cloak who wants a baby for purposes of fraud and deception; or if he should consider too curiously the chances of Marie being sent to a madhouse because she afterwards claims her own offspring, then no doubt it would be difficult fully to enjoy the performance; and we fear that the final redemption of Bertrand from his overpowering vice is an incident which demands an even larger measure of faith. But when a romantic drama is skilfully constructed, and the story is of a genuinely pathetic kind, as it in this instance—audiences are not much disposed to apply tests of this sort. There is, at least, no glaring absurdity in the play, and we may add that, though its list of personages comprises a good many wicked people, there is nothing to object to either in the details or in the moral of the piece. Unquestionably a spectator who can enjoy a play of this class will be interested in the performance at the Olympic, for the part of Marie is represented by Madame Beatrice with a great deal of force and passion of an unexaggerated kind, and her company generally is by no means wanting in talent.

ADELPHI.——On Saturday evening last a crowded audience assembled at this theatre to witness the first appearance of Mr. Henry Neville as Pierre Lorance in the powerful drama of Proof. The part is one which thoroughly suits Mr. Neville's style, and his fine conception of the French soldier may be pronounced completely successful.

MESSRS. MASKELYNE AND COOKE have closed the EGYPTIAN HALL for their annual three weeks' vacation. The entertainment will be resumed on Monday evening, September 2nd, when "Labial," the second member of Mr. Maskelyne's automaton orchestra, will be introduced.

Mr. Sothern will reappear at the HAYMARKET Theatre on Thursday next in his old and most famous part of Lord Dundreary.

A new dramatic version of Victor Hugo's romance, "Les Misérables," will be produced on the 7th September at the DUKE'S Theatre, which house has undergone repairs and redecorations.

POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.——Professor Pepper has just introduced an interesting and instructive lecture on sanitation, a wide subject, and one of the greatest importance, but which in its minor branches scarcely receives sufficient attention from householders. The Professor explains several appliances by which the cupidity or ignorance of builders in these matters can be remedied; and his lecture includes useful information regarding air, food, and water. We would recommend all whose sanitary knowledge is not very great to pay the lecturer a visit.

"THE PHILOSOPHY OF WAR," by James Ram (C. Kegan Paul and Co.).—Three-and-twenty years have come and gone since the Laureate, in mid-fever of the Russian War, breathed forth his scorn for the shop-keeping temper which is the outgrowth of a protracted peace. The world has had wars enow since then, and the warlike spirit has grown apace. There are philosophers who hold the common phrases about waste of human life for so many humanitarian platitudes, and many—not philosophers at all—who greatly doubt if peace in every case, except the case of self-defence, should be the first object of an Imperial Power. But Mr. Ram, in his bizarre but clever essay, goes a long way beyond this. War, he maintains, is "one of the good things of the world," the appointed process by which Nature (which is by no means a beneficent Power in the sense of desiring the greatest happiness of the greatest number, but one, on the contrary, "red in tooth and claw with ravin"), eliminates the weaker and less worthy, and brings about the improvement of the race by the battling together of the strongest. In the "balance of power" Mr. Ram has no belief. It is a mere trades-unionism in disguise, keeping back those who are most worthy to gain the most. Were he a Russian he would dream of Constantinople night and day. Being an Englishman, he would fain see the English breed the masters of the world. He would make every Englishman—middle-class Englishmen more particularly—a man of war. He even looks with some degree of jealousy on the enlistment of Indian soldiers in our service in the East. The four hundred millions of Chinese are a puzzle to him. He would not, he admits, start off to cut their throats. But he would "open China," whether they would or no—tant pis for the Chinese if the proceeding be disagreeable to them. That "happiness of the people" on which advocates of "peace at any price" sometimes dilate is quite, he holds, a misleading notion. The whole world "turns on the pivot of adversity," and it is only for its sufferings and its battles that its story is either interesting or improving. We drop even a novel when everybody is made happy. There is but one writer in the country who, as in "Tancred," can keep us awake over a romance of prosperity, and that writer is now Prime Minister. Of course in all this there is a good deal that is purely eccentric. Mr. Ram has, indeed, to pause at times to assure his readers he is writing neither paradox nor burlesque. But there is a good deal, too, which is really clever, and which, though by no means wholly true, bristles with quaint, unpopular half-truths.

No thirst like this for worldly honour inspires the heroes of Canon Farrar's eloquent five Lenten Lectures (Macmillan and Co.) on "Saintly Workers," or the five chief classes of men who through long centuries have endured all things for the Cross as (1) Martyrs; (2) Hermits; (3) Monks; (4) Friars; (5) Missionaries. Sympathetic, rather than severely critical, in the treatment of his subject, Canon Farrar delights to dwell on points of agreement, not of difference, in groups including such widely opposite types as Heber and St. Dominic, Allen Gardiner and Francis Xavier; above all, to bring into the clearest light, amidst the lesser varieties of time, and circumstance, and fashions not always worthy of imitation, the self-sacrificing spirit of the Christian saint, the disinterested devotion to their Master, the pure love for their fellow men, conspicuous alike in martyrs like Ignatius journeying Rome-ward through the cities of Asia to face the lions of the arena, in missionaries from Columban to Coleridge Patteson, from Xavier to Henry Martyn, in preachers like Lacordaire, of a humility greater even than their eloquence, or in monks who in the darkest ages spend themselves freely to restore, according to their light, the discipline of the Church, like Benedict of Nurscia, or brown-robed Francis of Assisi. Were it only as shifting scenes from Church history, these lectures will quite repay attentive perusal.

A fifth edition of the "Englishman's Guide Book to the United States and Canada" (Longmans and Co.), with a special chapter—a little, perhaps, couleur de rose—on the hunting and fishing-grounds of the New World, speaks well for the popularity of the handy little volume with travellers bound for the Far West. As a portable hand-book for an outline tour—to be supplemented here and there by local guides—it seems excellent alike in plan and execution.

Fresh food for the inquiring mind on travelling thoughts intent is also provided by the three latest additions to Mr. E. Stanford's excellent collection of guidebooks to the beauties of England. Does the tourist wish a complete acquaintance with the land of Tre, Pol, and Pen, let him follow the itinerary so exhaustively drawn out by Mr. W. Tregallas in the "Tourist's Guide to Cornwall," and he will find scarcely a spot of interest unnoticed. Starting from Plymouth the author takes his reader the whole circuit of the county to Launceston, and sketches a trip from Pensance to the Scilly Isles. The accompanying map is on an unusually large scale, but the difference between the routes by rail and those by carriage roads is not sufficiently distinct. Should the holiday-maker, prefer inland scenery and stately English homes to bold sea and rugged cliffs, the "Tourist's Guide to Derbyshire" will meet his views. This volume is on a different plan, as Mr. J. C. Cox makes Derby the starting-point for all expeditions, and divides the excursions into those practicable by road and by rail. He adds plentiful descriptions of Chatsworth and Haddon Hall, and somewhat fuller information respecting hotels and charges. Further north, wolds, dales, and watering-places have their turn in the "Tourist's Guide to the North and East Ridings of Yorkshire," by G. P. Bevan. Although not possessing the same interest from a manufacturing or picturesque point of view as the West Riding, the present districts own but little inferior attractions in the numerous pleasure-resorts on the eastern coast and the scenery of the northern portion. The excursions are hardly so well mapped out as in the preceding volumes. Each guide contains a brief general description of the respective county, its history, geology, and other features, and is commendably small enough to add little weight to the pocket or the knapsack.

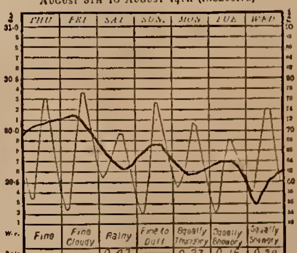
AUGUST 8TH TO AUGUST 14TH (INCLUSIVE)



EXPLANATION.—The thick line shows the variations in the height of the Barometer during the past week ending Wednesday midnight. The fine line shows the shade temperature for the same interval, and gives the maximum and minimum [illegible] day, with the (approximate) time at which they [illegible] to us by the Meteorological Office.

REMARKS.—The weather during this period was at first fine; but on Saturday, the 10th inst., it broke up completely, and since then heavy showers, strong squalls, and occasional thunderstorms have prevailed. The wind on Tuesday, the 13th instant, blew very strongly from the south westward over the Channel and southern parts of the kingdom, attaining the force of a fresh gale in several places. Temperature has not been high, but the air at times has been very close, and the sun rays, when shining between the showers, very hot. The barometer was highest (30·13 inches) on Friday, the 9th instant; lowest (29·19 inches) on Wednesday, the 14th instant; range, 0·94 inches. Temperature was highest (77°) on Friday, the 9th instant; lowest (54°) on Sunday and Tuesday, the 11th and 13th; range, 23°. Rainfall: Total fall, 1·19 inches, on four days; greatest fall, 0·42 inches, on Saturday, the 10th instant.

A STATUE OF LAMARTINE is to be inaugurated with considerable festivities at Mâcon, his natal town, to-day.

A NEW PROVINCIAL MAGAZINE, entitled Bicycling, has been published at Newcastle-on-Tyne. It bears the appropriate Shakespearian motto, "Then may I set the world on wheels," is edited by two amateur bicyclists, and contains a variety of bicycling information.

PRINCE BISMARCK HAS BEEN WEIGHED!—Admirers of the "man of iron" (and who is not in this age of iron?) will be interested to hear that the scale turned at 243 lbs. 100 grammes, exactly 40 lbs. heavier than in 1874—a result, it is said, which did not appear wholly to please the illustrious statesman.

BRITISH ENTERPRISE IN CYPRUS is showing signs of its wonted activity already, and from the list of new companies registered, the particulars of which are given weekly in the Investors' Guardian newspaper, it appears that within the past fortnight six companies, with an aggregate capital of four millions one hundred and forty-five thousand pounds have been registered for the purpose of carrying out operations in connection with the island.

LAW COURT REFORM is somewhat needed in the Mofussil, if we are to credit a correspondent of the Indian Daily News, who, commenting on the administration of justice there, states he once had occasion to go to a court of justice, as a witness. He found the magistrate cross-legged, smoking a "hubble-bubble," picking his teeth awhile, and hearing three cases simultaneously. And as there was no Bible to be found on the premises, he had to be sworn on a Johnson's Dictionary.

THE PLAGUE OF LOCUSTS in certain parts of India still continues, and in the Times of India we read that they are swarming between Cadgoody and Coopum. The engine-drivers state that the wheels of the engine slip in crushing their slimy bodies. One driver told a Bangalore contemporary that he saw a heap of locusts near Malloor, which looked from a distance as high as the brake-van of the train, and that in passing through the heap, the fire-box of the engine became choked with the pests!

THE EXHIBITION OF WORKS ENTERED FOR THE NATIONAL ART COMPETITION was opened on Tuesday, in the Exhibition Galleries, South Kensington. They number about 1,400, which have been selected from 138,045 sent up from 142 Schools of Art throughout the kingdom. The subjects of the competition are figure drawing and modelling, painting in oil and water colours, and design especially as applied to manufactures. The prizes awarded are gold medals, silver medals, bronze medals, prizes of books, and the Princess of Wales' Scholarships, which are awarded to the two female students who take the highest prizes of the year in the national competition.

THE MUCH-VEXED QUESTION of payment for "lights" at Continental hotels has been the subject of a curious trial in Austria, and we learn from the Fremdenblatt that a traveller was summoned before the Tribunals for having taken away the candles which he had been charged for. In vain the traveller pointed to his receipted bill, where there was entered "lights, half-a-florin;" the Court delivered judgment in favour of the hotel-keeper, upon the ground that a traveller in paying for "lights" pays for the illumination of his room, and not for the materials employed. For instance, the hotel-keeper might use gas instead of candles, but all the same would, of course, be entitled to charge for "lights."

"COACHMAN'S LIVERY" is the title of the present fashionable colour across the Atlantic, the hue being also known as "hazel nut." Another freak of fashion is a pocket-handkerchief bearing the portrait of the owner, "so as to avoid loss," it is said; while, if we are to believe the Christian Union, "a Gospel garden" is the latest religious novelty in New York. It has been started by an energetic clergyman, named Stephen H. Tyng, and consists of a large room furnished with a fountain, floral baskets, urns of plants, and whatever will give it an inviting appearance. To the ceiling are attached long linen fans, which are kept all the time in motion and supply a cool and refreshing atmosphere. Here Mr. Tyng holds his services.

THE COFFEE PUBLIC-HOUSE ASSOCIATION, 40, Charing Cross, announce that they are enabled by one of their members to offer a prize of 200*l.* for an essay on the providing, on an adequate scale, of Halls or other places of resort and recreation for the working classes, the arrangements to include the sale of refreshments, but not of intoxicating drinks, so as to supply the requirements of the people in that respect, and to realise a profit to meet at least current expenses. The object of the donor of the prize is, not only to draw general attention to this subject, but also to elicit suggestions as to the agency by which an undertaking of such magnitude may be most suitably and effectively carried out. The date fixed for sending in manuscripts is March 1st, 1879.

A REMARKABLE CASE OF LONGEVITY has been communicated to us by Mr. William Colmer, the Secretary of the Indigent Blind Society, who writes as follows:—"During the last few years many instances of deaths have been recorded of Centenarians, but none, I venture to think, more striking than the following:—Thomas Budgen, a resident in Spitalfields, who was blind, died on the 4th inst. at the age of 104, and I have just attended his burial at Manor Park Cemetery. He was born on the 27th July, 1774, married at the age of twenty-nine, and lived with his wife in the same room for sixty-one years. His wife, who was three years younger than himself, died thirteen years since at the age of eighty-eight. For seven years past the Indigent Blind Visiting Society has done all in its power to promote both his spiritual and temporal welfare. The only surviving issue is a widow daughter, aged seventy-three."

LONDON MORTALITY continues somewhat high, and the deaths during the last two weeks have numbered 1,877 and 1,694, being respectively an increase of 85 and a decrease of 183 [illegible] 219 and 65 above the average, and at the rate of 27·3 and 24·7 per 1,000. The fatal cases of diarrhœa were 371 and [illegible] an increase of 13 and a decrease of 127. [illegible] 18 and 13 deaths from small-pox (a decrease of 7 and 41); [illegible] and 77 from whooping-cough (a fall of 12); 26 in both weeks from scarlet fever (a [illegible]); 21 and 32 from fever (a rise of 11); 19 and 14 from measles (an increase of 7 and a decrease of 5); and 6 and 11 from diphtheria (an increase of 1 and 5). The births registered numbered 2,659 and 2,241, being 269 above and 112 below the average. The mean temperature was 60·5 and 65·9 deg. (1·8 and 3·9 deg. above the average); while the registered sunshine was 30·7 and 54·5 hours out of the 107·8 and 105·2 hours during which the sun was above the horizon, being thus at the rate of 28 and 52 per cent.

"Turning round, we saw a stranger standing behind us in the open doorway

By FRANCES ELEANOR TROLLOPE

AUTHOR OF "A CHARMING FELLOW," "AUNT MARGARET'S TROUBLE," "BLACK SPIRITS AND WHITE," ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.

Signor Sandro came, and he brought with him a companion. I was not pleased to hear this announcement that my old maestro was not alone. The presence of a stranger was particularly distasteful to me at that moment, and I had a strong opinion that he would take up Signor Sandro's time and attention, of which I was greedy. However, there he was, and there was no help for it, and Signor Sandro assured me that his friend would not trouble us.

"Why, Maestro," said I, "this is something new. You picking up a new acquaintance, and consenting even to make an excursion to Tivoli in his company! What does it mean?"

"Am I such a bear, such a misanthrope, such a curmudgeon, that I can't make friends with a stranger? Is that what you mean, Caterina?"

"Something like that," I answered, saucily. "Only for 'can't' read 'won't.' You know one word makes the most important difference in a text sometimes. But tell me about this man. I'm sure he can't be a common person, or you would never have consented to travel with him."

The implied compliment pleased Signor Sandro mightily. He was perfectly frank and open in showing that it pleased him, and observed with much simplicity that he was glad to find I had at least appreciated that point in his character, namely, a contempt and dislike for the conventional and commonplace. "You don't altogether appreciate me, Caterina," he said. "You set up your judgment against mine, in all sorts of cases, but——"

"Never in Art, Master!"

"Never in Art? Well, no. I suppose not. You do allow me to know something about painting, I believe. But in knowledge of the world, now—in the conduct of life—you stick to your own opinion with an obstinacy—but, già, all the English are obstinate. Rodolfo is as obstinate as a buffalo."

"Who may Rodolfo be?"

"Ah, I forgot, you don't know his name. I don't know it either. At least I can't say it, so I call him Rodolfo."

"Master, you're talking Chinese! I'm bewildered. Please to explain?"

Then Signor Sandro did explain, and this was his explanation. The stranger whose acquaintance he had made, and whom he had brought with him to Tivoli, was an Englishman who had come to his studio, and pleased the old artist by some intelligent observations on his pictures. They had got into conversation, and then the stranger pleased him still more by his enthusiasm on behalf of the unity and independence of Italy, and his praises of Garibaldi. He had himself shouldered a rifle under the command of the patriot soldier, on hearing which Signor Sandro had at once embraced him—considerably to the Englishman's surprise and discomfiture, as I gathered. Their acquaintance ripened rapidly, however, and their good understanding had certainly not been impaired by the fact that the Englishman had purchased a picture of Signor Sandro. It was a work that had long lain in the studio, and which my poor master had despaired of selling at all—the scene from Livy of Mucius Scævola before Porsena. Often had I heard Signor Sandro sigh as he looked at this picture on which he had lavished all his best skill, and which was really a fine thing. And then he would snort disdainfully, and shake his head, and cry out upon the debased taste of the day, and declare that it was worse than useless to aim at high, historical art, and that what the world liked was portraits of theatrical costumes, with a mannikin inside them, devoid of grandeur, poetry, or ideas. And now he had sold his Mucius Scævola at a fair price. I was overjoyed, and congratulated him heartily. "Well, Maestro," said I, "I won't grumble at your Englishman any more since he has shown such right feeling."

Signor Sandro declared that his Englishman was a most wonderful man. He had been all over the world, was self-educated, and with great natural taste for artistic things. "He taught himself Latin, used to read Virgil and Horace, puzzling them out line by line, when he was keeping sheep in Australia! Think of that, Caterina! And he can read our poets too; has some cantos of Dante by heart, although he pronounces it—Ah, Dio grande, how he massacres the dolce favella when he tries to speak it! But no matter, he is a fine fellow is Rodolfo," said my old master, emphatically.

"And what is his name, pray? since it certainly is not Rodolfo!"

For all answer Signor Sandro pulled a visiting card out of his pocket-book, and handed it to me. On the card was printed in common square type, "R. Rutherford, Scaur Cottage."

"Oh," said I, "Rutherford!"

Signor Sandro looked at me with a naïve admiration, akin to that felt by the traditional Cockney, who was struck with surprise at hearing the little children in Boulogne speak French so glibly. "Caspita! How quick you say it," exclaimed Sandro. "But what a language! Who is to pronounce it?"

Then he began to ask about Lucy. We were alone in our sitting-room, he and I. It was early, and Lucy was not yet up, but I expected her to make her appearance every moment. I proposed taking a little walk with my master, so as to have an opportunity of speaking to him uninterruptedly. So, leaving word with Sora Nanna that I should return, in case my sister asked for me, I put on my hat, and Signor Sandro and I went out together. We took our way along the terrace road leading to the Villa of Varus. All was still, peaceful, and beautiful in the fresh morning air. When we came to a part of the road where there is a semi-circular stone parapet commanding the wide view, I stopped, and, leaning on the low wall, gave Signor Sandro a brief recital of all that had passed since we had left Rome. I had considered the question beforehand, and had resolved that it was best to confide in him. His goodwill I did not doubt; and if I mistrusted his discretion, or rather his power of fully sympathising with my view of the case, I still thought that less pain and annoyance to Lucy would arise from his being forewarned, than from allowing him to speak to her under the impression that we were still on good terms with the Corleoni. Lucy could not feign; and it would have been cruel to lay the burthen on her of explaining how matters stood.

In a few minutes I had to acknowledge to myself that I had not done my old master full justice in hesitating to trust him. Nothing could be better than his way of taking my confidence. He spoke of Lucy with the most chivalrous delicacy and tenderness. All his best qualities were roused on her behalf. And I own that his withering scorn of Don Vittorio was a cordial to me. I had had to suppress my own indignation against him in talking with Lucy to such a degree that it seemed to take a weight from my heart to be able to utter my full sentiments to a sympathising listener. As to the Princess, he was evidently surprised and puzzled by her behaviour. He agreed with me that she could not have been ignorant of what was going on, and that her assertions on that score were a mere pretence. "No, no; if Don Vittorio was in the habit of frequenting the schoolroom, depend on it the Princess Olympia knew it. She is no simpleton. We must do her that justice," said my master. And he could not be brought to see—or, at least, to say, for he repeated the current phrases of his countrymen rather from the lips than the heart—that some measure of simplicity would have been the only possible excuse for the Princess's conduct; and that since she had been aware from the first of her son's pursuit of Lucy, her affectation of surprise and horror when it suited her to avow the knowledge of it to my sister was a base and cruel piece of hypocrisy. I believe that in his heart he did loathe such treachery, but so great is the power of a conventional phrase that "simpleton" sounded in his ears a worse reproach than "liar."

Another thing struck me with surprise in his reception of my narrative, and that was the power to injure us which he seemed to ascribe to the Princess Corleoni.

"PEACE AND WAR"—A SKETCH OFF THE NEEDLES, ISLE OF WIGHT

FOREIGN

THE EASTERN QUESTION.——The Austrians are gradually completing their occupation of Bosnia, but their progress is still vigorously contested by the insurgents, who have proved no mean combatants, and have inflicted considerable loss on the Imperial troops. Thus there has been some really hard fighting. Marshal Philippovich advanced on Maglai on the 5th inst. to avenge the murder of the Hussars, and drove the rebels back to Zepce, where, on the 7th, he completely routed the enemy after a severe engagement, taking prisoners a whole battalion of Anatolian Redifs. Hadji Loja himself is said to have commanded at Zepce with a force of 6,500 men, including many Turkish regulars, but, after a vain attempt to retain the Vranduk-Zenica defile, he was compelled to retire on the Bosnian capital, Serajevo. As to Maglai itself, the inhabitants had prudently fled, and Marshal Philippovich found only a few Christian families, although he has since captured and shot several of the rebels concerned in the massacre. After imposing a fine of 5,000*l.* on the town, and proclaiming martial law throughout the province, the Marshal moved southwards to Vitez, to join the Duke of Wurtemburg. In his turn the Duke had entered Banialuka without the slightest opposition, and had signally defeated the insurgents both at Varcar-Vakuf and Jaice, while on Sunday he peacefully occupied Tmvnik. The united forces expect to be joined by Marshal Jovanovic from the south, and will then march upon the headquarters of the insurrection, Serajevo, and the Austrians look forward confidently to spending their Emperor's birthday (Sunday) in the town. Hadji Loja has strongly fortified the surrounding positions and commands some 100,000 men, while he has not paid the slightest attention to the "decisive instructions" telegraphed by the Porte, stating that the Austrians come as friends, and "all resistance is therefore pernicious and useless;" but the Provisional Government inside Serajevo do not sympathise with the insurgent chief, and are anxious for the arrival of the Austrians. Indeed, it is said that the inhabitants only join the insurgents because they are compelled to do so by Hadji Loja, who goes about inciting revolt everywhere. According to the latest report, Hadji Loja has given up the idea of defending Serajevo, and has fled into Albania. In the Herzegovina Marshal Jovanovic is reorganising the Government at Mostar, where the authorities had all been killed by the rebels, and has also occupied the small town of Stolac, to which the former Turkish commandant of Mostar had retired. A very serious check, however, has been sustained by the Austrians at Tuzla, near Svornik, on the Servian frontier, General Szapary being forced, after two days' fighting, to retreat on Gmeanica, owing, he asserts, to the failure of the transport service and to the lack of provisions. This conflict having taken place so near the Servian frontier, there is some suspicion that the Servians are lending a helping hand, especially as a Servian corps of observation is said to have been posted on the Drina. Meanwhile the Emperor of Austria is grievously disappointed at the opposition encountered, and the Porte has sent Mehemet Ali to pacify the provinces, thus pointing to an improved condition of the negotiations between Turkey and Austria.

The departure of the Russians from before CONSTANTINOPLE seems at length at hand. Forty thousand men, including the Imperial Guard, are to embark for Odessa to-day (Saturday), and the remainder of the army will afterwards vacate San Stefano and the neighbourhood, gradually falling back upon the lines of Eastern Roumelia, where fifty thousand men will be maintained. Adrianople is to be vacated in six weeks; and General Todleben considers that all the Russians will have left by the end of October. Before his departure from San Stefano General Todleben will hold a review of a hundred thousand men. Matters are not so satisfactory in ASIA. The Sultan, at the request of the Czar, has at length ordered the immediate evacuation of Batoum; but the population are reported to have risen against the Russians, while the Lazis at Trebizond are as obstinate as ever, and continue to declare themselves under English protection. Erzeroum and Bayazid are to be vacated by the Russians on the withdrawal of the British fleet from the Sea of Marmora.

ROUMANIA is becoming more reconciled to her Bessarabian spoliation; and the advantages of the Dobrudja are already being pointed out by a strong party. As to SERVIA, she has been celebrating the arrival of the war trophies at Belgrade, and is contemplating great festivities in honour of her independence, which is to be formally proclaimed on the 22nd inst. The real national festival, however, will not be held until December.

There is little news from CYPRUS, save contradictory reports of the health of the troops. Sir Garnet Wolseley has gone into camp near Nicosia, where the inhabitants have petitioned for Greek to be declared the official language, but they have been told that English must be used. The Indian regiments have commenced re-embarking for their return home.

FRANCE.——Perfect quiet in affairs political and social, continues to prevail in France. Even the usual amount of speech-making during the vacation is lacking at present, and M. Gambetta has refused to respond to an invitation from Marseilles, giving his would-be hosts only a few fresh hints on the necessity for unity, concord, and disdain of provocation amongst the Republican party. The Minister of Public Works, however, has been going the round of the Channel ports with a view to improving the harbours, and speaking at a banquet given him at Havre, declared that the Government was devoting itself to the development of the country's prosperity, and to the conversion of its opponents into auxiliaries. One auxiliary has certainly been gained in M. de Fourtou, an ex-Minister of May 16th, who has joined the Republican side, but the Liberals do not welcome him very heartily, and are busy grumbling at M. Dufaure for the recent changes in the magistrature, which they do not consider sufficiently sweeping. These changes, however, have seriously annoyed the Conservatives, who are further enraged at their ill-success in the elections for the Councils-General, only one candidate having hitherto obtained a seat.

The cab-strike in Paris has come to an end, and the Compagnie des Petites Voitures has yielded to the men's demands. The cabmen are now to work on the feuille system—i.e., the drivers will be paid a fixed salary, and their fares entered on a schedule, instead of the former plan of compelling them to bring in 32 fr. per diem. Numbers of cabs reappeared in the streets before the conclusion of the strike, but the quality of the driving was most questionable, as anyone who could hold a rein was eagerly welcomed by the cab-proprietors.—Exhibition gossip is plentiful. There has been a fresh accession of Royal visitors, and more are expected for the distribution of prizes on Sept. 18th. Mr. Canliffe Owen has been entertained at a dinner by the Australian Commissioners, whose hearty compliments were paid to France, the Prince of Wales, and everybody concerned with the Exhibition; successful experiments have been made with the telephone between Paris and Versailles; a horse show will open on the 1st prox., and a grand lottery is being organised, part of the proceeds to be devoted towards helping the poorer classes to visit the Exhibition, and the rest to the purchase of prizes for the ticket-holders. A million of one franc tickets will be issued.—Several fresh Congresses have opened, the most important being the International Monetary Conference, presided over by the Finance Minister, M. Léon Say.—The Parisian regattas, which have never been held since the fall of the Empire, take place on the Seine to-morrow (Sunday); and the only theatrical novelty is an operetta at the Renaissance, Les Bijoux de Jeannette, by a new composer, M. A. Godard.—A grand anniversary mass in memory of M. Thiers is to be celebrated at Notre Dame on Sept. 3rd. The Ministers and the Diplomatic body will be present, and deputations will be sent from every department which had at any time elected the ex-President.

GERMANY.——The negotiations between Prince Bismarck and the Vatican have as yet produced no definite result, although the new Pontifical Secretary of State, Cardinal Nina, is anxious to pursue his predecessor Franchi's policy; and the Nuncio Masella, now at Kissingen, is said to have declared that the gulf between the Prince and himself was neither so wide nor so deep as had been imagined. It appears probable that no special convention will yet be drawn up, but a tacit agreement will be made, the May laws being differently applied in future. Parliament meets on the 9th prox., and it is hoped that the Emperor will be well enough to resume work early in autumn. He continues to benefit by his stay at Teplitz, and intends to be present at the September manœuvres at Cassel.—Since Nobiling's attempt 563 persons have been arrested for insults to Emperor William, and 521 of these have been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, while five committed suicide before their trial. The Bill against Socialism has been laid before the Federal Council. It contains some stringent measures against the Social Democrats, stating that their meetings, associations, and publications are prohibited, laying down penalties for various offences, and creating an Imperial Bureau for questions relating to public meetings and the press.

INDIA.——Violent rains have set in throughout the country, and have done considerable damage both to the crops and to the water-works, the water-supply of Bombay being threatened by a slip in the Oolsee Tunnel. Famine accounts are good in British India; but in Cashmere there is terrible distress, and no travellers are to be allowed in the country. The great topic in India, however, is the advance of the Russians in Central Asia, as a Muscovite Mission to Cabul has been warmly received by the Ameer of Afghanistan, who gave a grand review in their honour. An English Mission to the Ameer is going to leave Peshawur for Cabul next month, under the charge of Lieutenant-General Sir Neville Chamberlain. Should the Russian expedition in Central Asia occupy Vakhan, which is said to be one of the six khanates whose occupation is aimed at by the Mission, the distance between the English and Russian frontiers will be reduced to 325 miles; while the roads from Vakhan over the intervening plateau to India are easily passable in summer. The Emir of Vakhan is a feudatory of the ruler of Afghanistan.

MISCELLANEOUS.——The appointment of Cardinal Nina as Pontifical Secretary is favourably regarded in ITALY. Nina, who is sixty-six years of age, is a man of moderate principles and considerable tact, though little known to the outside world.—In SPAIN the Phylloxera has appeared near Madrid.—In the UNITED STATES a terrible tornado has visited Wallingford, Connecticut, killing 21 and injuring 50 persons, and destroying numerous buildings; while a railway collision occurred at Steubenville, Ohio, where 15 persons were killed and 50 injured, many of the sufferers being British immigrants.—CANADA is delighted at the prospect of her new Viceroy, and has meanwhile been indulging in an Orange riot at Ottawa, suppressed after some trouble.—Celestials in VANCOUVER'S ISLAND are to be taxed 8*l.* a head.—In CHINA the Chefoo Convention with England has been signed. It provides a suitable apology and an indemnity for the murder of Mr. Margary at Yunnan, permits the establishment of British officers in Yunnan after 1881 to watch the state of trade, introduces reforms in the official intercourse between Britain and China, and, amongst other alterations in the conditions of trade, promises to open four new ports, a promise already fulfilled.

THE COURT

THE principal members of the Royal Family are still in the Isle of Wight, where Her Majesty continues her daily walks and drives with the Princess Beatrice, while Prince Leopold takes an occasional sail in the Alberta. On Saturday Viscount Barrington, the Vice-Chamberlain, presented an address to Her Majesty from the House of Commons, and in the evening the Royal dinner party included Lady Abercromby, the Rev. J. and Lady Florence Blunt, General the Right Hon. Sir Thomas and the Hon. Lady Biddulph. On Sunday the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold attended Divine Service at Osborne, the Rev. J. St. John Blunt, Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, officiating. On Monday Lady Abercromby, the Earl and Countess of Wilton, Lord and Lady Colville of Culross, and Rear-Admiral the Hon. F. Foley dined with Her Majesty, and on the following day Her Majesty, the Princess Beatrice, and the Duke of Connaught embarked on board the Victoria and Albert, and inspected the Particular Service Squadron at Spithead, Prince Leopold viewing the proceedings from his own yacht, the Alberta. We reserve however, a detailed account of this until next week, when we shall publish numerous engravings illustrative of the event. On Wednesday Her Majesty held a Council. The Queen will leave the Isle of Wight for Scotland next week, and on her way thither will stay from Saturday to Monday with the Duchess of Roxburgh at Broxmouth Park, near Dunbar. From thence her Majesty will go on to Balmoral, passing through Dundee, where the town authorities are preparing to give Her Majesty a suitable reception.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and their children also remain in the Isle of Wight, and on Saturday the Prince was present at a garden party given by Count Batthyany to the members of the Royal Yacht Squadron at Eaglehurst Castle, at the entrance of Southampton Water. On Monday, the Prince and Princess and their two sons went to Southampton and laid the foundation stone of the Wilberforce Memorial Church, after which the Royal party adjourned to the Deanery grounds, and took tea with the Rev. Canon and Mrs. Wilberforce, returning to Cowes early in the evening.—On Tuesday the Prince and Princess accompanied the Queen in the Victoria and Albert during Her Majesty's inspection of the Fleet—the Prince wearing the uniform of the Naval Reserve.

CHURCH NEWS

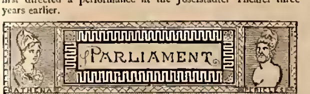
THE ST. ALBAN'S RITUAL CASE.——Mr. Mackonochie has achieved another triumph over his prosecutors, or "persecutors," as he would doubtless call them, the Court of Queen's Bench (that is, the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Mr. Justice Mellor, in opposition to Mr. Justice Lush) having decided that the whole of the proceedings in the case before Lord Penzance are null and void in consequence of the non-observance of certain methods of procedure. The effect of the judgment is that when Mr. Mackonochie has been once condemned for illegal practices, and has undergone the punishment awarded by the Court, he can at once resume those very practices and can only be again punished, if at all, by means of a de novo prosecution as lengthy and expensive as the first, and so on with the third, fourth, or four hundredth breach of the law, until the patience or purse of one of the litigants is exhausted. It is true that the Lord Chief Justice added that such summary jurisdiction as was claimed would be "exceedingly useful in order to prevent erratic clergymen from setting the law at defiance and retaining benefices in a Church the rules and ritual of which they habitually disregard, if the Legislature should think fit to confer it." But law-making is a slow process, and now that the session is over the Ritualists can at least have it all their own way for another year.—Speaking on Wednesday at a meeting of Ritualists at Willenhall, Mr. Mackonochie, who was loudly cheered, said it was with a certain amount of gratification that he felt that he was free from pressure for a time. It was satisfactory to have a definite rest, and none the less so that the Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment, had not only prevented the particular suspension in question from being served, but had also swept away all previous sentences of suspension.

VARIOUS.——Cyprus has been added to the See of Gibraltar, and the Bishop will visit the island during the autumn.—The strife at St. James's, Hatcham, still continues. A fortnight ago a portion of the congregation interfered to prevent the clergy and choir walking in procession around the church, and last Sunday there was an angry discussion between the Rev. Mr. M'Coll and the churchwardens respecting the use of incense before the service, and Mr. Fry declared that on Sunday next (to-morrow), the people would attend in hundreds to prevent the practice.—The case as to the religion of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Agar-Ellis came, on appeal, before the Lords Justices last week, and was postponed to November, each parent promising, in the meantime, not to take the children to church without the consent of the other.—The seventy-first conference of the New Jerusalem or Swedenborgian Church was opened at Salford on Tuesday. Nineteen ministers and sixty-seven representatives signed the roll, the Rev. Wm. Bruce, of London, being elected president. The reports showed that there were sixty-three societies connected with the denomination, which possesses 4,842 members.—The Rev. George Gilfillan, of Dundee, the well-known minister of the United Presbyterian Church, died on Tuesday after half-an-hour's illness. He had preached on the previous Sunday on the subject of "Sudden Death."—The Marquis of Bute has given 4,000*l.* towards a fund for the erection of a Roman Catholic cathedral in Dundee, to commemorate the re-establishment of the Bishopric of Dunkeld, which ceased about 292 years ago.

MUSIC

COVENT GARDEN PROMENADE CONCERTS.——The concerts this year, up to the time at which we write, would seem to be more than usually successful. The directors are carrying out their pledges to the letter. The Beethoven Symphony every Monday is not a mere bait for amateurs of the "high school," but a genuine attraction. The No. 2 (D) on Monday last was listened to with quite as much interest by the audience generally as the No. 1 (C) on the Monday previous, and moreover, was quite as well played under the direction of Mr. Arthur Sullivan. The second classical concert, on Wednesday, was even better than the first, and among the most noticeable features was a wonderfully fine performance of Mendelssohn's A major symphony (the "Italian"). No little of the effect produced was due to the judicious tempi given by Mr. Sullivan to each of the four movements—tempi which the illustrious composer himself would have approved. The new pianist, Madame Montigny Rémaury, is an artist in the strictest acceptation of the word. The high repute she enjoys in her native country has been affirmed on more than one occasion by her performances here. She possesses all the requirements that go to proclaim a mistress of her art—the purest, nay almost infallible Technique; a crisp and elastic touch; a tone that at once satisfies the ear, together with a power of graduating it which is one of the rarest gifts; an expression all the more attractive because, though deeply felt, it is never affected, never overdrawn; an execution apparently equal to any task she may undertake. Thus briefly we have summed up the qualities that make the playing of Madame Montigny Rémaury as satisfying to the initiated as it is attractive to the uninitiated—who know not why and care not wherefore, so long as they are pleased. That both sections of the musical community, amateur and connoisseur, are pleased with Madame Montigny is shown in the loud and unanimous applause invariably greeting the gifted French lady's performances. The fact of her playing with equal ability Mendelssohn's impetuous Capriccio Brillante in B minor, absurdly called Rondo, seeing that it has nothing of the rondo form, and the first of Beethoven's concertos, so full of Mozart-like radiant simplicity and grace (as distant from Nos. 4 and 5 as the North Pole from the South), proves that her talent is not only special but versatile. Her success in the one, as decided as her success in the other, was further borne out by her facile and brilliant execution of a gavotte by Silas and a tarantella by Wehli. We owe it in justice to Mr. Sullivan and his admirable orchestra to state that we have never heard the accompaniments to Mendelssohn's Capriccio and Beethoven's concerto given with more strict attention, accuracy, and point. By the way, we are glad to observe that Mr. Sullivan finds it expedient to have recourse to Auber for his lighter overtures. Models in their way, they at once put the audience in good humour. They constitute a mine, too, by no means easy to exhaust. The "selections" since our last have been from Faust and Un Ballo in Maschera, in both of which the band of the Coldstreams, under Mr. Fred Godfrey's direction, act important parts. Miss Rose Hersee and Madame Patey, two of the most distinguished artists, have been added to the already strong list of singers, and the vocal selections have been varied and attractive. Mr. Cellier—three movements from whose Symphony in G, played with remarkable spirit, engendered a desire to hear the omitted first allegro—now conducts the whole of the second part so ably that there is little cause to regret the non-appearance of M. Métra.

WAIFS.——The great violinist, August Wilhelmj, leaves for New York on the 10th of next month.—The handsome building in the Palmengarten, the pride of Frankfort-on-Maine, where such admirable concerts used to be given, amid such pleasant surroundings, was burnt to the ground on the 10th inst. This catastrophe follows with ominous quickness upon the burning of the Stadt Theater in the same city.—Mr. Carl Rosa has returned from Paris, having secured the acting-right of Piccolino, the opera which gained for its composer, M. Guiraud, the price of 3,000 francs, awarded by the French Academy to the best musical work produced during the last three years.—It is reported that Mdlle. Sangalli, danseuse d'élite at the Paris Grand Opera, is about to abandon entrechats for roulades—Terpsichore for Euterpe—in plain English to become a singer instead of a dancer.—The new grand organ erected by Cavaillé-Coll in the Trocadéro was inaugurated by the well-known organist, M. Guilmant. Amateurs complain that the programme was by no means worthy the occasion; but, seeing that the most trivial ad captandum effusions alone excited any interest among the vast crowd, while the masterpieces of J. S. Bach and Handel were listened to—if, indeed, they can be said to have been listened to—with profound indifference, M. Guilmant seems to have estimated with tolerable judgment the musical capacity of his probable audience (admitted gratis, by the way).—The lowering of the orchestra at the Cologne Theatre, in accordance with the plan originally suggested by Wagner, and carried out by that wholesale reformer with unbending severity during the memorable performances of the Ring des Nibelungen at Bayreuth, seems to have met with approval from many amateurs, but with disapproval from as many others. The members of the orchestra are all against it, which, to those who remember the sweltering days of August, 1876, in that out-of-the-way Franconian town where Wagner has built his home, can cause no surprise.—It is said that not a few of the chief operatic managers of Germany intend going to Paris for the purpose of attending the first representation of Gounod's long-expected Polyeucte. Donizetti's Poliuto (Les Martyrs) is by this time pretty well forgotten; but those who still retain some memory of it are curious to learn in how different a manner the eminent French composer may have treated the subject. After the quasi-failure of Cinq Mars, the composer of Faust owes his many admirers a new success.—The bronze medallion belonging to the monument of the great dramatic composer, Gluck, erected in the chief cemetery of Vienna as far back as 1846, has been stolen—in all probability by the same nocturnal marauders who, not long since, despoiled the tomb of the incomparable Mozart.—Meyerbeer's Africaine seems to be going the round of the civilised world. It has lately been produced at Seville, the city of the Figaros, Bartolos, Basilios, Rosinas, and Almavivas, and, although Spain is jealous of Portugal, and Vasco di Gama was a Portuguese, with extraordinary success.—M. Maurice Strakosch has arrived in London from Norway. His new and youngest protégée, Mdlle. Stella Faustina, appears to have been everywhere successful.—The 70th anniversary of the well-known song-composer and conductor, Heinrich Proch, was recently celebrated at Vienna. Proch, who had been connected with the Imperial Opera House since 1840, first directed a performance at the Josefstädter Theater three years earlier.



PARLIAMENT was prorogued on Friday with the usual ceremony. As a matter of fact so many members had during the past fortnight taken the opportunity of proroguing themselves that the House of Commons had been reduced to an almost ludicrous condition in point of attendance. Under any circumstances it is difficult to keep a House together after 12th of August. But this year the 12th of August arrived and found both Houses sitting after a session which had been extended at the other end by three weeks. The desertions were accordingly more than usually extensive, and in these latter days it has required all the persuasions and authority of the Ministerial "whips" to keep together the number requisite to make a House, and maintain a majority. The only "burning" question remaining unquenched in this last week of the Session related to Ireland, and the prolonged attendance of Irish Members has never been a matter about which the "whips" have felt it necessary to display much anxiety. As long as the Irish Sunday Closing Bill remained on the orders, and whilst the Intermediate Education Bill was yet incomplete, Irish Members were certain to remain in town.

The monotony of the closing days of the Session was varied on Saturday by the sitting set apart for the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. This measure, which has been a sort of legislative football throughout the Session, had at length been kicked within sight of the goal. By dint of desperate fighting in the dead watches of the night, the united and determined minority opposed to the bill had been beaten back, and the measure awaited only its third reading. There was a time when this ultimate success was seriously threatened. The Government long ago found it necessary to promise to support the Bill. But, oddly enough, it found in the Treasury Bench a determined opponent in the Minister immediately concerned with it. Mr. James Lowther, the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, has conscientious scruples about interfering with the freedom of the people, more especially in the direction of drinking freely on Sundays. Many a Minister in his position would have dissembled his feelings, and, yielding to Cabinet authority and the exigencies of the political situation, would at least have remained silent. Mr. Lowther, to his credit be it recorded, is not a man with whom such a course is possible. If he likes or dislikes a thing the audience he addresses is pretty certain to be informed of his predilection. Thus, during the debates on the Sunday Closing Bill, the House of Commons has been amused by the curious spectacle of a member of a Ministry pledged to carry a particular measure frankly proclaiming his hope that the measure would fail to pass.

Mr. Lowther's honest prejudice and the somewhat clamorous opposition of Mr. Denzil Onslow notwithstanding, the Sunday Closing Bill made its way through the House of Commons, and stands in the not too extensive list of Bills which have received the Royal Assent. There has been a great deal of sound and fury in the Opposition, but when it has been brought to the test it has been found to signify nothing. The opponents of the measure have known exactly how far they might go, and they have had the good sense not to waste their own energies in an attempt to exceed those limits. Thus, though there has been a good deal of bluster throughout the week when the probability of a Saturday sitting was mentioned, when the sitting was actually held the third reading was agreed to after the principal opponents to the measure had fired a last shot over the grave of their hopes. Of course absolutely nothing was left to say on the subject. But that is not a condition of affairs which precludes members of Parliament from making speeches. The friends of the Bill resolutely refused to open their mouths, and when half-a-dozen speeches from their little band of opponents had been duly delivered one last division was taken, and, amid such cheers as the half empty House could raise, the Sunday Closing Bill passed its last stage in the House of Commons.

On Monday, the Irish Intermediate Education Bill occupied the House throughout the whole of the melancholy sitting. This is a measure on the efficacy of which all parties are, by a rare unison, agreed, and it might reasonably have appeared that the Bill should pass without a repetition of the debate which took place on the second reading. But a new political combination has been evolved in the House of Commons in the presence of this Bill. Mr. Charles Lewis and Mr. Newdegate have united their forces, Mr. Lewis scenting concurrent endowment in the Bill, and Mr. Newdegate espying the cowl of the Jesuit under the nineteenth century hat of possible Commissioners. Mr. Lewis, who had made an able speech on the second reading, repeated it on the stage which occupied the House on Monday, and Mr. Newdegate, to his increasing dolour, was more than once called to order by the Speaker for wandering to Maynooth and other remote places whilst discussing the Bill. But in the end, which came about one o'clock in the morning, the Bill passed, and Mr. Newdegate's life is saddened by a fresh sorrow.

On Tuesday the Indian Budget was brought on, the customary emptiness of the House being cultivated by the fact that at the same hour the great majority of the members who had remained in town were getting wet at Spithead, whilst watching the Naval Review. It is more than probable that but for the accident that a Royal Commission was in possession of the House of Lords (a fact which, per se, constitutes a House in the Commons), we should have witnessed the ignominious spectacle of the House of Commons being unable to discuss the Indian Budget, because they could not get forty members to make a show of listening at the outset. Mr. Stanhope, who confirmed the impression of his ability by the manner in which he discharged his duty in making the annual financial statement, spoke in the presence of thirty-five members, a number which marked the high tide of attendance during the evening. Sir George Balfour and Sir George Campbell—the latter unquestionably a high authority on Indian finance—succeeded in further reducing the attendance, and there were many perilous moments during which Mr. Biggar, had he been maliciously disposed, might have brought the proceedings to an ignominious end by counting out. Of course much virtuous indignation was expressed at this state of things; but, to tell the truth, it does not greatly exceed the average condition of matters, thirty being rather a full attendance for an Indian debate.

Wednesday was devoted to some miscellaneous business; on Thursday the last threads of the business of the Session were picked up; and on Friday Parliament was prorogued.

II.

IN the Contemporary Review we have a paper from Mr. R. A. Proctor, on the New Crater in the Moon, said to have been discovered by Dr. Klein, of Koeln, in the lunar region called the Sea of Vapours. Mr. Proctor admits that it would be remarkable if previous astronomical observers had failed to notice a crater really existing where one now assuredly exists, nevertheless it seems his contention that the crater may have been always in its present position, though there may have been causes, some of them enumerated by him, which prevented it from being distinguished. In any case he thinks the existence of the crater is not due to any fresh volcanic action in the moon, but simply to mechanical changes.—The article by Mr. Walter James, M.P., on "The Parochial Charities of the City," contains some information rather startling to "outsiders." There are one hundred and twelve parishes in the City, with an aggregate income of 101,380*l.*, a large part of which—we may probably say at least one half—was intended orignally for the benefit of the poor, and for charitable purpose within the parish. But many of these parishes have now no poor, and some hardly any resident population at all, and the revenues are administered by the churchwardens and overseers at their discretion for miscellaneous objects. Mr. James's suggestion that each City parish should be united to some populous metropolitan district, where genuine "poor" are to be met with in swarms, seems worthy of attention.—Under the title of "The Scot," Professor Blackie protests with lively indignation against "a class of small thinkers in London," who are bent upon obliterating all the most marked national characteristics of Scotland, and turning the country into a mere copy of England. We did not know that such a nefarious design was entertained by anybody, and trust that it may meet the fate it deserves, and that Scottish nationality may weather the storm; even though, perhaps, we are hardly prepared to admit, even on the authority of "a philosopher like Lord Brougham," that Scottish speech is "a pure and classical tongue, on no account to be regarded as a mere provincial dialect." It will a little surprise some of us to find Professor Blackie enumerating among the qualities most conspicuous in the Scot "a deep sense of the humorous," but we fancy that by the "sense of the humorous" he means that Scotch "wut" which the Southerner is apt to find somewhat ponderous and dreary.—The Abbé Martin gives us a paper on the reasons which hinder the Ritualists from becoming Roman Catholics, which does not seem to us to throw any fresh light upon the subject; but is noticeable all the same for its amiability and generosity of tone, and recognition of much that is excellent and attractive in the Church of England; and from Mr. R. Stuart Poole we have a paper on "Cyprus: its Present and Future," valuable in every way, but especially valuable for its account of the archæological riches of the island, which, "like Assyria, is a land of buried cities."

In Blackwood we have a sketch of the great Prince Bismarck, "By One of His Countrymen," chiefly interesting for the picture it gives us of the German Chancellor in his home life. The Prince, with all his proclivities in the direction of blood and iron, seems to be what is called in advertisements "a thoroughly domesticated" person, fond of his wife and children, and adored by them in return, delighting in country life, and an ardent admirer of nature.—Some recollections of Miss Cushman, the great American actress, are decidedly worth reading, and in "Summer in the Hills" we have a celebration of the supreme joys of grouse-shooting in the Highlands, and of the perhaps minor, but still keen, delights to be found in wanderings in the Cumberland Hills, the South Downs, the Pyrenees, or the Alps, with a good deal of spirit, and in the jovial rollicking tone that seems somehow proper to Blackwood.

The pièce de résistance in Macmillan is Mr. Hamilton Lang's interesting sketch of Cyprus, full of important information as to the country, its inhabitants, its capabilities, and its administration, the result of nine years' residence in the island as Consul. It would be impossible in the brief space at our command to do justice to such an article, and, besides, it has been so freely quoted in the daily press that we may "assume" a considerable knowledge of it on the part of our readers.—Mr. Laing Meason gives us his four years' experiences in the Turkish service as Commandant of the Police of the Lebanon, to which office he was appointed in 1861, under Daoud Pasha, the Christian Governor of the Mountain, and the first Christian who had ever been elevated to the rank of Pasha. The paper is well worth reading, but will hardly please those who still continue to cherish romantic ideas on the subject of Eastern Christians.—In "The Child in the House" we have what seems the first of a series of "Imaginary Portraits," by Mr. Walter Pater, giving us a study of "that process of brain-building by which we are each one of us what we are," as exhibited in the mind of a singularly sensitive and imaginative child, worked out with much subtlety and delicacy of thought, and in language which betrays almost too careful an attention to "form."

In Fraser we have from Mr. M'Coan a very substantial paper on "The Races of Asiatic Turkey," of which he enumerates no less than ten; and some more picturesque and entertaining sketches of life "Among the Burmese."—In "A June Day's Fancies," our old friend "A.K.H.B." gives us one of his rambling and disjointed essays on things in general, which, as usual, does not come to much that we can see, but may yet please those who can find delight in genial commonplace; and Mr. Edmund Gurney, in a paper "On the Controversy of Life," attempts—we cannot say more than "attempts"—a refutation of Mr. Mallock's somewhat pessimistic views set forth in his inquiry "Is Life Worth Living?" published in the Nineteenth Century about a year ago.—The article on "Africa and the Africans," by Mr. G. W. Blyden, who describes himself as "a negro," may also, perhaps, have attraction for some readers.

The Church Quarterly Review for July contains an article on "The Dogmatic Position of the Church of England," with which the writer seems very well satisfied, in spite of the great variety of theological opinion visible within the Anglican pale, as contrasted with the comparative homogeneity of several other religious bodies. He insists that the uniformity of the Roman Communion is more apparent than real; and that "even assuming such uniformity to be a good in itself, and a note of the true Church, it was certainly neither attained, nor so much as aimed at, until within the last three centuries." The paper is written with ability; but we should recommend the author, before again speaking ex cathedrâ on the doctrine of Papal Infallibility, to be at the pains of learning what that doctrine really is.—"In Dante and Goethe" the two poets are contrasted as representatives, the one of the "Ages of Faith," the other of the sceptical "modern spirit,"—we need hardly say, very much to the disadvantage of the latter; and the papers on "Bishop Selwyn" and "Religion in Madagascar" also call for favourable mention.

The North American Review is chiefly remarkable for an article on "The Failure of Universal Suffrage," by Mr. Francis Parkman, which gives clear and powerful expression to the discontent and almost despair with which educated and thoughtful Americans regard the working of their political system, now that it is so largely controlled by those two influences, unknown in the days of its first founders—"an ignorant proletariat, and a half-taught plutocracy." And no better proof of the grave charges brought by Mr. Parkman against the present state of things in the United States could be given than the paper, brimful of political and financial rant and rubbish, which, under the title of "The Outlook," we have here from Mr. Wendell Phillips, who, nevertheless, is looked upon, we believe, in America as a politician of mark.

In All the Year Round we have a most entertaining little essay on the curiosities of Advertising, with some extraordinary examples. Here, for instance, is a triumph in the way of abbreviations. "Baker's to let; crowded part; doing seven sacks besides small goods; could be easily doubled; no Sunday trade, but can be done; and bakings would pay the rent." Or, again, "Tie hands wanted, used to Dukes," by which, it seems, we are not to understand peers of the realm, but a particular class of neckties. The paper entitled "Among the Dukeries" is also very readable "padding," and we note that Mrs. Cashel Hoey commences a new story under the title of "All or Nothing."

In Scribner's Magazine we have some good papers, as the sketch of Vera Cruz on the Pacific, the paper on the late William Cullen Bryant, and his home at Cummington, and the "Glimpses of New England Farm Life." And these and many others are copiously adorned with illustrations which in artistic excellence seem to us decidedly above those contained in any other magazine of the day. The little picture at p. 514, for instance, styled "A Glimpse of November," is really admirable.

There is not much that calls for notice in The Gentleman's Magazine, unless it be an article by Mr. Grant Allen on "Hellas and Civilisation," which lays much stress on the importance of the commercial element in Hellas in helping to make Greek culture and Greek history what they were.—Mr. Dutton Cook tells us something of the career of Dodd, the actor who was the original impersonator of Sir Benjamin Backbite in The School for Scandal, and of Dangle in The Critic; and Captain Whyte Melville brings "Roy's Wife" to a conclusion.

The Atlantic Monthly contains a good paper on the present condition of the Stage in Germany which may be read with interest; and in "Social Notes," we have sundry little essays on topics of a social and educational character, some of which contain useful suggestions, though none have much claim to literary excellence.

THE MANUFACTURE OF PORCELAIN IN JAPAN is yearly increasing in quantity and quality, and is now one of the principal industries of the Empire. Porcelain was first brought prominently into use in Japan by the introduction of tea ten centuries ago. Tea-drinking, however, threatens to be superseded by the consumption of Lager beer, as a large brewery has been established at Tokio under the superintendence of a Japanese, who has been studying brewing in Germany for some years, and is now intended to train his compatriots in the process.

THE OCCUPATION OF CYPRUS—SOME ARCHITECTURAL SKETCHES

RURAL NOTES

THE CROPS.——Although the weather has been very changeable during the past fortnight, it has been, on the whole, variable for the husbandman. The thunderous rains have not retarded the progressing of cutting and sheaving to any very injurious extent, so far as we have seen on our travels through large tracks of country, and have heard from correspondents in widely different localities. We do not remember a season in which the produce of the land was being so rapidly garnered. In the early districts many of the fields have been already cleared, and the others stooked ready for carting into the barnyard, or stacking in the homestead, or most convenient situation on the farm. The wheat crop, as we learn from a large number of returns from all parts of England and Wales, published in the Agricultural Gazette, is much better than was reaped either in 1876 or 1877, and will be quite an average of a good crop, while barley and oats will not be up to the mark. Our contemporary thus states the matter from the reports:—Wheat, over average, 47; average, 115; under average, 36. From 205 reports on barley we find 28 above average, 89 average, and 88 under average. Oats are reported upon by 208 reporters, 46 of whom give over average, 103 average, 59 under average. From 140 reports on beans, we find ten over average, 88 average, and 42 under. Peas are reported 8 over average, 76 average, and 54 under. Although these figures do not show superabundance, it is gratifying to know that in the case of wheat especially they are healthier far for farmers than last year, when, taking the percentages, this cereal was 71 under average, while this year it is 18. With the present low price of wheat farmers require a "fillip" in the quantity and quality of the produce to keep them from utter depression. The root crops are looking very well indeed, and potatoes, which have rarely been attacked by disease, promise to be a heavy yield.

FOREIGN LIVE STOCK FROM AMERICA.——It is quite evident that American farmers find it more profitable to send in their cattle to this country alive rather than in sides and quarters. During last week there were sent to the London market alone over 2,000, and every one of them arrived in capital condition, and some of them were of quality nearly as prime as any of our English beasts. In the first months of the year the imports of live stock fell off somewhat, but in the course of the last three they have increased greatly, chiefly owing to American importations. The total number of cattle received up to the end of July was 104,602, in round numbers 30,000 more than in the corresponding term of the previous year. Strangely enough, the increased numbers did not reduce prices, but increased them per head 1*l.* 2*s.*, the relative values being 22*l.* 1*s.* and 20*l.* 19*s.* The amount we paid for live stock, including sheep and swine, in the seven months was 3,921,539*l.*, and for dead meat 8,100,630*l.*, a total of 12,022,169*l.*, which is decidedly too much for a country so well adapted for the rearing and feeding of cattle and sheep. But until thorough security of tenure exists, and restrictive clauses in leases are abolished, land in this country can never yield its full increase either in the production of stock or corn.

MISCELLANEOUS.——If ever there was a man to whom the term may be applied of being ubiquitous, it is Mr. John Thornton, of shorthorn renown. Having "polished off" England for a time in the way of disposing of long-pedigreed and high-priced cattle of this aristocratic breed, he runs across the Channel to Ashfield, County Cork, to sell off a selection of Mr. Downing's herd, which are of pure lineage, the originals having been secured at large values, and of the Booth's, Killerby, and Warlaby blood. On the 23rd he is in County Meath, selling the bulk of Mr. Richard Chaloner's herd—a gentleman who has done very much to promote the breeding of shorthorns in Ireland, and whose name, when he exhibits, appears prominently in the prize lists of the principal Agricultural Shows in Ireland. Four days after Mr. Thornton is in the far North of Scotland, dispersing the entire herd of the late Mr. Gordon, of Cluny, a herd made celebrated by the fact that many of its progenitors came from the stock bred by the famous Captain Barclay, of Ury—who was a thorough farmer, as well as an athlete and admirer of the P.R.—and in two days more he is in the Isle of Man, "running down" Shorthorns there. —Mr. Mechi has chosen his epitaph, which all lovers of agriculture will pray may not be inscribed upon his tombstone for many years to come. It is a Scriptural one and appropriate, from 2 Chronicles xxvi. 10: "He Loved Husbandry."—There has been a good deal said in the papers lately about dis-horning cattle; and latterly the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals have taken the matter up, and heavy fines have been inflicted on one or two dealers. The practice is very common in the North with cattle, and in the South of Scotland with Cheviot sheep; it has been so for generations, and no cruelty has been complained of. It has been found that horned cattle worry and gore each other, and, consequently, they do not feed so well. One vicious wretch has power to disturb a whole shed full of cattle and drive them off their feeding. Mr. Mechi has written to say that he agrees with the practice of dis-horning. He purchased some Irish cattle robbed of their horns, and "he found them, unlike the Irish cattle generally, quiet, good-tempered, and good doers."—A very interesting corn sale took place at Mr. Prout's farm, at Sawbridgeworth, Herts, last week—the interest over ordinary crop sales being that, for thirteen years, Mr. Prout has continuously grown corn crops without the aid of any other than artificial manures, as he keeps no stock. Year by year he sells the straw of his farm, which most cultivators would consider precious bad farming; but he finds it profitable, and 10*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* for wheat, 9*l.* 15*s.* for barley, and 8*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* an acre for oats, and no trouble nor expense with them, in a year like this, are by no means condemnatory of Mr. Prout's style of farming.—Last year the judges appointed by the Royal Agricultural Society of England could find no self-binding reaping machine of sufficient merit upon which to bestow the gold medal; this year, after careful trial, they have given it to Mr. M'Cormick, for a machine of American construction.

SPORTING

THE TURF.——Some excellent racing was seen at Lewes on the Friday and Saturday of last week, and the meeting after many vicissitudes has established itself as one of the most popular of the year. Among the two-year-olds which showed at it may be mentioned Lord Hartington's Assegai, who won the Lewes Stakes, and Mr. Ellam's Marshal Scott, who beat a good field in the Astley Stakes. Curiously enough, the last named winner not fetching the reserve price put upon him at Mr. Ellam's annual yearling sale he was left on his owner's hands. So much for the judgment of critics of young stock. Julius Cæsar made short work of Rhidorroch and Leopold in Her Majesty's Plate, and consequently was strongly fancied for the Stakes on the following day, being made equal favourite with Rylstone. But, whether owing to infirmity of temper or some other cause, he could make no fight of it, and Rylstone repeated her last year's victory for Lord Hartington. It is not often that a lady appears on the turf as a runner of horses, but on the second day Mrs. Drewitt's Lady Mostyn took both the Hamsey Welter and the Town Plate, running kindly enough and showing somewhat of her old speed.—Most of the aristocratic supporters of the Turf have given up racing till Doncaster, or at least till York, and are either in their yachts, at their shooting-boxes in Grouseland, or scampering over the face of the earth. Hence the visitors to Egham and Windsor this week were mainly holiday folk, or inveterate punters who are never happy unless they are either winning or losing money. There was very good racing, as indeed there generally is on historic Runnymede, though not as many first-class animals put in an appearance as was expected, the two-year-olds for the most part being a second rate lot. The best field on the first day was that for the Stand Plate, there being eleven runners. Bishop Burton was elected favourite, but he had nothing to do with the finish, which was left to Preciosa and Tribute, who passed the post in the order named, the latter having to put up with another second on the following day in the Prince of Wales's Plate, in winning which Bishop Burton recompensed his followers. The Baron's Stakes for Two-Year-Olds only brought four runners to the post, of whom Captain Paget's Polpetti, the least fancied of the quartette, turned out the best.—The St. Leger market shows no great alteration, Beauclerc, after a slight show of opposition, having again returned to the top of the tree. As a two-year-old his performances were far ahead of those of any other animal, and it seems generally admitted that if he continues to stand training and gets to Doncaster safe and sound he will be made a very warm favourite. It is reported that an attempt by some scoundrels to "nobble" him, in his stable, a few days ago was frustrated.

CRICKET.——The Canterbury Week was a great success from every point of view, and, according to the fitness of things, the Kent cricketers came off with flying colours. Playing Thirteen against Eleven of England, they beat them eight wickets—in a style, too, which intimated they would have been a match for their antagonists with the sides even. In the first innings of Kent, Lord Harris, who has done so much to revive cricket in the county, scored 93, and Hearne 83. In the next game against the M.C.C., twelve a-side, Kent did equally well, winning by nine wickets, Mr. F. Penn scoring 51, and young Hearne again distinguishing himself with 60 (not out). For his excellent all-round play in both matches a subscription was made for him on the ground, and a good round sum was realised.—Torrents of rain prevented the return match between Yorkshire and Lancashire being played out at Fartown, near Huddersfield; and rain also necessitated a draw between Surrey and Middlesex at the Oval; though, as the latter had 341 runs to get to win, and had lost five wickets in getting 120 of them, it is not too much to say that Surrey had far the best of it. The return between Sussex and Yorkshire resulted in a victory for the Northern county by 226 runs, Sussex making the miserable totals of 35 and 24.—Gloucestershire has beaten Notts by 109 runs, the only large score being Mr. Moberley's 52 for the former.

AQUATICS.——If a grand dinner can properly come under the heading of this paragraph, be it recorded that such an event has been held at the Alexandra Palace in honour of John Higgins, the champion professional sculler. About 120 guests sat down, among whom were a large number of our best oarsmen, professional and amateur. During the evening the champion cup, presented by the proprietors of the Newcastle Chronicle, was handed to Higgins.

SWIMMING.——The tenth annual struggle for the Mile Amateur Championship came off in the Crystal Palace late on Saturday last, and for the fifth time in succession was won by Mr. H. Davenport, of the Ilex Club. He did the distance in 31 min. 15¼ sec.

YACHTING.——The Royal Victoria Yacht Club began its regatta on Wednesday, when the Ryde Town Cup for yachts of all rigs was won by H. F. Barclay's Ada, beating the Corisande, Jullanar, and two others.

LEGAL

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.——The charge of libel brought against Truth by Mr. Demetri Lambri was again before Alderman Sir W. Rose on Monday, when Lady Sebright was one of the witnesses. The Alderman expressed his intention of sending the case for trial, and severely criticised some of the private clubs which had been alluded to in the evidence, and which, he said, were nothing better than gambling hells of the worst description.—Mr. Charles Sugden is a very unfortunate and most forgiving man. Last week the fellow who tried to get money of him by threatening to publish an article in the newspaper, was brought up for trial at the Central Criminal Court, and Mr. Sugden attended, only, however, to withdraw the charge. At the very time that he was engaged in this act of mercy towards one rogue, another was ransacking his lodgings at Brighton, from which he carried off 55*l.* in bank notes and 50*l.* worth of jewellery. The thief was caught, and Mr. Sugden, on declining to prosecute, was politely informed that he had no option, and was accordingly bound over to give evidence at the Sessions.—Last week a County Court action was brought against the Secretary of the Church Missionary Society by an ex-African Missionary, who had been compelled by failing health to return to this country. A nonsuit was entered on the ground that the Secretary, being a servant of the Society, was not responsible.—A man named Grant has been sentenced to three month's imprisonment for shooting at some boys who were bathing in the river opposite his employer's grounds at Twickenham.—Three keepers of the Gloucester Lunatic Asylum were last week tried for the manslaughter of one of the inmates, a man seventy years old, who seems to have had an epileptic fit, and to have died of injuries he received during a struggle with the keepers, his breast bone and several of his ribs being broken. These injuries were never reported by the keepers, and another patient stated that they had used most brutal and unnecessary violence to the deceased. Mr. Justice Manisty, however, pointed out that such evidence coming from a lunatic was "somewhat suspicious," and the result was a verdict of acquittal. —The other day the Recorder of Dublin committed a juryman for appearing in court "dressed in a disreputable manner." The offender's attire is not described in the report, but the statement that he is a "dog-fancier" conjures up visions of a velveteen coat, with ample pockets, cord breeches, thick boots, a flaming red neckkerchief, and a slouching cap, or, perhaps, a white hat, with a black band.—The Tichborne claimant has written from Portland to Mr. Guildford Onslow, stating that he is about to petition the Home Secretary to make his two sentences concurrent, or otherwise, to order him to be tried for forgery. "If I am Arthur Orton I have committed forgery on each and every petition, for I have signed my own name to them. I shall do all I can to get a fresh trial on my liberty."—Mr. Albert Simpson, J.P., of Garstang, Lancashire, has been doing a little stone-breaking in the workhouse yard. He thought it singular that very many casuals preferred to be sent to prison rather than perform the tasks allotted to them, and so he determined to try the work for himself. He laboured incessantly for five hours, and when he had finished the heap he was thoroughly exhausted, and his hands were raw and bleeding. The experiment may possibly have the effect of lightening the work for those who do it not from choice but from necessity.—Lord Truro's assertion in the House of Lords on Monday that "there were several respectable pawnbrokers who kept upon their premises a smelting pot in order to remove all possibility of the property which might be brought to them being subsequently identified," is indignantly denied by Mr. Attenborough, and Mr. C. Jeans, the Chairman of the Pawnbrokers' Protection Committee. The former says that during the forty years which he has been intimate with the trade no licensed pawnbroker has had such an appliance. Mr. Jeans gives an equally direct denial, and hints that "the Committee will take further notice of the assertion."—On Sunday night a dispute arose between some Roman Catholics and Protestants travelling by rail from Newry. In the mêlée which ensued a Protestant named Gough was shot dead. When the train arrived at Portadown the police searched every passenger, and arrested two who carried revolvers.—An old woman in the workhouse at Tredegar has confessed that forty-five years ago she murdered her illegitimate child, a week old, by giving it a large dose of Godfrey's Cordial, and that after her marriage she disposed of two more in the same way. Her conscience, after slumbering for nearly half a century, seems to have suddenly awakened, for she states that she could no longer rest without confessing the crimes.—On Tuesday last week as Dr. Rowland Hill, the Bishop of Sodor and Man, and Mrs. Hill, were taking a carriage drive, one of a group of navvies standing at the roadside threw a large stone which struck the lady on the forehead. The Bishop jumped out of the carriage and chased the ruffian, who told him that he had a knife, and threatened to "let him have it." A gentleman named Harrison and two policemen arrived on the scene in time to aid in the arrest of the scoundrel, who has been committed for trial on the double charge of assault and threatening to stab. Mrs. Hill is not seriously injured, but is suffering from excitement and fright.—On Monday, a man whose name is unknown, died in St. Thomas's Hospital, from the effects of a pistol-shot wound, supposed to have been self-inflicted, as a revolver was lying close by the spot on which he was found by the police. He was conscious when taken to the hospital, and gave two names and addresses, neither of which were correct.—On Tuesday a man named John Oliver committed suicide in Hyde Park. He mounted the parapet of the bridge over the Serpentine, and fell or jumped into the water after shooting himself through the heart with a revolver. Death was instantaneous.—On the same day a young man and a young woman were seen walking together at Hampstead by a coachman, who a moment afterwards heard two shots fired, and running back found them both lying dead, shot through the head. It appears that they were sweethearts, and had known each other some time, but nothing is known of any quarrel or other cause for the act.—At Cardiff, a woman who is said to be in receipt of a liberal income from her husband, who is abroad, has been committed for trial for the manslaughter of her child by starvation. It was stated in evidence that her children were so neglected that they often fought with the fowls in the street for the garbage which was cast to them.—Another woman is also committed for trial for neglecting her infant, which, though six months' old, weighs only six pounds. Such cases almost make one doubt the theory of instinctive maternal affection.—On Wednesday a man charged with committing some petty thefts from shops, claimed the sympathy of the magistrate on the curious ground that thirty-seven years ago he was a railway carriage inspector, and had saved the life of the "greatest man in England, the Earl of Beaconsfield," by discovering some defect in the train in which he was about to travel. The case was remanded.

HOWTH CASTLE, DUBLIN BAY

HISTORY

DIM AS THE PAST HISTORY OF THIS CITY may at first appear, to the careful investigator the task of picturing her annals becomes easy and delightful from the discovery on every hand of testimonies teeming with dramatic incident, collected and preserved under every vicissitude by loving and patriotic hands. When the explorer in the present beautiful city finds records of her earliest foundation in Celtic, Dane, and Norman, as well as ancient churches, guarded with wondrous care, he can scarcely realise that Dublin was pillaged by Danes, sacked by native princes, and seized over and over again by English armies, that she was, in fact, for seven centuries the victim of almost incessant war.

In legend and in song we have ample indication that the oldest capital of Ireland was not Dublin, but Tara, a city built on a hill in the County Meath, twenty-five miles more inland than Dublin. The seaboard of Dublin and Meath were in the time of Ptolemy, who lived A.D. 140, occupied by a tribe called Eblani, and their headquarters were at Eblana, a district which was the site on which the present city of Dublin now stands. The date of A.D. 448 is that given as the year in which St. Patrick, coming from Brittany, landed at Innispatrick, and made his way to Dublin, where, it is said, he made many converts to the Christian faith. His baptisms were celebrated at a well on the south side of the city, hence called St. Patrick's Well, and near which the cathedral was afterwards built. He does not seem to have passed much of his life here, but proceeded to Armagh, and founded a Bishopric, which later on became the primacy of Ireland. In 838 the Ostmen, or Danes, arrived in the Liffey with a fleet of sixty ships. Once landed, the Danes made a settlement on the north shore of the Liffey, and having shown an intention to remain simply as colonists or peaceable subjects of the Irish princes, were permitted to erect houses of hurdles and clay, and to build walls round about them. The country at the north side of the city was designated by the native Irish as Fingall, or the land of the white strangers, and at the present day Finglas forms a part of Dublin. A short time afterwards another colony of Danes settled on the south side of the city, and their quarter was known as Dubhgall, or country of the black strangers. The whole district at the mouth of the Liffey was known to the ancient Irish as Bally-Ath-Cliath-Duibhlinne, "the town of the ford of hurdles on the Blackwater." The Danish settlers called their joint territory by the name Divelin, and hence we get the title of Dublin—the town which in a few years assumed, and has ever since retained, the dignity of a capital. For three centuries afterwards the Danes held possession of their territories, and no formidable effort was made to expel them permanently. In 853 Aulaffe Sitric, having arrived with a very formidable fleet in the Liffey, was elected King of Dublin; the neighbouring Irish princes made a truce with him, and for the first time the city was placed in a thorough state of defence, and fortified at every point.

THE CUSTOM HOUSE

From this period to 1014 battles were of repeated occurrence; no Irish King succeeded in dislodging the strangers. The Danes had now became most numerous, and explorations of remote parts of Ireland, and even incursions into Wales, were undertaken by them. The ever-memorable battle of Clontarf took place in this year 1014, and Aulaffe Sitric, King of the Danes, was, after a long and obstinate engagement, utterly routed by Bryan Boru.

The Danes fled to Dublin and Howth, where they confined themselves for many years, purchasing quietude by the payment of vast sums in tribute to Dermot, the King of Leinster. It was during this term of repose that they erected in Dublin the churches which to this day testify to the love of religion and art that prevailed amongst them.

Ireland was now divided into five kingdoms, Leinster, Connaught, Ulster, Munster, and Meath, and in the middle of the 12th century the two most formidable of the five sovereigns were Dermot Macmurrough, King of Leinster, and Roderick O'Connor, King of Connaught. It was a subject of contention which of these sovereigns had the strongest claim to be recognised as the supreme dictator of Ireland, and constant wars were waged with a view of having supremacy in this respect decided. In the midst of these conflicts King Dermot immersed himself in a wellnigh unsurmountable trouble by running away with the wife of O'Rorke, Prince of Breffni, and daughter of the King of Meath. The disconsolate O'Rorke hastened to the home of Roderick O'Connor, Dermot's greatest rival, and having enlisted his sympathies, an army from Connaught marched upon Leinster to annihilate the amorous king. Dermot, finding himself powerless to resist, sailed to Bristol, thence to France, and prostrated himself before Henry II., who was engaged in a war in that country. He related his story to Henry, and besought him to assist him in driving back the King of Connaught, "Which, if it should please him in his goodness to do, he, Dermot, would acknowledge King Henry to be Lord, and serve him faithfully all his life as his vassal." The ambition of Henry to add Ireland to his dominions became evident early in his reign, when he appealed to Breakspear (Adrian IV.), the only Englishman who ever occupied the Papal throne, to put in motion the edict of Constantine, which permitted him to assume a right in the disposal of islands, and throw over them the protecting mantle of the Catholic Church. The Pope issued a Bull in 1156, yielding to Henry's solicitations, and, when Dermot appeared in France, the English sovereign did his best to carry his own desires into execution. He could not, however, then spare an expeditionary army from the Royal forces, so contented himself with issuing Letters Patent, granting all his subjects in Britain permission to raise a knightly army, and to undertake a war in Ireland under the cover of the Flag of England.

How few of those who love or sing the Irish melodies know that one of them, "The valley lay smiling before me," is the song of the bereaved husband, O'Rorke, and that in the stanzas is told the story which caused Ireland, through a woman's unfaithfulness, to lose her independence.

> There was a time, falsest of women!
> When Breffni's good sword would have sought
> That man, through a million of foemen,
> Who dared but to wrong thee in thought!
> While now—O degenerate daughter
> Of Erin, how fallen is thy fame!
> And through ages of bondage and slaughter,
> Our country shall bleed for thy shame.

Dermot grew weary waiting for the aid of King Henry, and made touching appeals to the Barons of Wales, who themselves were much exasperated by incursions of the Danes from Dublin. The first to come forward was a penniless soldier of fortune, son of the Earl of Pembroke, Richard, surnamed Strongbow. But dauntless and adventurous as was this knight, he hesitated for many months to trust his fortune to the Irish nation. He came at last, in response to this poetical letter from Dermot:—

> We have beheld the storks and the swallows. The birds of summer came, and with the warning of the tempest they returned, but neither gentle gale nor furious blast has blest us with thy long-wished-for presence.

THE ENGLISH IN IRELAND

With the assistance of Robert FitzStephen and Maurice FitzGerald, the scions of two Welsh families of distinction, with other knights of good account, Strongbow embarked with a small army in three ships, the conditions being that if Dermot regained his kingdom Strongbow should be the heir of his dominions and receive in marriage Eva, the daughter of the King. All the other leaders of the expedition were promised portions of the conquered territories. They landed at Baun (County Waterford), and within two years the allied forces of Dermot and Strongbow completed the conquest of the whole of the East of Ireland, and captured the city of Dublin. Maclise has in a magnificent picture depicted the marriage of Strongbow, who had then become Earl of Pembroke, with Eva. The ceremony was conducted outside the walls of the city of Waterford with all the splendour of those mediæval times. After Strongbow's battles, in one of which he defeated 90,000 men from Connaught, none in Ireland dared to oppose themselves to the English.

Jealous of the successes of his knights, Henry II. hastened to inform them that the time was now come when he should himself assume the sovereignty conferred upon him by Adrian IV. Accordingly he set sail in 1172 from Milford Haven with 4,000 men, and landed at Waterford. No hostile force opposed him, and during the whole of his journey to Dublin he was received by chieftains desirous of doing homage. After entering the capital he caused an immense wickerwork pavilion to be erected, and beneath the regal canopy here all the great Irish nobles of the time took the oath of allegiance.

His Majesty passed the Christmas in Dublin, but his stay was not protracted, he having had to hasten away to appease by Royal penance the indignation excited in Rome, as well as in England, by Becket's murder. The leaders of the army who came with the King from Milford Haven were granted manors and other tracts of land confiscated from the people, and as if this was not in itself sufficient to make His Majesty detested in the eyes of his new subjects, he gave the inhabitants of Bristol permission to inundate and make their own of Dublin. His most ungracious act of all, however, was to form the "English Pale."

The result of this barbarous exclusiveness was that Dublin within the Pale was filled with the remnants of Danes and Irish, as well as with the recently imported colonists, all of whom were guided and governed by the British law. On the other side of these chilling barriers, living as they had lived before, with this alteration, that they were now all subjects, were warriors and princes, and bards and peasants, who bowed to the Royal power, but who refused to sanction the proud invader's right to scorn their passions or obliterate their laws and learning, their piety and national character.

The more reason the Irish had to be sick and sorry at the hands of their King, the more industrious and vehement grew the musicians and the bards, and the only grateful memorials of this wretched time are the melodies inspired by the wrongs this musically gifted and romantic people endured. The state of the country for centuries after this period could not have been more unpropitious; complete lawlessness prevailed, and the proceedings within the English Pale afford no relief to the gloomy picture of barbarity without it. No wonder that Burke should exclaim that a spirit of hostility to the Irish began before the distinctions of Protestant and Catholic were known to the world.

VICEREGAL GOVERNMENT

Hugh De Lacy, Lord of Meath, was the King's representative the year after the invasion. The galleries of the Castle Chapel are ornamented with oak panels, each one of which is engraved with the arms of the Lord Deputies or Lord Lieutenants who have resided in Dublin; the first of all the panels bears the date 1173, and contains the device of De Lacy; it is a simple cross, an exceedingly primitive piece of heraldry when compared with the escutcheons of modern governors. De Lacy was succeeded by John, son of King Henry, who, at a Parliament held at Oxford in 1177, was declared Lord of Ireland. He arrived in Dublin with a train of young noblemen, all of whom were so disgusted at finding no regal residence prepared for them that John, when elevated to the English throne, was easily induced to make a grant for the erection of a castle.

Henry VIII., when Duke of York, was possessed of the nominal title of Lord Lieutenant, but the duties of the office were entrusted by him to Sir Edward Poynings, the celebrated author of Poynings' Law, which restricted legislation in the Irish Parliament to measures that had first been approved of in England. Henry VIII., more than any of his predecessors, startled the country by the activity and watchfulness of his government. His religious innovations were especially remarkable, and among many other monasteries dissolved was that of All Hallows', which was founded by Dermot, King of Leinster, on what is now the site of Trinity College.

Parliaments were held in Dublin at St. Mary's Abbey, where the Four Courts now stand, in the life of this monarch, and the King, by the statutes he sanctioned, and notably by the Act declaring the estates of all absentees forfeited, showed how much he desired to behold in Ireland "a magnificent nobility, a resident gentry, a commonalty well-fed, and industry flourishing." In his reign, however, the Irish did not cease from insurrection, the boldest instance of which led to the execution of Lord Thomas Fitzgerald, "Silken Thomas" as he was styled, from the golden fringes used on the horses of himself and his followers. In return for the valour of the citizens in putting down what was really a revolt of the Lord Deputy himself against established authority, Henry gave them the lands of All Hallows; and Queen Elizabeth, when she ascended the throne, solidified and enhanced the value of this gift of her father by founding on the same ground, amidst the din of arms and the tumult of civil war, the University of Dublin.

The soldiers of James I. dealt more vigorously than the unfortunate Earl of Essex had done with the turbulent Earls of Tyrone and Tyrconnell, and a plot to seize Dublin having been discovered by some secret papers that found their way into the Castle, their vast estates in Ulster were confiscated, and a number of City Companies (which exist to this day) were formed in London for planting new colonies in that fertile country.

James had a passion for improving Ireland, but there was a large mixture of evil in his plans. One of the longest and now busiest streets of Dublin, "James's Street," was founded during his administration. In 1613 a Parliament was held in Dublin, the first after a lapse of twenty-seven years, and there was a protracted struggle between the Protestants and Catholics as to the election of Speaker. A Protestant having been elected, the Catholic party seceded from the Commons, and the bitterness engendered by this quarrel being encouraged by the successful attempts of the Scottish nation to obtain the freedom of their religion led to the general and terrible Revolution of 1641 in Ireland.

THE REBELLION OF 1641

As years went by the Rebellion underwent a strange metamorphosis, for on the invasion of Cromwell the armies of Owen Roe O'Neill and Sir Phelim O'Neill, the commanders against the Royalists, made peace with them and joined them, and together, but in vain, they sought to drive the Parliamentarians from the land. In the midst of the Rebellion Charles I. was executed, and the conflicts, which had lasted eleven years, were brought to a close in 1652 by the triumph of the Protector.

After the restoration of Charles II., the Duke of Ormond was Lord-Lieutenant, and then may be said to have sprung into existence those scenes of gaiety and splendour which have been the theme of many a story of the Irish Court.

It was, however, when James II. was on the throne that the magnificence of the Castle festivities burst into their rarest effulgence, for then the Queen of Beauty, the Duchess of Tyrconnel, née Miss Jennings, reigned as Lady Lieutenant, and surrounded herself with handmaidens, among whom were her own daughters, whose loveliness and rank attracted devotion and homage from all classes of society in Ireland.

The King himself came to Dublin from Kinsale, in 1688, with his vast army of French and English soldiers. He came, however, as a fugitive, and, although he had time to hold a Parliament, he had speedily to set off for the Northern cities, where the people, with all possible zeal, were declaring for the Prince of Orange. William landed at Carrickfergus, on June 14th, 1690, with an army of 36,000 men, chiefly Dutch troops. Nearly all the North sided with him, and in less than three weeks he challenged the King face to face on the banks of the Boyne. After the battle, which all the world knows put an end to the Stuart dynasty, James made the best of his way to Dublin Castle, where he slept one night before sailing for Brest. A few days afterwards William himself came to Dublin, and Hume says that he treated the inhabitants with considerable harshness. Nevertheless, neither the "Ungracious and ungrateful little Dutchman" nor his army were molested on their way to St. Patrick's Cathedral, where a splendid service in thanksgiving for the victory at the Boyne was celebrated, and in 1701 the citizens had so far forgotten any little severity he may have displayed towards them as to raise an equestrian statue in his honour on College Green.

After the misery and depression of the Rebellion and the war between James and William came the Penal Statutes, the object of which was to bar the estates which repeated confiscations had given the Anglo-Protestant colonists of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries from ever descending to Catholic hands. The Particular Act to enforce this was passed by the Irish Parliament in 1703. But it has been shown in many a speech of oratorical and truthful splendour that the Parliament from 1688 to 1782 was a mere cypher named by Government, without any reference to national feeling.

From the Restoration the Parliament sat in Chichester House, which stood on what was afterwards the site of the Houses of Parliament, and it was within this building the struggle for the Legislative Independence of Ireland began.

INDEPENDENT IRELAND

The first meeting in the new Houses of Parliament, College Green, was held on the 5th October, 1731, and the words of request and warning commenced at Chichester House now developed into the most vehement attacks upon the petty tyrannies of the Government and the malaria which enveloped the Public Departments. In the midst of this suspense and suffering of the country the Irish volunteers began to be formed, and the feeble and infatuated Ministry of England looked with helpless consternation at the giant spectre they had contributed to raise. "They broke up," says a contemporaneous writer, "in their own weakness and their successors handsomely conceded what it was no longer practicable to withhold, and recognised Ireland as a Free Nation, with a Legislature Independent and Supreme." The declaration of surrender to the Irish Parliament was made on the 16th of April, 1782, before an excited House, filled in every part with members, volunteer officers, ladies of rank and beauty, and the leading citizens.

The Parliaments which followed were distinguished by the eloquence of Flood, Grattan, Perys, Malone, Burgh, Hutchinson, Fitzgibbon, afterwards Lord Clare, and the embryo Duke of Wellington, but somehow or other Ireland, acting thus alone, was not even yet at peace or prosperous; and even Grattan, after a trial of some years, was forced to exclaim that the Independence was an attempt to unite the hoary decrepitude of the old jobbing Ministry and the Borough Parliament with the dignity, the expectations, the exigencies, and the feelings of what was emphatically called Young Ireland.

The hearts of this Young Ireland party were fired by the French Revolution; and in 1798 their deeply-planned scheme of establishing a Republic in Ireland was set in motion by Lord Edward Fitzgerald, Theobald Wolfe Tone, Bartholomew, Seeling, M'Cormick, and many others. The Rebellion, which was widespread through the Province of Leinster, lasted a year. It was especially vigorous in Kildare; for, owing to the hostility of the Fitzgeralds to the Government, and the open avowals of the unfortunate Lord Edward, the inhabitants vainly believed that their natural chief, the Duke of Leinster, would be with them, and that the cause of the Rebellion was his cause. His Grace commanded the Dublin Contingent of Volunteers at the time, and it is to be remembered to their honour that it was these loyal Volunteers themselves who broke the back of the Rebellion and saved the country. It was crushed by an army of nearly a hundred thousand men at a cost of sixty thousand lives. The death of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, from wounds received in the struggle, which accompanied his arrest in Thomas Street, has been so often described in song and story that it need not now be repeated.

THE UNION WITH GREAT BRITAIN

Three years after the union with Great Britain, Dublin was again plunged into a condition of alarm and panic by the Insurrection of Robert Emmett, the son of an eminent physician, and himself a student of Trinity College, and a barrister. It was attended with melancholy, and, to some extent, serious consequences; for on the day that Emmett's desperate followers rose to seize the Castle, the carriage of the Chief Justice Lord Kilwarden passed along the street in which they were collected, and, against all the entreaties of the leader, his Lordship and his son were murdered. "He died," writes Mr. Phillips, "like a judicial hero, covered with pike wounds, and fainting from loss of blood; his last words were, 'Let no man perish in consequence of my death, but by the regular operation of the law.'"

Since those days there have been other emeutes directed against the Government, the most notable of which was the Fenian outburst of the 5th of March, 1867, in or near the capital; but none have spread to the serious limits of the Fitzgerald and Emmett conspiracies.

The city, which before the Anglo-Norman invasion was confined to the neighbourhood of the Castle Hill, and was little more than a mile in circumference, had at the time of the Union in 1800 so much increased in size that the diameter from east to west, or north to south, was three miles, and the circumference nine. In Elizabeth's time houses began to be built of wood, and bridges were thrown across the Liffey; but it was in the interval between the Revolution and the Union that the size, wealth, and splendour of Dublin received so extraordinary an impetus, and this is attributed, among other reasons, to the cessation of war, liberal Parliamentary grants to public and other utilitarian buildings, the removal of impediments to trade, and the extension of literature and science, encouraged by the sudden appearance of men of genius, patriotism, and learning.

On the 1st of January, 1801, the Imperial ensign was for the first time displayed from the Bedford Tower of the Castle, signifying the ratification of the Union; and although from that period the mansions of the nobility (there being no longer a necessity for the attendance of Peers in a Dublin Parliament) began to be sold and put to commercial rather than hospitable uses, the now compulsory and continued residence of a Viceregal Court not only prevented industry from flagging, but gave encouragement and strength to the development of manufactures and arts. The disappearance of the disabilities which had for so many centuries to be borne by the Catholic population of Ireland, and the admission of their just claims to equality in every rank of society and almost every position of authority in the land, the commercial enterprise which followed the establishment of lines of steamboats and railways, and the gradual recognition in her own country, as well as abroad, of Dublin as a capital, where education, refinement, and trade became annually more manifest, has contributed to so vast an augmentation in the number of her citizens, streets, and beautiful buildings, as to entitle Dublin now to rank as the second city of the Empire.

With all her attractiveness, Dublin has not yet tempted the reigning family to have a Royal residence in her midst; and, indeed, even in respect to the visits of sovereigns, she is far behind Scotland, and several of the less important towns of England. And it is not for want of a joyous welcome the Royal Family remain away from this romantic and beautiful country. She was never visited by George I., George II., or George III.; but when George IV.—the first King of England who ever trod the Irish soil without an army—came to her shores, the enthusiasm of the people knew no bounds. They called a town and many streets in Ireland by his name, and placed a monument where he stood to say adieu to this much-neglected country. The same honours followed the visits—few and far between—of Queen Victoria; and when the Princess of Wales drove through Dublin, in 1868, there was a greeting in store for her more spontaneous, loving, and loyal, than in any other city hailed her advent. It was with no half-hearted exuberance and gratitude that doves were gently lowered into her carriage by excited multitudes gathered on the housetops, or that the people hung up, across the broadest thoroughfare she passed along, a silken banner, with these words, in letters of gold, upon it—

> Celt and Norman and Saxon are we;
> But all of us Danes in our welcome of thee.

THE CASTLE OF HOWTH

THIS beautiful pile is a combination of modern architecture and ivy-clad ruins of the old Baronial Hall, erected by the founder of the family, that Sir Amoricus Tristram who "among a thousand knights might be chosen for beauty and heroic courage, for humility, and courtesy to his inferiors, yielding to none but in the way of gentleness."

This chivalrous soldier effected a landing at Howth in 1177, and after a battle at the Bridge of Ivora, vanquished the no less gallant native warriors who opposed him. In recognition of his valour and triumph Henry II. granted him the lands of Howth by tenure, and made him an Irish Baron.

The walls of the Castle of the Tristrams alone are standing, and the policy of the family in maintaining the walls of the ancient Palace alongside of the present residence has resulted in effects of startling and romantic picturesqueness. Antiquaries hold these crumbling sculptured walls in high veneration; but it is not their age alone that makes Howth Castle so interesting, so much as the traditions, true or false, of this lonely Palace which its position on the verge of the Irish Sea is calculated to foster. Lastly, history has made it known that the St. Lawrences are one of the very few families in all Ireland who have held their estates and homes uninterruptedly since the Reformation. After the Rebellion of 1641, the estates of many noble families, including those of the Flemings, Plunketts, Sweetmans, Hacketts, Fagans, and Archers were forfeited; but the St. Lawrences, the Lutterells, the Talbots, and Barnwalls were not so dishonoured.

The family name was changed from Tristram to St. Lawrence, in consequence of an oath taken by a member of the family when conducting a battle against certain invaders of Ireland on St. Lawrence's Day, that if success fell to his arms he would assume the title of the Saint. The sword used by this soldier on this momentous day now hangs in the new Castle, and, like all ancient Irish mementoes of the kind, is an object much admired for the richness of its workmanship. The fifteenth Baron of Howth was Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and married "Joan," a daughter of the Duke of Somerset—an alliance which enables the family to claim descent from Edward III. The sixteenth Baron never swerved from his loyalty to Henry VII., when Ireland was crazed about the pretentious Lambert Simnel, and for his adherence was confirmed by Charter of the King in the lands and title of Howth for ever. On the 13th September, 1767, George III. elevated the twenty-seventh Baron of Howth to the dignity of Earl of Howth and Viscount St. Lawrence, in consideration of the long and faithful services of his ancestors.

THE BAY OF DUBLIN

CRESWICK, the painter, remarked of Dublin Bay that, in an autumnal sunrise, it presented the finest prospect of nature he had ever seen. Lady Dufferin has written,—

> Oh, Bay of Dublin! my heart you're troublin',
> Your beauty haunts me like a fever dream:
> Like frozen fountains that the sun sets bubbling,
> My heart's blood warms when I hear your name.

And Denis Florence M'Carthy admits that, having explored the whole of Europe, the foreign seas had no more beautiful inlet, no such

> Matchless wonder of a Bay to show him.

If you should happen to make the sixty miles' journey from Holyhead in summer—in the morning, too, just

> As the daylight splendid > Comes breaking o'er the sea—

I should like to hear your ejaculation as the mail boat, steering in from the open waters, passed the islets of "Lambay" and "Ireland's Eye," and then rounded the precipices and brown slopes of the Hill of Howth. Here on the right you would see a long silver strand stretching back for miles until, like one of Turner's pictures, the glittering ray became lost in the dark haze of the city. A little to the left, apparently standing out alone in the sea, is a lighthouse. It is not alone, however, for as you draw near to it you will find there is a breakwater of considerable length behind it, also running back to the city. Between the strand and this lighthouse flows the Channel, up which go the steamers bound for Dublin. If, however, you are on the mail-boat, your anchorage will not be in the River Liffey, but far away on the left, in the Royal Harbour of Kingstown. This, although the Bay is five miles wide, you have also seen looming in the distance, as your four-funnelled leviathan steamed past Howth and the Kish light-ship. But it is not till your wonder at the nearer enchantments has exhausted itself that your eyes become fixed on the many miles of handsome marine villages, screened at the back by long ranges of undulating mountains which, at the Kingstown side of the Bay, sweep upwards from the limit of the waves. The sailors tell you which hill is Kippure, and which Ballinascorny, and which the far-famed "Sugar Loaf," the lovely peak that overlooks St. Kevin's bed in the Lake of Glendalough and the sweet Vale of Avoca.

TRADE AND POPULATION

WHEN making his survey of the handsome Docks which line the River Liffey, Mr. Gladstone was surprised beyond measure by the activity he witnessed, and declared Dublin the busiest capital in Her Majesty's dominions after London.

Bright as is the prospect of trade at the present time, it may be expected within a few years to undergo great augmentation, for numerous docks and warehouses and an immense hotel are now in process of construction, at a cost of 100,000*l.*, at Holyhead, for the sole purpose of developing the commercial relations between England and Ireland. Intercourse is maintained by the shipping of Dublin with Norway, America, and Russia; but the cross Channel trade is the most important of the port industries, Great Britain furnishing a most extensive market for all sorts of Irish produce, especially cattle. The Customs Duties collected at the Port of Dublin amount to over 900,000*l.* a year.

Though a small city, Dublin is the seat of many thriving manufactures. In ancient days the staple industry was that in woollen goods, including the frezes worn so generally by the people; and in 1792 so many as five thousand persons were engaged in working woollen looms in the "Liberties." This trade has, however, decayed, and the commercial reputation of Dublin is now more displayed in the poplin, linen, and paper manufactures. The linen manufacture was originated by the unfortunate Lord Strafford when Viceroy of Ireland, who gave 30,000*l.* of his private property to establish it. He encouraged the importation of flax seed from Holland, erected looms, and placed skilled foreigners over them. A public grant of money was given by Queen Anne to build a Linen Hall, the capacious building in which sales, though greatly diminished, are still continued; the export value from Dublin of these linen yarns and manufactures alone exceeds 10,000,000*l.* annually.

The city is also celebrated for its porter breweries and whiskey distilleries. Of the latter Ireland possesses thirty as against nine in England, and most of these are in Dublin. Scotland is in reality the "whiskey country," having now in existence no less than one hundred and thirty distilleries. There is, however, a considerable quantity of "mountain dew," or "poteen," with its tempting aroma of turf flavour, still produced among the wilder districts of Ireland; for by a return issued in a recent year I find that one hundred and seventy-six persons were tried for selling untaxed spirits, as against one case in Scotland and eight in England.

The inland trade from Dublin is carried on chiefly by several railways, three of which have vast dépôts and termini at the North Wall. The revenue produced by railways in Ireland is largely augmented by there being no passenger duty. There are two canals—the "Grand" and the "Royal"—which, starting from north and south of the Liffey, encircle the city, and proceed thence to Mullingar and the Shannon, and by means of these an extensive trade in bricks, timber, turf, and coal is maintained.

The population of Dublin at the taking of the census in 1871 was set down at 267,717; but an estimate made by the Registrar-General, in 1876, gave it an increase of 150,000 more.

The registered emigrants from the city which, some five years ago amounted in one year to 3,000 odd, were in 1876 reduced to 700.

THE CUSTOM HOUSE

As the steamer takes you up the River Liffey past the spacious Quays, the most remarkable object which meets your eyes is the Custom House. It is a colossal and beautiful structure, surpassing in magnificence the Custom House of London, having four fronts built of Irish granite and Portland stone, with handsome balustrades running along the summits. In the centre is a lofty dome, on the cone of which is a figure of Hope.

The old Custom House of Dublin was situated in a more inland position, Essex Street. But, in 1794, in consequence of the rapid increase in the prosperity of the city, the Irish Parliament voted half a million of money to build the present edifice, and Mr. Gandon, who designed the Post Office, and other of the more important public buildings, was appointed architect. Only the Dublin business of the Customs and Excise is now transacted here, the Customs for the rest of Ireland being now dealt with by the General Board in London. Various other departments of the public service, however, such as the Stamp, Fisheries, and Woods and Forests Offices, now carry on duties here.

THE PHŒNIX PARK

ALTHOUGH it does not possess the tall and ancient trees which give so much beauty to Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, the Phœnix Park is considered by many to be the fairest and grandest of all enclosures of the kind in the British islands. It lies to the west of Dublin, and covers the enormous space of 1,753 acres; of these 160 are occupied with the demesne surrounding the Viceregal Lodge. Ethnologists tell us that the name "Phœnix" is derived from the Irish word "Finniske"—"a spring of clear water." This term, which may be intended as a figurative description of this salubrious rendezvous, in process of time has been corrupted into Phœnix, and this name has been the more lastingly ensured to the Park by Lord Chesterfield, who, when Lord-Lieutenant, erected therein a Corinthian pillar of Portland stone, on the abacus of which there is a neatly chiselled Phœnix, represented as if fluttering forth from the flames surrounding it. No one can penetrate so far into the Park without perceiving the extraordinary beauties with which the scene is embellished. No park in the immediate vicinity of London can boast of possessing a drove of deer; yet here, on all sides, short-horned antelopes, with skins of black and dun colour, are browsing on emerald grass, or gracefully skipping at lightning speed amidst the trees. Not so far distant as to appear even separated from the Park, sweeping upwards, till they reach almost to the blue clouds are the Dublin mountains. From no point of the metropolis but this is the long range of the Dublin mountains so imposing, and in all weathers their grandeur is apparent. When good Queen Bess directed that a park should be made here, a design not completed till Charles II. was on the throne, the deer and the mountains were the staple attractions; but the work of later generations has added the features for which it is now more famous. The Viceregal Lodge, originally the mansion of the Park Ranger, Mr. Clements, has, since the Union, been the summer palace of the Viceroy. It is a long, white, two-storied building, and though insignificant in stature, contains apartments sufficiently numerous and capacious for the assemblage of a Court. Not many hundred yards from the Viceregal residence is that of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, which is also surrounded by a demesne. In the Phœnix Park also are residences and buildings for the use of the Ranger, the Royal Hibernian Military School, the Head-quarters of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and the Ordnance and Trigometrical Survey Department of Ireland.

The Wellington Memorial, which commemorates the victories of the most illustrious soldier Ireland has produced, is an obelisk of granite, so lofty as to be visible from every part of the city. The pet scheme of Lord Carlisle, to have a people's garden within the Park, has been carried out within the last fifteen years, and the citizens of Dublin have shown their gratitude by placing a statue of his Excellency in its midst. The Zoological Society of Ireland have also their "gardens" here, and the enclosure owned by them contains an expansive lake, which is an advantage that the kindred societies of London and Paris cannot boast. The many "corkscrew" roads flanked by well-stocked plantations of pine, and sycamore, and holly, and more than one natural lake, help to render a drive through the less public byeways of the Park always a pleasant one.

There is one portion of the Park which has been cleared of trees for the purpose of holding reviews of the Dublin garrison. There is another plot, also bare of foliage, not far distant from the review ground. It is the first object of interest pointed out to you by your danger-loving carman, famous in history as the sward whereon all the more notorious of the Irish duels have been fought, and called by the name of the "Fifteen Acres."

SACKVILLE STREET

CARLISLE BRIDGE is, like London Bridge, the first from the sea over the great river of the city, but there is no other likeness, and the crossing of Carlisle Bridge does not entail upon you a spectacle of warehouses, neither are your ears deafened with the roar of waggons and the screaming of engine whistles. On the contrary, on either side of the bridge are wide and very handsome streets, filled with lofty houses, and lined with splendid shops. Of the two thoroughfares direct from the bridge, Sackville Street, on the north side of the Liffey, is the grandest. There is, indeed, no wider, or in point of vista, no more beautiful street in Europe. It has sometimes been compared with the Broadway of New York, but there is much more airiness and lightness and grace about Sackville Street than in the bustling highly-coloured boulevard of America. And these effects are not produced by an absence of that animation which one expects to find in the centre of a capital, for there is abundance of it here, but the street is so expansive, like the great and busy Square at Alexandria more than anything else, and the houses and public buildings dwarf all street objects into such diminutiveness, that light Irish cars may be dashing past you, tramcars may be turning the corners of the streets on their way to the terminus at the base of Nelson's Pillar, and coal drays in lines may be swiftly moving towards the ships moored to the quays, and yet neither all these, nor the hundreds of people on the broad pavements convey to you ideas of crowding or of that overwhelming ponderous business activity you get in either London or Liverpool. It is the grace of the place that is its principal charm. In no other street in the world will you at certain hours of the day see so many young and beautiful women promenading up and down between the trees (which afford some shelter as well as much ornamentation to the pathways), and the pleasant shops, and if these do not attract your gaze you have public buildings with Ionic columns to glance at, and hotels—quite mansions o' hotels—and not those with flaming posters, glaring forth from chimney stacks and side walls, and, lastly, you have right in the centre of this street the Nelson Column with the gallant admiral standing bareheaded at the top and leaning against a capstan, and not, as on the London monument, against a tiny coil of rope—as if any one could gain support from that! If you want to take in all the picturesqueness at once you must stand on Carlisle Bridge and look down the roadway till your eyes meet the Rotundo and the church spires that seem to pierce the sky above the houses at the Denmark Hill end of Sackville Street. You will at once admit that it is no wonder this magnificent avenue is the favourite street of the citizens of Dublin, for you can see nothing before you but taste and beauty and prosperity.

THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT

THE colossal structure, which once formed the Irish Houses of Parliament, naturally awakens in the breasts of Irishmen a deeper interest than any other building in Dublin. For it was within these walls that rapt audiences of the peers, noble ladies, and intelligent citizens for more than half a century listened to the orations of Fitzgibbon, Hely-Hutchinson, Grattan, Flood, Egan, Curran, and many other most distinguished orators and lawyers. And it was here, in 1782, that the independence of the Irish nation was declared amidst what has been described as the most thrilling scene in the country's annals. In former times the ground upon which this Legislative Palace was raised had been occupied by a nunnery, and when this was demolished a mansion was built on the site for Sir Arthur Chichester, Lord Deputy of Ireland, and ancestor of the Marquis of Donegal. From then until early in the eighteenth century "Chichester House" was used by the Parliament and the Council for their sittings, and it was within these walls that the plot of the Rebellion of 1641 was betrayed by a drunken servant of one of the Peers. A move was afterwards made by the Parliament to the Blue Coat Hospital; and there it sat periodically while the present edifice was in course of erection.

To more than one artistic mind has been attributed the design of this fabric, but inasmuch as the name of Sir Edward Lovet Pearce is found on all of the original plans, it may be inferred the construction was chiefly due to him. Be this as it may, there is ample testimony that the formation of the building was directed by the taste of the Irish members, and the cost ([illegible]l.) met by their most liberal support. The form of the edifice is semi-circular. It occupies nearly an acre and a half of ground. The chief entrance was beneath the grand portico in College Green, and this, the principal front, consists of a lofty colonnade of the Ionic Order extending round three sides of a quadrangular recess.

The Royal Arms are boldly cut in the tympanum above the entrances, and the apex surmounting this is embellished with the statues of "Hibernia," "Fidelity," and "Commerce." On the side of the building facing College Street is another portico of great beauty, which gave a separate entrance to the House of Lords.

The architecture here is quite of another character, and becomes Corinthian. This variety of style is said to be in accordance with the wish of the Peers, who considered that the mixture of the two styles, Ionic and Corinthian, would produce a richer and altogether more exquisite effect.

This frontage is composed of six magnificent Corinthian columns, the apex on which is also adorned with statues. These represent "Fortitude," "Justice," and "Liberty." A handsome circular wall, with various alcoves inserted in it, connects the two Corinthian and Ionic porticos. This, which, like the rest of the building, is of Portland stone, was added when the buildings became the property of the Bank of Ireland.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS

THE chamber used by the Peers is little altered since the Parliament sat, and is now the Board Room of the Bank. It is a majestic, though not by any means a capacious apartment; and the recess, which was occupied formerly by a canopy of crimson velvet, where the Lord Lieutenant "used to sit, surrounded with more splendour than His Majesty on the throne of England," is now filled with a full-length statue of George III., the monarch who granted independence to Irish legislation. On the mahogany walls are hung two famous pieces of tapestry, the work of Thomas Baillie, of Dublin, depicting the Defence of Derry and the Battle of the Boyne. Various articles of furniture from both of the Legislative Chambers have been distributed away from the places they once adorned. The chair of the Speaker of the House of Lords is now an ornament in the Royal Irish Academy, Dawson Street, and that of the House of Commons is possessed by the Royal Dublin Society in Kildare Street. The magnificent chandelier of the House of Commons now hangs from the ceiling of the Examination Hall in Trinity College; and the mace used in the Commons has been left as an heirloom by John Foster, the last Speaker of that House, to Lord Massareene, his grandson.

its great beauty of design, rebuilt, to meet the exigencies of the Bank, and the present cash office, though a noble hall, bears no resemblance to the magnificent Rotundo of the legislating days. In the years 1802-3 the old House of Commons was used as the principal Art Gallery of Dublin; and among other artists exhibiting here was John Comerford, the eminent miniature painter. It was in 1804 that the Bank of Ireland, then itself an institution of twenty years' standing, became the purchasers of the Parliament House for a sum of 40,000*l.* and the payment of an annual rent of 240*l.*

A wit of the day, hearing of the transformation that was about to take place, gave vent, in the following squib, to his opinion on the subject:—

If, as it is by some asserted,
This house be to a bank converted;
What most we want will then be there,
Instead of what we best can spare.

COLLEGE GREEN

THE Palladium of the Irish people, the "Place de la Concorde" of Dublin, now possesses not a single blade of grass to remind one of its old existence as a green. The adornment which is conferred upon it by the near presence of the Irish Parliament House and the College is in these days rendered still more attractive by a number of graceful statues. When the biography comes to be written the fame of the Praxiteles of modern times will be traced in the two famous places of the world where his most numerous achievements in statuary are concentrated, namely, the Maidan of Calcutta and College Green.

Burke and Goldsmith look down the grand avenue of Dame Street from the College, and facing them, in the centre of the Green, stands Grattan. A few yards further on in the direction of the Castle is the much-abused equestrian figure of King William, of "glorious, pious, and immortal" memory. This statue, erected to commemorate the Battle of the Boyne, has often been a source of contention between the Orange and Catholic parties, and on several occasions since its elevation in 1701 has been the object of contemptuous attack. On one occasion an attempt was made to file off the King's head, and on another a painter was employed to cover the horse with tar and whitewash the King, on which occasion, when his work was finished, the painter fastened his bucket to the head of the horse, producing a most grotesque effect when the citizens woke up next morning. In 1836 His Majesty was blown by gunpowder clean off his horse, and, the statue being of lead, much difficulty was experienced in soldering him together again. Happily of late years all manifestations either of undue adulation or disrespect have been abandoned, and recently some elegant lamps have been placed round the statue, and the monument picked out with black and gold, which embellishments render it a really picturesque object.

THE IRISH VOLUNTEERS

JUST a century ago the Old College Green became famous as being the place of rendezvous for the then recently-formed Volunteers. The history of the formation of the Volunteer Force in Ireland, told briefly, is as follows:—The spirit of volunteering was occasioned by the appearance in 1760 of a small band of Frenchmen who landed at Carrickfergus and took the town. The people around Belfast flew to arms, and Lord Charlemont described them when mustered as being a very formidable body. They were drawn up in regular divisions, and each had its own chosen officers, and formed in martial army. Some were armed with old firelocks, but the greater number with what is now known in Ireland as the pike and in Scotland as the Lochaber axe. It resembles a scythe fixed longitudinally to the end of a long pole. The Government of the day seemed inclined, or compelled, to encourage the movement for Volunteering thus started, and they certainly seemed to have very little means at hand for repelling an invasion, for England's armies were at that time fully occupied in America, so that it is not surprising that the Volunteers increased in numbers rapidly. On the 6th October, 1778, the first Regiment was formed in Dublin. The uniform was blue, with blue facings, edged with scarlet and brass buttons. The Duke of Leinster was elected Colonel, and became very popular. The great day of the year was the 4th of November, and on each anniversary of this date the various corps of the City and County of Dublin paraded on St. Stephen's Green. The Force established a newspaper called The Volunteer's Journal, which upheld its motto, Libertas et Natale Solum, so well that its publisher was indicted for high treason. But the movement gained strength, and in the Irish House of Parliament, when in 1782 the Independence of Ireland was declared, a special vote of thanks was passed to the Volunteers, and it is recorded that on this occasion the streets from the Parliament House to the Castle were lined with Volunteers in uniform bearing arms. After peace had been declared, an attempt was made to disband the Force by tempting the men to join a new Association, partaking of the character of a national militia, and called The Fencible Regiments; but the attempt failed, and it was not till the Volunteers got disunited amongst themselves on the question of admitting Catholics to rights of election that the popularity of the force began to decline. At one time it numbered nearly 100,000 men.

DUBLIN CASTLE

IT was John the "Landless," son of Henry II., who first conceived the need of a Castle for the City of Dublin. To use his own words, "It was to be raised in a competent place, as well to curb the city as to defend it."

The fastness, for such it was, though commenced in 1205, was not completed until fifteen years afterwards, when the Royal founder had been dead four years. The fortress had its dungeons, drawbridge, prison, treasury, and a mill, for the convenience of the garrison. State records tell us that a judicial combat by the sword has been fought within the walls of the Castle, and in presence of the Archbishop and Justices. From time to time Parliaments and Courts of Law were held here, and, more or less, the Castle has always been the depository of the archives of the city. It was not until Queen Elizabeth's reign it became a Viceregal residence.

"The competent place," selected by King John's deputy, Meyler Fitz-Henry, for the site of the fortress, was on the brow of a hill, at the south side of the river, and in the centre of the diminutive capital of those days. The Castle, as it now stands, no doubt, retains much of the form of King John's design, but the greater portion of the edifice has been renewed and enlarged, the latest addition being the Chapel Royal, an exceedingly tasteful Gothic building, completed in 1814. Partaking as they do of the character of a citadel, various portions of which have been added at different epochs, the Castle buildings present an unsymmetrical and gloomy aspect.

Once within the splendid marble vestibule, or the painted and gilded portions of the Castle, however, the mind is no longer weighted with the solemn memories suggested by the towers and bastions without. The more magnificent chambers of the interior are a Council Hall, hung round with portraits of all the Lord Lieutenants since 1798, and St. Patrick's Hall, built by Lord Chesterfield—that Lord Lieutenant, whose creed, in the pleasant but wrong old times, was that there was no sin except "a breach of good manners." It is in this gorgeous apartment that the levées and drawing-rooms and balls are held, including that last fête of the Dublin season, St. Patrick's Ball, at which the ladies are bound by Viceregal law to attire themselves in costumes of Irish manufacture.

It would be almost impossible to say to how many uses parts of the Castle lend themselves in the present day. In one of the halls the degrees of the Queen's University are annually conferred. In other sections all the principal Government departments are located. So mixed is everything in Ireland of the serious and the gay, that outside of these official quarters a motley group of careless lads and lasses, inspired by the cheerful music of the military bands, collect each morning and witness the ceremony of the troops relieving guard.

In the Upper Castle Yard is situated the famous Birmingham Tower, formerly used as a prison for State criminals, and from whence many a poor sinner has been led to execution. The most noted structures in the Lower Castle Yard are the Chapel, the Bedford Tower, which is the official residence of the Dean, and the Record Tower, in which are deposited the archives of Ireland. Ulster King-of-Arms, Sir Bernard Burke, C.B.—whose splendid literary achievements in developing the heraldry of Ireland have won for him a patriot's fame and an European reputation—resides here, and is the honoured guardian of these genealogical treasures.

THE CHAPEL ROYAL

The interior of the chapel reveals a picture of the richest architectural beauty. The galleries are of polished Irish oak, and the panelling in them displays carvings of the coats of arms of all the Governors of Ireland since the landing of Henry II. There are a large number of exquisitely-painted windows. On these also the escutcheons of the Lord Lieutenants are portrayed. Over the altar is a magnificent oriel window; and the painting here, representing an episode in the Saviour's life, is the work of an eminent Dutch master. It was bought in Flanders by Lord Whitworth for 400*l.*, and presented by him to the Chapel.

THE FOUR COURTS

THE noble building (or series of buildings) known as the "Four Courts" is situated, like the Custom House, on the quays. Like the Custom House, too, there is over the central portion of the structure an immense dome, light green in colour, which reminds one of an Eastern Mosque. The "Hall" beneath this dome, and from whence doors lead into the different Courts, is a scene of the greatest excitement during Term time—barristers, solicitors, and clients all carrying on their conferences while standing on the marble floor. The frontage of the Courts towards the river is exceedingly imposing. Solemn gateways, surmounted with the emblems of the Law, balustrades of stone running along the top of the walls, and Corinthian columns supporting the dome, all enhance the stately character of the architecture of this temple to Irish justice. The "Four Courts" were completed in the year of the Union, and cost 200,000*l.* In the reign of Queen Elizabeth the Law Courts were removed from Dublin Castle, and there are records proving that at this time the Irish Bar, owing to the abolition of the Brehon Laws and the general insecurity of titles, had risen to great importance.

From the law reports that survive it would appear that the business of the Bar was well done. The age of Irish eloquence, the results of a sterner time, had not arrived, but something of the purity and grace of style conspicuous in the works of Burke and Goldsmith had found its way into the Irish forum. In Henrietta Street, not a stone's throw from the "Four Courts," is situated the Irish School of Law, corresponding with the Temple in London, and known as the King's Inns.

CHRIST CHURCH CATHEDRAL

SITRIC, the founder of the Cathedral, was a Dane, but inasmuch as Ireland became the country of his adoption, as he reigned over Dublin for many years, and for all we know died in it, he may be considered a Dane by birth only. The structures, and they are many, said to be designed by so-called Danes, may all be held to be the work of "settlers," and not of the Ostmen proper, who too frequently came and went as robbers, and pillaged and destroyed churches and palaces and whole districts, whenever they were permitted to make an entrance into them. The "Danes of Dublin" were, however, a settled colony, who relinquished the life of Vikings, made a city, erected fortifications, and fought in many a bloody war for its protection. It was in 1038 that Sitric, with the aid of Donat, Bishop of Dublin, ordered the erection of the Cathedral. The church was over and over again enlarged by the addition of smaller chapels, but in 1120, in the same year that St. Patrick's Cathedral was built by Comyn, Archbishop of Dublin, that prelate so altered and renovated Christ Church that it became in almost every detail a new erection. Early in the present century it was described as a "lumpish cruciform pile with a wide tower rising a little more than high enough over the intersection of the nave and the transept to make the whole mass seem hunchbacked." It will be in the recollection of our readers that Mr. Henry Roe, the well-known Irish distiller, has within the past two years restored this splendid ecclesiastical building at a cost of more than 200,000*l.* He entrusted the work to Mr. G. E. Street, and that architect has made the Cathedral one of the most perfect specimens of Early English architecture in this kingdom. He has as far as possible adhered to the designs of its founder, and has added a new Synod House for the use of the Synod and the united dioceses of Dublin, Glendalough, and Kildare. Mr. Roe has given a further sum of 20,000*l.* for the sustentation of the clergy and the choir. The traditions of the fabric are full of interest. A Parliament was held within the walls by Henry VI. in 1450, and it was here that the impostor, Lambert Simnel, was crowned as king in 1487, the crown used on this occasion having been borrowed from a statue of the Virgin in the neighbouring church on Cork Hill. It has for generations been believed that the bodies of Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, and his wife, Eva, daughter of Dermot, King of Leinster, were interred here. Doubt, however, has recently become somewhat pronounced on this point, and Canon Finlayson, who is about to publish a work on the Cathedral, quotes heraldic authorities in support of his idea that the arms on the tomb are not those of Strongbow but of one of his followers, Fitz-Osbert. The Canon also agrees with the view that the mutilated stone supposed to have represented Eva is in reality Strongbow's son, who was cut in two by his father as punishment for his cowardice. Leland, in his history of Ireland, remarks that there is an inscription in Gloucester Cathedral, intimating that the body of the Earl of Pembroke was interred in the Cloisters there. It is only fair to Canon Finlayson to add that in his book he quotes the following words from Giraldus Cambrensis, the author of the "Conquest of Ireland:" "The earl was interred in Christ Church, and his funeral obsequies were performed by Archbishop Lawrence O'Toole." While these lines are going to press I am informed that Mr. Street, in making within the past few weeks some excavations, has unearthed a stone figure undoubtedly of a woman, and no doubt the savants of the British Association will be invited to give their opinion in respect to Mr. Street's idea, that this figure is that of the long-lost Eva.

STRONGBOW'S TOMB

The tomb of Strongbow has become the more famous in consequence of a custom set in motion by the Dean and Chapter that tithes should be paid to the clergy on the stone. The monument consists of a square pedestal, on the top of which lies the form of a warrior in chain armour, with legs crossed, Crusader fashion; there is also besides this figure the mutilated form before mentioned. Above the tomb a stone with the following inscription engraved upon it has been let into the wall:—

Other tombs of great interest are those of Sir John Stevenson, the musician who wrote the Irish melodies to Moore's words; of Robert, nineteenth Earl of Kildare (premier earl of Ireland), of Lord Lifford, Lord Chancellor of Ireland; of Richard Laurence, Archbishop of Kildare; of Bishop Lyndsay of Balcarres (Bishop of Kildare and Dean of Christ Church); of Dr. Mathias, of the Arctic ship Enterprise; and of Archbishop Comyn, restorer of the Cathedral. It was in Christ Church that the liturgy of the Reformation was first read in Ireland in the English tongue. For many years there was much jealousy between the two Cathedral Churches of Dublin, but in 1300 the differences were removed by the grant of a distinct precedence to Christ Church. Since the passing of the Church Act of 1869, however, Christ Church has been made the Cathedral of the Dublin diocese, but St. Patrick's has been declared to be the national Cathedral of Ireland.

TRINITY COLLEGE

IN the days of Elizabeth the broad distinctions between the Church and the Law now recognised had no existence. Archbishop Adam Loftus, to whom the University of Dublin is said to owe its origin, filled at different times the offices of Archbishop of Dublin and Lord Chancellor. This remarkable man, ancestor of the Marquises of Ely, came from England as Private Chaplain to Thomas, Earl of Sussex, Lord Deputy of Ireland in the early years of Elizabeth's reign. In the course of his long public career it was observed that he took a warm interest in a College which was at that time attached to St. Patrick's Cathedral, and to which scholars from many parts of Ireland came for their education. As the citizens had possession of the lands of the obsolete Priory of All Hallows, under grant of Henry VIII., the idea at length seized them that these lands could be applied to no better purpose than the establishment of a University, and with this object they offered them to Loftus. His lordship lost no time in making the desire of the people known to the sovereign, and in 1591, eight years after the foundation of Edinburgh University, the Charter was issued for the erection of words which imply that other colleges were intended in time to be added to "Trinity."

The College began its existence unostentatiously with Adam Loftus as Provost and three Fellows, James Fullerton, James Hamilton, and James Ussher, afterwards one of the greatest ornaments of the Church in Ireland. In some years which followed it was so poor that examinations for scholarships could not be held, at other times all educational work had to be suspended on account of the tide of war flowing through the city. When James II. was assembling his forces in Dublin for his unfortunate campaign in the north, Trinity College became his arsenal, and was placed in a condition of defence. The chapel of that period became a magazine, and the library and chambers of the students were broken up and used as lodgings for the troops or as cells for His Majesty's prisoners. Again, when the Insurrections of 1798 and 1803 broke out, the entrances to the University bristled with the muzzles of cannon. Even as late as the time of the Fenian disturbances, the plan of utilising the College as a fort or barrack engaged the thoughts of the chiefs of the garrison, and on one particular evening in 1867 I remember well a troop of Hussars being brought within the College precincts, and that the bright uniforms of several officer guests were conspicuous that evening at the College ordinary amidst the sombre gowns of Fellows and Pensioners. It is, indeed, the eventful character of her history, as well as the brilliant lustre her more distinguished scholars have shed upon the place of their education, which have made "Old Trinity," a title to be mentioned only with pride and affection by Irishmen in whatever quarter of the globe they may be sojourners. That the scholars of Trinity whose fame has become European are not few in number is manifest when to the memory at once occur such names as Ussher, Berkeley (to whom Pope attributed every virtue under Heaven), Leland, the Magees, Swift, Butler, Goldsmith, Burke, Plunket, Curran, Moore, Malone (Editor of "Shakespeare"), Barry Yelverton, Lord O'Hagan, Todd, Lord Cairns, the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Ball), and Lecky.

The adversity which visited the University in her early days strengthened her, and, once her reputation became precious to the nation, benefactions flowed in from every quarter. Over and over again the English and Irish Parliaments have voted her magnificent grants in estates and money. King Charles, on his restoration, gave her all the lands in the southern countries forfeited by disloyal tenants. King William, in commemoration of the Battle of the Boyne, endowed her library, Queen Anne gave 5,000*l.* to build a new one, and one of the provosts, Dr. Baldwin, dying at the ripe age of ninety-two, bequeathed to the College the whole of his fortune of 80,000*l.* With these and a thousand other gifts, public and private, the University has increased century by century in wealth as well as usefulness. But with all her present wealth she is one of the most frugal of Colleges. This is shown in a remarkable way by recent statistics, which place it beyond doubt that Trinity College is maintained, and accomplishes her work with eminently satisfactory results, with an income of little over 60,000*l.* a year, or one-tenth that of Oxford. The three Fellows who sat round the old Provost to advise him in the Elizabethan days have since developed into a Senate, which comprises seven Senior and twenty-six Junior Fellows, all of whom, unlike their colleagues at Oxford and Cambridge, are allowed to take unto themselves wives, and, in order that they may support their wives in comfort and dignity, are permitted to hold their Fellowship till they die. There are thirty-one Professorships, including chairs for oratory, music, and the development of the Irish language, and all, save those for Divinity, are now open to candidates of every religious denomination.

ARCHITECTURE OF THE COLLEGE

The principal front of the University buildings is in College Green, and this, with the old Senate House, which is at right angles to it, gives to this open space a majestic appearance not to be rivalled by any other of the beautiful views in Dublin. Within the College boundaries are four quadrangles which extend backwards for more than a quarter of a mile. All of these contain lofty stone residences. Behind these, again, extending another quarter of a mile, is the College Park, wherein is held the famous Annual Athletic Meeting, always graced by the presence of the Lord Lieutenant and the fashionable world of Dublin. In the centre of the two front quadrangles is a beautiful campanile, raised through the munificence of Primate Beresford. The bells of this structure correspond in their boom with those of St. Paul's, London. When the excavations were being made for the erection of this campanile, some stone coffins and part of the old priory were discovered. The human remains were re-interred beneath the cloisters in the present chapel, where also may be seen the coffins of nearly all the provosts.

THE LIBRARY

Three picturesque structures, the Dining Hall, the Examination Hall, and the Chapel (the two last being in the Corinthian style) occupy positions in the Campanile Square, and here also is the Library, supported by a long Italian piazza. The work of stocking this institution with books was undertaken at the time when the Bodleian was being furnished, and as it is one of the libraries to which a copy of every volume published in the United Kingdom is sent, the collection is of the highest value. Probably the rarest curiosities are a gigantic map of Ireland, containing 1,500 sheets, and which is admitted to be one of the greatest geographical achievements in the world; the Book of Kells, beautifully illuminated by Irish monks of the earliest times; the Book of Armagh; the complete library of Baron Fagel, which was purchased by the University for 8,000*l*.; Dugdale's "History of the Churches and Abbeys of England" (an entire volume in this series is devoted to St. Paul's Cathedral), and the "Antiquities of Mexico," a work which cost the editor, Lord Kingsborough, 30,000*l*. to prepare. The galleries of the library are adorned with busts of the celebrities of the College. The Chapel and the Examination Hall contain portraits by old and modern masters of the same worthies, as well as of the illustrious foundress, and several of the chancellors.

THE PROVOST'S HOUSE AND OTHER STRUCTURES

Outside of the main buildings in a private garden to the right is a substantial classical-looking mansion used since the days of Hely-Hutchinson (the only lay Provost of the college) as the residences of the Provosts. The collection of paintings which are hung round the reception rooms here include works by Gainsborough, Guido, and Sir Thomas Lawrence. There are several museums within the college precincts, and also a gymnasium, a school of medicine, and a racquet court. The Medical School of Trinity College is the only one in the kingdom which enforces the taking out of a degree in arts as well as in medicine before the pupil can obtain his diploma.

THE LIBERTIES

SURROUNDING the Cathedrals of Christ Church and St. Patrick's are the "Liberties," a district which was formerly the seat of the woollen trade of Dublin, as well as the quarter of the aristocracy. The spirit of destruction has passed over it all, and if you enter any of the old houses now you will find the strange spectacle in store for you of stately mahogany doors giving you admission to vast chambers filled only with poor and wretched inmates. Up to the time of the Union the neighbourhood held up its head, and the young bloods of James's Street, Skinner's Row, and Meath Street, patrolled the streets at night, "pinking" men who went between the wind and their nobility. After 1800, the old dignity of the place and the trade rapidly declined, and at length—thirty years ago—the Liberties became from end to end the abomination of desolation in Dublin. Since that period, however, happier signs have appeared. Distilleries, breweries, and timber yards have sprung up in many directions, and neat red houses, the homes of the men employed in these hives of industry, are now being rapidly and plenteously built on the sites of the old mansions.

It was thought that, when Sir Benjamin Lee Guinness, whose vast brewery now covers several hundred acres in this district, restored in 1865 the Christ Church Cathedral and the place of sepulture of Ireland's most illustrious dead, the Corporation of the city would have constructed handsome avenues about it, but this has not been done, and visitors stand abashed when they see so beautiful and stately a pile in the midst of a network of squalid laneways. The Dublin Corporation are wanting in that enterprise so common in Paris, where it is an every day occurrence to raze line after line of old buildings to the ground in order to make on the space one splendid boulevard.

ST. PATRICK'S CATHEDRAL

THE Cathedral owes its origin to John Comyn, Archbishop of Dublin, who, in 1190, is said to have selected this site because there was here in ancient days a well, and some say a church, which had been used by St. Patrick. The steeple and the spire, which is low, and of the square extinguisher pattern, are growths of later periods. The Cathedral has had an eventful history. It has been used for the Courts of Law, and over and over again for a military barrack and a prison, and it was so sacrilegiously despoiled and damaged by arrows in 1492, when the Fitzgeralds, who were for the Yorkists, quarrelled with the Ormonds, who were Lancastrians, that the Holy See, as an atonement for the outrage, commanded the Mayor of Dublin to walk every Corpus Christi day barefoot through the city.

It has been the scene of many splendid ceremonies. The Prince of Orange attended here with his army to return thanks for the victory at the Boyne, and within these walls George IV. and our own Prince of Wales have been present (the latter as recipient of the honour) at an Installation of Knights of the Order of St. Patrick. The principal monuments in the Cathedral are those to the memory of Swift and Stella, of the great Earl of Cork, the lawyer's clerk of Elizabeth's reign, who rose to be a peer and one of the wealthiest landowners in Munster; of Curran, the orator, of Charles Wolfe, author of the "Burial of Sir John Moore;" of Archbishop Whately; of Lord Mayo, Governor General of India; of Dame St. Leger, who was married to four husbands, and yet died at the age of 37; of Captain Boyd, of H.M.S. Ajax, drowned at Kingstown Harbour in trying to save the lives of shipwrecked sailors; of Carolan, the last of the Irish bards; of Sam Lover, painter, poet, and novelist; of Rev. James Henthorn Todd, DD., the biographer of St. Patrick, and a host of other distinguished men.

THE ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY

YOU have a desire to mount these steep steps in Dawson Street, and to examine the mysteries of the Academy, an institution which might by Londoners be imagined to be a depository of paintings and sculpture, whereas it is, on the other hand, a depository of antiquities, and intended for the development of science and polite literature.

Beware! Pause and examine yourself first, for no unruly heart of unbelief should pass this threshold. If you are credulous prepare for the marvellous. You will soon learn that this is the receptacle of all the secrets of Ireland, the home of her greatest treasures, the favourite haunt of Archæologists, Alchemists, Historians, Goldfinders. If you are as fortunate as I was, you will be received by a genial curator, Captain MacEniry, who appears to have given up much of his life to the study of antiquities. He is the symbol of history itself, so vast is his store of information, and possesses that grace and sturdy confirmatory finish in delivery which History, to be attractive, ought to have. For instance, in such a homely unexcited way did he convey the intelligence to me that Ireland was once the land of elephants and black bears, that, such is the imitative faculty in man, I accepted the statement without astonishment.

It was well I did, because he proceeded to show me many skulls of these animals recovered from the Irish peat-fields, and no other explanation of their presence there but his has at present seen the light. Of course, it is possible some ancient book may yet turn up which will inform us that a boat from Noah's Ark drifted to this country, or that some menagerie travelling about in the olden days for the delectation of the Irish kings got swamped and swallowed up in the bog.

This jesting merits reproof, for, indeed, the collection in this Academy is one of permanent value and interest, and not, as cynics might fancy, all old bones, bog butter, musty scrolls, and dubitable relics of the nobles and ecclesiastics of the past. "For almost everything here," my guide tells me, "we have confirmatory records," and then he shows me hundreds of ancient books (including the Cathach, a manuscript in the handwriting of St. Columba, and the Domnach Cuigid, containing St. Patrick's own copy of the four Gospels), the earliest of which are written in the Latin language but in Irish character, and the latter ones Celtic in both character and narrative. I don't think there is any record which makes it known who owned the long and unwieldly canoes formed of scooped-out trees which occupy the expansive crypt beneath the buildings. They are so primitive that they must be prehistoric, and are large enough to have been the barges in which the Phœnicians came centuries and centuries ago from Syria to trade in the Western seas.

THE BROOCH OF TARA

Neither is there any record to show to whom the Tara brooch belonged. It is a pennanular ornament with a filagree chain attached, and was found at Drogheda, near the site of the ancient capital. From the quantity of solid gold, and the exquisite character of the tracing and enamelling contained in it, all antiquarians agree that it belonged to some king, or damsel attached to the ancient Irish Court, and hence it received its name. The enamelling is opaque, the art of making which lies buried with the early Celts.

THE CROSS OF CONG

In the room with the Tara brooch are three other relics of still greater interest—the Ardagh Chalice of white metal, adorned with gold filagree and enamel; the Cross of Cong; and St. Patrick's Bell. The Cross is the identical one, as inscriptions upon it prove, made to receive the piece of the true Cross which was sent over by the Pope (when he was introducing Catholicism into Ireland) to O'Connor, King of Connaught, in 1123. It is of large size, and no doubt meant to be carried at the head of an army or religious procession. In the centre is one of the boat-shaped crystals so common in all the ancient metallurgic relics of Ireland said to have been brought as talismans from the Holy Land. No finer specimen of the goldsmith's work has been preserved in any European country, and it is the more valuable as exhibiting the perfection of Irish Art at a period when it is commonly imagined that the whole country was lost in barbarism.

ST. PATRICK'S BELL

The Finn Faideah, or "sweet sounding" bell of St. Patrick, was rung by hand. It is of bronze, quadrangular in shape, and enclosed in a golden shrine, the work of which bears date the eleventh century, and an inscription there written upon it traces the antiquity and ownership of the bell itself. It formed one of the three palladiums of the Bishop's See, "The Bell, the Crozier, and the Book," and was used not only to summon people to prayer, but to enforce oaths, honour, funerals, and cure diseases.

OTHER CURIOSITIES

The Library and the room containing the bequests left to the Society by the widow of Thomas Moore are filled with other treasures of the rarest kind. One of these is the original letter which brought to a close the long controversy as to the authorship of "The Burial of Sir John Moore." "I have completed the burial of Sir John Moore," writes Wolfe to his friend, John Taylor of Clonouth, Cashel, "and will here inflict it upon you. You have no one but yourself to blame for praising the two stanzas, that I told you, so much." Then follow the verses with many words erased and new ones written above them, showing that even in their final revision the poet took pains to be satisfied. There are scores of other autograph letters from such celebrities as Dean Swift, Sheridan, Basho, Curran, O'Connell, and Moore, one of the more remarkable being a letter from James I. It is in French, and contains an egregious blunder in the gender of a noun.

THE MARLBOROUGH STREET SCHOOLS

THE National Department of Irish Education, whose chief object is to maintain schools in every part of Ireland, is located in Marlborough Street, a thoroughfare parallel to Sackville Street, on the north side of the Liffey. The land on which the buildings are raised formed originally the gardens of the town residence, "Tyrone House," of a former Marquis of Waterford. The buildings, though unpretentious, are substantial, and suggestive by their number and size of the important functions entrusted to them. Old Tyrone House is chiefly used for the offices of the Executive Commissioners, a building to its right is the Training Establishment, in which upwards of one hundred and eighty teachers are trained annually for the work of conducting model schools. In the background are three juvenile schools, that in the centre, surmounted by a turret and clock-tower, being for infants; while those which lie north and south of it are the boys' and girls' schools respectively. More than three thousand pupils of all denominations were entered on the rolls of these seminaries last year. Primarily intended for the poor, these schools have, from the general superiority of the education given in them, attracted large numbers of children from the middle classes. For these a higher scale of fees has been devised. Not merely are drawing, singing, and the use of the sewing machine here taught, but those who can afford to pay reasonably can learn the harmonium, the piano, and even modern languages, from competent teachers. In another building are the "practising schools," commanding an attendance of from sixty to a hundred pupils, and presided over by one teacher and an assistant. These are designed to exhibit what an ordinary rural national school, managed by local parties, should be in its arrangements and discipline. In the garden in front of the schools, and facing the Catholic Pro-cathedral on the other side of the street, there is in course of erection a statue, by the Irish sculptor, Farrell, of the late Right Hon. Sir Alexander Macdonnell, Bart., who, as Resident Commissioner, guided the Administration for more than thirty years.

THE ALBERT AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTION

ABOUT three miles from Dublin is the Model Farm called after the Prince Consort, and which is another institution under the control of the Commissioners of National Education. One hundred and seventy young men are being trained here, on a farm of one hundred and eighty acres, in the science and practice of agriculture—a pursuit which is of the highest importance where the cultivation of the soil, as it is in Ireland, is the great business of life.

ST. STEPHEN'S GREEN

MERRION, FITZWILLIAM, and MOUNTJOY SQUARES, surrounded as they are by the town residences of the aristocracy, are always pointed to as embellishments of which any city might feel proud, but there is one square in Dublin larger than any of these, or of any square in Europe, and known as St. Stephen's Green. This enclosure, which occupies a whole square mile, is through the munificence of Sir Arthur Guinness, who is about to spend 5,000*l*. upon it, shortly to be thrown open to the public as a park, and hundreds of workmen are now engaged in forming a lake, and making the place in other respects more suitable to its new purpose. The Green was formerly the Tyburn of Dublin, several malefactors having been gibbeted therein. It boasts two statues, one of George II. on horseback, and the second of Lord Eglinton, Lord-Lieutenant in 1852, and again in 1858-9.

The buildings of the Catholic University, the Royal College of Surgeons, the College of Science, and the Wesleyan College form portions of the lines of fine houses on each side of the Green. The Guinness family also have a mansion here, and in turning one of the corners at the south side you will find before you the Exhibition Palace, which under the management of Sir Edward Lee is an unvarying source of amusement to the people of Dublin.

ST. MICHAN'S CHURCH

THERE is no doubt but that the principal monuments still left in Dublin of the Danes bear the date of the eleventh century, from which fact we may infer that at that period they were most numerous, and had most complete mastery over the capital. Their taste seems to have been pronounced in the direction of sacred buildings. Christ Church Cathedral was raised in 1038, and in 1095 tradition informs us that St. Michanus built the church which became the cathedral for the whole of Dublin, on the north side of the Liffey, just as Christ Church was the cathedral on the south. Mr. Gladstone, when recently in Dublin, thought St. Michan's Church the most characteristic specimen of native architecture he had seen. It is situated at the rear of the Four Courts, and its magnificent square tower is a most conspicuous object above a neighbourhood of low-sized houses. Next to the Liberties, this parish is the poorest and shabbiest in the city, and the pilgrimage to this church, so interesting as a national as well as an antiquarian relic, has to be made through narrow streets filled with shops and tenements of a hopelessly wretched character; old clothes are dangling from triangular lines at the windows, and potatoes, soap, hair-oil, and farthing candles are the principal merchandise bartered in this populous haven of indigence. And yet it is not all decrepitude and want, for there are one or two good iron foundries, and droves of cattle are constantly pushed through the streets to a market-place called by the somewhat grandiloquent name of Smithfield. The church, in addition to its antiquity, is otherwise most interesting. The vaults beneath the edifice are one of the marvels of the age, possessing antiseptic qualities of such effectiveness that about a score of bodies interred centuries ago are preserved so remarkably that the form and feature of life is easily distinguishable. The skin is in most cases intact, the teeth have not fallen from their places, and in some instances ribbons, stockings, and other portions of the adornments and coverings of the corpses still envelope the perfect though discoloured heads and limbs, as though moth and dust and worms did not exist. The prince, the peer, the patriot, and the poor all lie here together, and could the relatives of the departed themselves come to life again they could have no manner of difficulty in picking out their own kinsmen, or verifying the manner in which they died. The wonderful effect produced is attributed to two causes; first, they say that the graveyard was built on the site of an old forest, that the soil is in fact a bog, and every visitor to the Royal Irish Academy can satisfy himself of the wonderful preserving property inherent in the peat soil of this country; secondly, it is believed that the vaults are built with Phœnician lime, which becomes so dry and hard that no destructive agent can penetrate through it. One of the vaults has been purchased by the Leitrim family, and here, only the other day, were placed with his kinsmen the remains of the late Earl, the melancholy and brutal character of whose death sent a shudder through the land. The rector, the Rev. T. Long, who has himself expended large sums of money in renovating and beautifying the edifice, has given me a list of the principal vaults, which are scattered over the ground without the building. One of these contains the remains of Robert Emmet; no inscription is yet written on the long plain slab, as it was his wish that no epitaph should be written over the place of his burial, till Ireland should "again be free." The organ within St. Michan's is the one on which Handel played his "Messiah" for the first time; it was removed from Fishamble Street Theatre, the scene of the great composer's performance. The parish registers date back to the year 1636, and the church plate, which is very beautiful, to the year 1676.

THE PRO-CATHEDRAL

THE Roman Catholic Pro-Cathedral of Dublin, situated in Marlborough Street, is built in the Grecian style of architecture. In this case it contributes all the characteristics of sublimity of conception, beauty and symmetry of proportion, and that reverential solemnity of air which harmonise with the mystic functions of religion. The Cathedral consists of a lengthened nave and side aisles, divided by stately rows of massive Doric columns, supporting an architrave and entablature, and an arched ceiling surmounted by a lofty dome. The high marble altar was executed by Turnerelli. In the concave apse of the ceiling over the altar the Ascension of the Saviour is represented in relievo, and is an original spirited and highly admired work of art, full of expression, and designed by the Irish sculptor, John Smith. There are two porticos, built by Archdeacon Hamilton. The church was designed by Mr. John Sweetman, of Raheny. It cost 50,000*l.*, and stands on the site originally occupied by the city mansion of Lord Annesley. The site and house were purchased in the year 1803 for the sum of 5,100*l.*, but the committee, from want of funds, were unable to commence the erection of the church for twelve years after. During that interval the mansion was rented for a barrack at 300*l.* a year to Government. Until the close of the last century the chief Catholic Episcopal parish of the city was that of St. Nicholas of Myra, Francis Street, but was changed for St. Mary's of the Immaculate Conception by Archbishop Troy. This Pro-Cathedral was the first majestic church erected by the Roman Catholics of Ireland after the repeal of the penal laws, and its erection was an era associated with many most memorable events in their modern history. The first stone was blessed and deposited on the 14th of November, 1815, the feast of St. Lawrence O'Toole, by the Archbishops Troy and Murray. Curran, the great orator and eloquent advocate of the Catholic claims, was present on the occasion, and in the course of his speech used the words, "I rocked ye in your cradle, and come here to-day to see ye step forth in your manhood." Archbishop Troy died in 1823, and, though the church then was not entirely completed, his obsequies were observed, and were the object of the first funereal functions celebrated within the fabric. The church was dedicated and opened for worship on the 14th of November, 1825, by Archbishop Murray, assisted by nine Bishops, and in presence of a congregation of 3,000 persons, who on that day contributed 2,371*l.* to the Church Building Fund. The dedication sermon was preached by the Bossuet of the age, James Doyle, Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin. The Bishops were entertained at dinner on that evening by 300 gentlemen, presided over by Sir Thomas Esmonde, and amongst the distinguished company were Sheil and O'Connell. The functions of religion are celebrated in this church with all the grandeur and solemnity of the Roman ritual under the presidency of His Eminence, Paul Cullen, Cardinal Archbishop. Dr. Cullen was born on the 29th April, 1804, and created Cardinal on the 22nd of June, 1866. He is the first Irish Cardinal.

GLASNEVIN

GLASNEVIN is the Campo Santo of Ireland. Here the remains of the orators, statesmen, and patriots who during the past fifty years have won the affections of their native land, and the respect of the world, have found a quiet resting place. The cemetery, which is about two miles north from Sackville Street, was established through the instrumentality of Daniel O'Connell and the Catholic Association. A piece of ground, only 3½ acres in extent, was bought at Golden Bridge for the interment of Catholics, but in a short time, finding this too small, the Association bought twelve acres of the present cemetery, and gradually extended it, till it now contains fifty-nine acres. On entering the enclosure by the old gateway numerous long avenues crossing each other in all directions, planted with dwarf Irish oak, cedar, and palm trees meet the eye. Curran Square, so called because the remains of John Philpot Curran are placed here, borders on the gateway. Curran's monument is very beautiful, and is a fac-simile, by Papworth, of the square sarcophagus over the Scipio family at Rome. Here also are the tombs of Edward Ruthven, M.P., and Lord Chief Justice Monahan. On the Long Walk, in a bare spot of ground, the grass being worn away, sixteen feet square, lie the bodies of Terence Bellew M'Manus, Colonel O'Mahony, and Sergeant M'Carthy. The vista shown by this walk is very beautiful, and Mr. Gladstone during his visit expressed his admiration of the scene. On one of the cross walks is a plain monument commemorating the fidelity and virtues of Anne Devlin, the faithful servant of Robert Emmett, who could neither be bribed, nor forced, to yield up the hiding place of her master. A magnificent Celtic cross, the largest in Ireland, marks the last resting-place of John B. Dillon, M.P. for Tipperary. Just opposite this the tomb of Eugene O'Curry, one of the compilers of the annals of the Four Masters, is marked with a very handsome Celtic cross, but how different have the remains of another and the chief of the compilers been treated by the public! The body of John O'Donovan, LL.D., lies in the old O'Connell Circle without a sign to show its last resting-place.

Advancing to the new O'Connell Circle, on the right hand side is the cenotaph in memory of Allen, Larkin, and O'Brien, the "Manchester Martyrs." Before entering O'Connell's crypt, underneath the Round Tower erected to his memory, there stand three monuments sacred to the memory of Monsignore Yore, Dr. Spratt, the great temperance advocate, and "Honest Tom Steele," the faithful friend and supporter of O'Connell. The remains of the late Sir John Gray, who was a Protestant, lie in No. 8 vault, in the O'Connell Circle, but it is intended to remove them, and place them beside Monsignore Yore's monument. The crypt is the great object of interest. O'Connell's remains were left in the old O'Connell Circle for twenty-five years and were only placed where they now rest in 1869. The tower has an elevation of 150 feet. The crypt beneath it is tastefully decorated and coloured and on the walls are the patriot's famous words, "My heart to Rome, my body to Ireland, my soul to heaven." At the east of the tower is the tomb of William Dargan, the Irish Railway King and the promoter of the Dublin Exhibition of 1853. It may be mentioned that the Emperor of Brazil, on seeing O'Connell's sarcophagus, said it was fit for a monarch, and his aide-de-camp, at His Majesty's express wish, collected some grass and daisies from the mound surrounding the tower, for the Emperor to keep as mementoes. The new Mortuary Chapel erected at the back of the tower, but which will be in front when the entrance on the Finglas Road is finished, is a fine piece of sculpture. It is built of Dalkey granite and carved in Romanesque, in the style of ancient Irish architecture, the eaves being supported by the heads of Irish and English kings. The most simple tomb in the cemetery, and yet one which appeals keenly to the senses, is that of John Hogan, the sculptor. It is a plain marble slab, with only the words "John Hogan" upon it. Another interesting monument is the unassuming stone marking the grave of the great scholar, James Clarence Mangan, who died 21st June, 1849. There are five old watch-towers in the walls encircling the cemetery, which were erected for men to watch the graves during the time when body-snatching was carried on. Another reminiscence of this period is an old dog yard, where the committee kept, as late as 1852, a pack of bloodhounds which were let out in the grounds at night.

The Botanic Gardens are close to the cemetery. The ground occupied by these was famous before it came into the possession of the Royal Dublin Society, who bought it from Tickell, the poet, for 2,000*l.* One of the walks was planted under the direction of Addison, Tickell's friend, and is still known as Addison's Walk. It was here, tradition says, that Tickell composed his ballad of "Colin and Lucy." In this neighbourhood also lived Dr. Delany, F.T.C.D., a bosom friend of Dean Swift and Stella; Sir Richard Steele, Thomas Parnell, the poet, and Richard Brinsley Sheridan.

CELEBRATED MEN

DANIEL O'CONNELL

MR. GLADSTONE, during his recent visit to Dublin, complained of the absence of a statue of Sheil, the "most striking orator he ever listened to," but a much more remarkable omission is apparent in the absence from the thoroughfares of a statue of the Liberator, Daniel O'Connell. This want, however, will soon be met by the erection in Sackville Street of a splendid monument, on which Foley devoted the later years of his life. This will be placed at the north side of Carlisle Bridge, and will thus occupy the middle distance in the splendid Boulevard, which, when the widening of the bridge is completed, will extend from the College to Nelson's Pillar and the Rotundo. The memorial will consist of a granite pediment, projecting from the four corners of which will be figures of the winged Victories, "Patriotism," "Fidelity" holding the mariner's compass, "true, as the needle to the pole it loves," "Courage" and "Eloquence." Rising from the centre, there will be a drum surrounded by fifty figures chiefly representing the poets, clergy, and peasantry of Ireland, but one exquisitely chiselled female figure larger than the others is the impersonation of Ireland, her left arm resting on a harp, and her right raised aloft, directing the attention of her beholders to the statue which graces the apex of the structure. This is of bronze, and is said to be as like O'Connell as the statues of Burke and Goldsmith are like their originals.

This remarkable man, who for nearly half a century was the tribune of the people, the incessant advocate of their religious and political liberties, was born on August 6, 1775, on the verge of the Atlantic, in the County Kerry. He obtained his earliest education outside his home from a hedge schoolmaster. At thirteen he was sent with a brother to a school in Cork, and thence to the University of Louvain, the College of St. Omer, and the Douay College. The two boys, in returning from Louvain, crossed in the steamer from Calais with John and Henry Sheares, two brothers afterwards executed for treason in Dublin, and they then discovered how much aglow the hearts of these other youths were with the flame of the French Revolution. Their daring utterances, however, did not infect the O'Connells, however deeply impressed they may have been even then with the injustice under which their own country suffered, and Daniel's famous expression, "He that commits a wrong gives strength to the enemy," became the axiom of his life. Although frequently carried away by the enthusiasm of worshipping crowds assembled

> By the Royal hill and the haunted rath,
> By the hallowed spring and the holy well, to hear from him "golden words of deathless speech and lightning flashes of immortal wit," he often verged on the limits the law allowed, but did not overstep them. He was called to the Bar at the age of twenty-three, and before he was thirty-five was recognised in Ireland as the leader in the political movement on behalf of Catholic Emancipation. It is matter of history, and does not need repetition now that, having won religious freedom for the people, he did not rest from his advocacy of their other rights, and plunged with all his unparalleled zeal and pertinacity into the Reform agitation. Later on arose the movement for a Repeal of the Union, in the course of which more than a million people on two or three occasions formed his auditory, his main argument for which was that the Government of Ireland was one of broken promises.

"How often did I preach patience to you, calm you, and entreat you to listen to the promises of England? You obeyed me; you were quiet and silent; and Ireland wanted to receive from England as a magnanimous boon that which she might have demanded as her own just right. But England has never availed herself of the opportunity which I promised her for displaying her greatness and her magnanimity. When I and Ireland were silent, she forgot her promises, and the old wrongs were continued."

It has been said of him that the warmth of his heart was ever reflected on his face, and that, looking at that sunny countenance, you could never, were it not for his oratory, believe he had a grievance. His great affection for his sons, all of whom, when their father, growing old and feeble, still persevered in advocating the cause of the people, stood by him, showed how noble were the qualities animating his inner soul. His love for the people, for the Catholic Church, for his children, were all imbued with a blamelessness of thought, and with a Christian fervour which gave him fortitude, when, after his long life of excitement and applause, he found himself dying, as he wished to die, on the threshold of the Holy City. A few days before he passed away he wrote a letter, in which he paid back, in sweet words of gratitude, the debt he owed his mother:—"I am the son of a sainted mother, who watched over my childhood with the most faithful care; she was of a high order of intellect, and what little I possess was bequeathed me by her. Her last breath was passed, thank Heaven, in calling down blessings on my head, and I valued her blessings since. In the perils and the dangers to which I have been exposed through life, I have regarded her blessing as an angel's shield over me, and as it has been my protection in this life, I look forward to it also as one of the means of obtaining hereafter a happiness greater than this world can give."

JONATHAN SWIFT

Dean Swift was born in Hoey's Court, off Werburgh Street, at the house of his uncle, a barrister. This court, which is no longer to be found in the directory, was the locale of eminent lawyers at this period. Mrs. Pilkington has, in the memoirs of the Dean, edited by her, stated that the early youth of this great genius did not promise the bright day of wit which afterwards enlightened the world, and that he was refused his College degree as a dunce. The early failures of Swift, whose words afterwards

> Drew audiences
> And attention still as night,
> Or summer's noontide air,

have by himself been attributed to poverty and the neglect of friends. The "Monarch of the Liberties and King of the Mob," as he styled himself, was kindly of heart as he was great in intellect. Although penurious in some things, and tenacious of spending money, he often lent to his poor parishioners round the Deanery of St. Patrick's 5*l.* out of his slender income of 600*l.* a year, taking it back as the poor could pay it in shilling instalments. He was blunt in conversation, and frequently felt surprise at his hearers' toleration of his unceremoniousness. His relations with "Stella" (Esther Johnson), whose studies he directed, and to whom he has borne so much testimony of her purity, cultured understanding, fidelity, and every quality desirable in a wife, have never been satisfactorily explained, nor can his later acquaintanceship and the early death of the unfortunate "Vanessa" leave him blameless. An early engagement to a sister of a college chum, which he cancelled by his coldness, conduct he afterwards regretted deeply, is said to have had something to do with his later great reluctance to enter the marriage state. He possessed almost every attribute to awaken sentiment in a woman's heart, a dignified person, an unfailing supply of jeux d'esprit, a nervous flow of language on every topic, but he had withal a coldness of temper and a mercenary cautiousness with regard to women, and these failings also may have contributed to keep him a bachelor. Canon Leeper, who is about to publish a historical sketch of the National Cathedral of St. Patrick, has permitted me to copy a note or two of his in relation to this strangely gifted man. He writes that "to increase the annual income of St. Patrick's was the Dean's favourite object, and with this in view he gave up all the fines which were tendered to him for the renewal of leases. The records of the Cathedral show with what ability, industry, and zeal he attended to its interests, carefully and formally appointing a Sub-Dean whenever he left home, and being most particular in seeing that the Cathedral officials scrupulously performed their respective duties. He expended considerable sums out of his own pocket for the garden near the Deanery, which he called "Naboth's Vineyard." Though he was no lover of music, he celebrated St. Cecilia's Day in the Cathedral with a concert, and in Carson's Weekly Journal, published in Dublin in 1731, it is stated that on the last Cecilia's Day, "Mr. Purcell's 'Te Deum' and Corelli's Concerto were performed." The Dean also towards the close of his life laid out a share of his fortune to found in Dublin a hospital for "fools, fanatics, and idiots." There was universal lamentation over him when he died in 1745, at the age of seventy-eight, and no Churchman in Ireland was ever so popular and beloved. When he was dead all classes of the people flocked into the Deanery House, and forced their way up to the very bedroom where he lay. "Happy were they," says Sir Walter Scott, "who first got into the chamber, and procured by bribes to the servants locks of his hair to be handed down as sacred relics to their posterity."

OLIVER GOLDSMITH

Whilst London has not a single statue to the memory of English poets Dublin possesses one of Moore and another—the infinitely superior work in point of art of the two—of Oliver Goldsmith. Goldsmith's statue stands in front of the University in which the poor sizar's early studies were pursued, and in the same garden is a statue of Edmund Burke, Goldsmith's contemporary within those classic walls. Goldsmith, who was born at Longford, has himself observed that though he made no great figure in mathematics, which was then and is now a study in greater repute than any other branch of learning in the University, he could turn an ode of Horace with the best of the scholars. On leaving Dublin he studied physic at Edinburgh, but a short time afterwards went to London where he was employed as a school usher, later on as a corrector or reader for the press, and then as a journalist. His brilliant essays on "The Present State of Polite Literature," and his narrative after a tour of Europe on foot of "the Citizen of the World" secured for him a reputation which reached its full blazonry on the publication of "The Traveller" and "The Vicar of Wakefield." This "Poet, Physician, and Historian," as Johnson's epitaph in Westminster Abbey describes him, died in London, on April 4, 1684, so that in half-a-dozen years the centenary of his death will have come round. He died of fever, "made I am afraid," writes Johnson, "more violent by uneasiness of mind." His debts began to be heavy, and all his resources were exhausted. The last four lines of "The Deserted Village:"—

> That Trades proud Empire hastes to swift decay,
> As ocean sweeps the labored mole away;
> While self-dependent power can time defy,
> As rocks resist the billows and the sky.

were not written by Goldsmith, but by Johnson.

EDMUND BURKE

The father of Edmund Burke was an eminent solicitor who resided at 33, Arran Quay, on the south bank of the Liffey, and in this house, which is still standing, the future statesman was born on New Year's Day, 1730. The solicitor was a descendant of a distinguished Irish family, the De Burghs, and his wife, Miss Nagle, of Cork, traced her ancestry to Edmund Spenser. Thus on both sides, the young Edmund had progenitors of name and fame. Many of his early years were passed away at his grandfather's (Nagle's) country seat on the banks of the southern Blackwater, and perhaps the lovely scenery here, and the poetic associations arising from the contiguous homes of Spenser, Raleigh, and Essex, inspired and fostered in him much of that splendour of imagery which his political career in England afterwards displayed.

GRATTAN

Dublin owes its statue of Grattan, one of Foley's choicest achievements, to Mr. A. M. Sullivan, M.P., that gentleman having handed over 300*l.* collected for a testimonial to himself, as the nucleus of a fund for the erection of a memorial of the Irish Senator. Henry Grattan was born in Dublin, for which city his father was Recorder and Member of Parliament, in 1746. He was "short in stature, and unprepossessing in appearance. His arms were disproportionately long. His walk was a stride. With a person swaying like a pendulum, and an abstracted air, he seemed always in thought . . . . . how strange it seems that a mind so replete with grace and symmetry, and power and splendour, should have been allotted such a dwelling for its residence. . . . It was the victory of mind over matter."

The Irish Parliament in recognition of Grattan's services to his native land generously voted him a vote of 100,000*l.* Of this, however, he only accepted 50,000*l.*, and this sum he bequeathed on trust to the citizens of Dublin in case of failure of issue.

WELLINGTON

Sir Bernard Burke has satisfactorily proved, after much doubt on the subject, that the Duke of Wellington was actually born in Dublin at Mornington House, 24, Merrion Street, now the office of the Irish Church Temporalities Commission. Though the fact of the Duke's family being for 600 years settled in Ireland was sufficient virtually to make him a true and bonâ fide Hibernian, still a lamb is not a wolf, though it is born in a wolf's fold, as O'Connell used to say. Canning, though not born in Ireland, often repeated the expression. He, at least, never failed to own himself an Irishman. The Duke's mother was Anne, eldest daughter of Viscount Dungannon, his father that noted musician, Lord Mornington, composer of the celebrated glee, "In Cool Grot," and many other songs and chants. Lord Mornington held the Professorship of Music in Trinity College, Dublin, and was the founder of a most successful Amateur Musical Society, composed of the nobility and members of professions then resident in Dublin. At Eton the future Duke was called a slow boy, too slow for learning, too moping for football. He received his first commission in the 73rd Regiment at eighteen years of age, and sat in the Irish Parliament for Trim when past twenty-one. It was in the Netherlands, when Colonel of the 33rd Infantry, that he first gave promise of his strategic abilities by the handling of his regiment in saving Abercrombie's column from being destroyed in that inglorious campaign. It was said that it was from the errors, not the successes, of his superior officers that Wellington learned his great generalship. Like most distinguished men, his faculties were not limited to the one rôle. He became during the intervals of peace Ireland's Chief Secretary, and his whole career proved him as skilful in the Council Chamber as he was daring and invincible in the field. He was the hero of an interesting occurrence in the House of Commons, when all his honours of Marquis, Viscount, Earl, and Duke were announced at the same time. It was at Dublin Castle, however, when a dashing captain and aide-de-camp, that he is said to have passed his happiest days, though so hard pressed for money to support his necessarily expensive life that he was glad to accept a loan of cash from his bootmaker with whom he lodged on Aston's Quay, and whom he did not forget to pay in after years with gratitude

THOMAS MOORE

Next year the people of Dublin will have to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Moore, the natal day of Ireland's poet having been May 28, 1779. The house in which he was born, No. 12, Aungier Street, Dublin, is still standing, and the shop in connection with it is still used for the provision business, over which John Moore, the poet's father, presided. The people of Dublin have not followed the example of their London neighbours in affixing medallions on the buildings where celebrities were born, but the birthplace of Moore is singularly marked, some admirer having placed his bust in a niche half-way up the façade. From his childhood Moore seems to have given promise of his future fame, for Herbert, the portrait-painter, speaks of him at five years old as being a precocious and entertaining little fellow, who had even then put away his toys, and whose repeated request was to have parts of Shakespeare recited to him. He entered college at sixteen, and, having joined the Historical Society, became one of its turbulent, as well as most eloquent members. His versatile mind, intelligent countenance, his patriotism, and last and most marked of all, his talent as a musician and composer, won him on leaving the University friends in every step of the social scale. He was then, to quote Leigh Hunt, as delightful a person as one could imagine. "His sort of talent has this advantage in it, that being of a description intelligible to all, the possessor is equally sure of present and future fame." His Irish melodies introduced a revolutionary and refining phase into the history of music and the lyrical literature of the kingdom. Luttrell, indeed, recorded what was almost analogous to a fact when he wrote

> I'm told, dear Moore, your lays are sung,
> Can it be true, you lucky man?
> By moonlight in the Persian Tongue
> Along the streets of Ispahan.

An exceedingly unprepossessing statue of Moore was inaugurated during Lord Carlisle's Viceroyalty in College Street, facing the Bank of Ireland. This is still permitted to be an eyesore in the city. A relative of the poet, I believe, or at all events a sculptor of the same name, executed the work, but a comparison with any of the written descriptions, or with such paintings as that of Sir Thomas Lawrence, in the Royal Irish Academy, of Moore will reveal how woefully unlike the original the statue is. As you look at the Lawrence portrait every word of Willis's description of his friend occurs to the mind. "His mouth is the most characteristic feature of all. The lips are delicately cut, slight and changeable as an aspen: but there is a set-up look about the lower lip—a determination of the muscle to a particular expression, and you fancy that you can almost see wit astride upon it. It is written legibly, with the imprint of habitual success. It is arch, confident, and half diffident, as if he was disguising his pleasure at applause, while another bright gleam of fancy was breaking on him. The slightly tossed nose confirms the fun of the expression, and altogether it is a face that sparkles, beams, radiates." Moore's remains were interred at Devizes in Wiltshire, near that "Sloperton Cottage" from whence many of his brightest poems were dated, and where the poet and his wife Bessie lived together happily for so many years.

PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS

IN this sketch of the Irish capital, made necessarily brief by smallness of space, it is impossible to give any more extended account of the churches than we have done, neither can we deal with such corporate buildings as the City Hall and the Mansion House, nor with the hospitals in the number and capaciousness of which Dublin is peculiarly gifted. Nor can anything beyond mere mention be said of such deserving and interesting scientific institutions as the College Observatory at Dunsink (presided over by the Astronomer Royal for Ireland), the College of Surgeons in Stephen's Green, the King and Queen's College of Physicians; or the various schools of medicine, the preponderance of which latter places Dublin in the highest position in the minds of the faculty. There are, however, two or three institutions, the functions of which are of such a general nature, and which are always so eagerly sought out by visitors, that a few words must be said about them.

THE COLLEGE OF SCIENCE

This institution, which is situated on the east side of Stephen's Green, is a continuation of what was once the "Museum of Irish Industry and School of Science." When first founded, the Museum was simply exhibitional, and was formed on the model of the London School of Mines, then in Craig's Court, but now in Jermyn Street. Subsequently, when Dr. Lyon Playfair was one of the Secretaries in the English Department of Science and Art, the courses of lectures which used to be delivered in the Royal Dublin Society House were transferred here. A particular branch of the present course of studies is chemistry. To aid the development of this study a laboratory has been added, and under the present Professor of this science the College has made much advancement, several of the pupils having gone from it to England, and there gained the highest chemical honours the London University can bestow. In 1864 a Select Committeee advised that the Exhibitional Functions of the Institution should be handed over to the Royal Dublin Society, in whose buildings a national museum on the plan of South Kensington will soon be inaugurated. The title of the Stephen's Green establishment then became "The College of Science," and the whole of its duty is now instructional. The College costs the country 7,000*l.* a year.

THE ROYAL DUBLIN SOCIETY

In the year 1731 two gentlemen named Madden and Prior started a society for the advancement of "Husbandry and other useful Arts." With their own capital the Institution was inaugurated, but as prizes were offered for progress in the linen manufacture and industrial and agricultural exhibitions were promoted by the Society its usefulness became most manifest. The first cattle show which ever took place in Dublin was held on the ground where now stands the Theatre Royal, part of which, that in Hawkins Street, was built by the Madden and Prior Society. For this building as well as for other philanthropic efforts of the Society the Irish Parliament voted a handsome annual grant. When George II. was on the throne the Society became a chartered Institution, and assumed its present title. Its duties have also been enlarged, and it now not only fosters husbandry and literature, but science of all kinds and all the useful arts. The present building in Kildare Street is historically famous, having been for a long period the town residence of the Dukes of Leinster, and was celebrated for the festivities carried on there, as well as for the notable escape of Lord Edward Fitzgerald from the town major and his officers by means of a spiral staircase. In 1815 the Royal Dublin Society bought this House for 20,000*l.*—it had cost 80,000*l.*, but the then Duke of Leinster sold it at a sacrifice, seeing it was to be used for such benevolent purposes. You are reminded of this great family on entering the grounds, by seeing a venerable old man, Mr. Boshall, the head gardener, whose father, grand and great grandfather have each acted in the same capacity to Ireland's premier Duke. The gardens, called the Leinster Lawn, of which he now has charge are small, but very ornamental. In the centre of the green slopes rises an equestrian statue of the Prince Consort. There is also here a statue of the "Irish Railway King"—Dargan—and a bust by Farrell of the greatest of late Irish composers—Balfe.

THE ROYAL HIBERNIAN ACADEMY

This building was erected in 1823—when also the Society was incorporated—by the munificence of Mr. Francis Johnston, its first President. He has been succeeded in the Presidential chair from time to time by Martin Cregan, George Petrie, Catterson Smith, and Sir Thomas Deane. At present the chair is held by T. A. Jones, who was one of the chief contributors to the Exhibition this year. In 1829 the Royal Hibernian Academy opened their first Exhibition, to which George Petrie contributed "Ardfinnan Castle," one of his largest and finest works—as he did in each succeeding year pictures of historic interest, and illustrative of the antiquities and ancient legends of the country. Amongst the more famous contributors from time to time have been Sir Martin A. Shee, Maclise, Mulready, Turner, Stanfield, and other eminent artists. Like other chartered Associations, the Hibernian Academy is the embodiment of several minor societies of Irish artists. The Hibernian Academy is the Burlington House of Dublin, and the Summer and Winter Exhibitions are, as in London, objects of considerable interest.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY

At the close of the Exhibition of 1853, which was held upon the Leinster Lawn, Merrion Square, a number of influential citizens, admirers of Mr. William Dargan, assembled together with the object of establishing a memorial of this gentleman, whose enterprise and patriotism were shown not alone in respect to the Exhibition, but also in originating and developing all the great railways in Ireland. A sum of 6,000*l.* was collected, and with this a colossal Art Gallery was erected at the northern end of the Lawn, and a statue of Mr. Dargan, the work of Mr. Thomas Farrell, was placed in front of the structure. No sooner was the building of the gallery, which it was intended to call the Industrial Institution, begun, than the Government handsomely came forward with a large annual grant. The building, when completed in January, 1864, was opened as the National Gallery of Ireland. It assumed the character of a separate Government department directly under the Treasury like the London Gallery. It differs, however, from the latter, in that its governing body is larger, and partly of a representative character. The chief executive officer is the director, the present occupant, Mr. Henry Doyle, having held the office since 1869, when he was elected to succeed the late Mr. George Mulvany, the first director. The collection is remarkable for its comprehensiveness, comprising, in addition to a singularly fine selection of casts from the antique in its sculpture hall, one large gallery of original paintings by the old masters of various schools, and five smaller ones, divided as follows:—1, Modern Pictures; 2, Water Colours; 3, National Portrait Gallery; 4, A Loan Collection of Pictures; 5, Original Drawings by the Old Masters, Engravings, Autotypes, &c. The collection, as a whole, may fairly claim a place amongst European Galleries of the second rank, and it contains at least a few pictures of the chief schools, which might not unworthily find a place in those of the first. In the Italian schools may be mentioned the double portrait by S. Bellini and Georgione, the Holy Family by Ghirlandago, the Predella by A. del Sarto, the St. Sebastian by Caravaggio, the portraits by Moroni and Tintoret, and the unique, Fête at Rome, by Panini. In the Dutch and Flemish the choice examples of Cuyp, Van de Velde, Teniers, Ruysdael, P. Potter, and Bega, and in the Spanish, the Infant St. John, and the portrait by Murillo, the singular St. Jerome by Morales, and a good Ribera. In the modern room, though a certain prominence is given to native artists, such as Maclise, Danby, O'Conner, Shee, there are several fine pictures by Wilkie, Roberts, and Leslie, &c., and a few by foreign painters. In the Water-Colour Room will be found represented all the great masters of that branch, the fifty-two sketches by Turner being a loan from the trustees of the Turner Bequest. The National Portrait Gallery is fortunate in the high standard of merit that has been preserved in the pictures, independent of the interest of their subjects. One of the most delicately finished works is a portrait of Lady Morgan, "The Wild Irish Girl." Reynolds, Gainsborough, Hogarth, Lawrence, are all represented worthily. This will suffice to indicate the general character of this interesting collection, I will only add that the Gallery has developed rapidly, though gradually, into its present position, and that it is not nearly so well known as it deserves to be. It would well repay a visit to Dublin, although the city possessed no other attraction.

THE DUBLIN STAGE

The city has since the seventeenth century been famed for its dramatic and musical taste, and to this day every effort of dramatic genius is encouraged in Dublin. Edmund Kean, Miss O'Neil (afterwards Lady Beecher), Richard Jones, William Farren, senior, and a host of other dramatic stars were born in Dublin. In 1742 Lifford, Woffington, and Garrick acted together, and the rush to see them caused an epidemic which was known as "Garrick fever." Macklin and Quin afterwards displayed their native talent on the Dublin boards. Handel played his "Messiah" for the first time on the organ of Fishamble Street Music Hall, in April, 1741, for the benefit of two hospitals. This music hall, or theatre, as it afterwards became, had a long and remarkable career. All the celebrated actors, including Vandermere, who visited Dublin during its existence, performed there, and masquerade balls, Lord Mornington's concerts, and State lotteries have taken place within its walls. The theatre building stills stands, but is no longer used for the exhibition of dramatic art, but for the sale of hardware and agricultural implements.

The first theatre established in Dublin was, however, one in Werburgh Street, opened in 1633, by John Ogilby, one of the secretaries or writers who came to Ireland in the suite of Lord Wentworth. The Smock Alley Theatre, the next in order, maintained popularity for over a hundred years, and here Earl Strafford caused Shirley's comedy of the Royal Master to be played in 1637. Some years later, Ogilby having returned from service in the Royal Army, was appointed Master of the Revels to the Viceregal Court, a post which conferred on him the privilege of watching over the interests of the drama. In the presence of the Duke of Ormond one of Corneille's plays, in which Mrs. Phillips, "the matchless Orinda," took the leading part, was put upon the stage, and the dance and other tunes played between the acts were the composition of this versatile manager. When the news of the marriage of the Princess Mary with William of Orange reached Dublin, the Duke of Ormond and all the nobility went in great splendour to the play, and to this day the Lord-Lieutenant often presides at a "Command Night" in the theatre, on which occasions the buildings are filled with ladies in the richest toilettes and officers of the garrison in uniform. In 1785 Macklin, who was then ninety-five years of age, played at the Smock Alley Theatre. On the night of his benefit the excitement was too much for him and in the second act of The Man of the World, he had to be assisted from the stage, on which he never again appeared.

Towards the close of the 18th century, Crow Street Theatre was built. The lessee of this house was for some years Mr. Thomas Sheridan, father of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, and uncle of J. Sheridan Knowles. Mr. Sheridan was a great advocate for the development of music and the drama. He frequently presided at public meetings for this purpose, and one of his favourite performances was the recital of Dryden's Ode on the power of music. In his day it was considered a tempting feat to be able to illuminate the theatre with wax. The new Theatre Royal, in Hawkins Street, still the premier playhouse of Dublin, was opened on January 18th, 1821, on the occasion of George IV.'s visit to the metropolis. It acquired an unexpected notoriety in the following year, when some ruffian taking advantage of Lord Wellesley's state visit flung a bottle into His Excellency's box; a tumult, hence known as the "bottle" riot, ensued, but no one, I believe was killed. The first manager was a retired officer, Major Cole, who assumed the name of Calcraft, and the estimation in which his efforts to maintain legitimate drama was held may be understood when it is known that he was an especial favourite at Dublin Castle. Mr. John Harris, of London, subsequently became lessee of this theatre. The building has a façade of Portland stone without, and attached to the interior, which is in the form of a lyre, there is a capacious saloon, like that at Drury Lane, supported by Ionic pillars. This theatre and the "Gaiety" Theatre off St. Stephen's Green are the most important of the Dublin playhouses in this day, and they are both the property of Mr. Michael Gunn, whose cultivated musical tastes render him a popular lessee. There is a third theatre, formerly known as the "Adelphi," but later still as the "Queen's," in Great Brunswick Street, and here many public favourites, notably the great impersonators of the two Dromios (the Brothers Webb), Robson, Miss Neilson, and Miss Furtado had some of their earliest successes.

THE CHARACTER OF THE PEOPLE

As the Irish are the most communicative race in the world, and none are more full of pleasantry than the people of Dublin, you will not have arrived on the quays ten minutes without discovering much about them. Your carman you will find cannot be morose or silent, and after breaking the ice by telling you the jaunting-car was made for conversation and the "cimintin' of friendship" will dash off a description of his countrymen something like that given by Lady Morgan's sister:—

> We 're swarming alive
> Like bees in a hive,
> With talent and genius and beautiful ladies,
> We've a Duke in Kildare
> And a Donnybrook Fair,
> And if that wouldn't plaze yez, why nothing would plaze yez.
> We've poets in plenty,
> But not one in twenty
> Will stay in Ould Ireland to kepe it from sinking
> They say they can't live
> Where there's nothing to give,
> Och! what business have poets with 'atin' and drinking

If you come provided with letters of introduction you will have every opportunity afforded you of mixing in a society ever mirthful, and in which no rooted sorrow can show itself. You will find, then, that this people is ardent for information, poetical in their imagination, unrivalled in humour, always, even under the shadow of despair, sanguine, tender in their sympathies, constant in their attachments, tenacious of respect, and urbane and gracious, even when they are in the depths of poverty.

> Such a country for growing you ne'er did behold,
> We get rich when we're poor; we grow hot when we're cold;
> And the girls say that bashfulness makes us grow bold,
> We always grow young, but we never grow old.

The greatest charms of all are the simplicity, the kind-heartedness, and the education of the citizens. More than any other race Irishmen are cosmopolitans in thought as well as speech, and there is no political subject in which they do not take a warm interest, no new book about which most of them will not know something. There is little or none of that aptitude for business which makes English cities so full of merchant princes, but if Dubliners have this failing, they have ambition in other respects. They love learning, and cultivate generosity and charity towards all the world. These qualities make them especially respected by their employés, and indeed one can infer that wealthy men would be abundant if there really was money in the country to allow it to be possible.

It is true you will not see splendid horses and equipages in the streets in anything like the profusion visible in London, for the greater portion of the nobility, small a circle as they are, reside at the seaside suburbs which encompass Dublin, or on their estates in the country, and the large upper section of the middle class who live in the squares do not, as a rule, keep carriages, but prefer the jolting of the cars. Such luxuries as hired broughams, or a four-in-hand, are next to unknown in Dublin.

Dublin even more than London is a garrison city. Barracks, some of them magnificent in style as well as size, for cavalry and infantry abound, and the officers quartered therein being hospitably entertained at balls and dinner parties by the citizens, their presence lends considerable animation and brilliancy to Dublin society.

DUBLIN ILLUSTRATED—BIRD'S-EYE VIEW FROM THE SUMMIT OF NELSON COLUMN

That part of the matter had troubled me not a whit. But it clearly troubled him. He had vague ideas in his mind of plots and cabals, and calumnies artfully propagated, which inspired evident uneasiness. And yet Signor Sandro was no coward, morally or physically. But he had that singular characteristic which seems to be in the blood of so many Italians—a kind of suspicious credulity, which makes them prone to expect a stab in the dark. And, despite all the proverbial saws about judging others by ourselves, my own observation has convinced me that many an honest man in Italy is ready to impute the vilest dishonesty to his neighbours.

"But what," said he, pondering, with his chin in his hand and his elbow propped on the wall, "what does it all mean? Chiappaforte is at the bottom of it, depend on that. He is not so attentive for nothing. He still hopes to get Lucia's fifty thousand francs."

"It's an odd way of ingratiating himself with my sister, to be a party to this cruel insult. But I acquit Monsignore of having laid that mine. I am convinced from his manner that the Princess has acted on her own judgment, and that her violence was displeasing to Monsignore."

"Her means may not have suited him, but doubt not that the end she aims at is the same as his."

"Of course neither of them would have liked Don Vittorio to marry Lucy. That I understand."

"Marry her! Child, child, not one of the party ever dreamed of the possibility of such a thing. But why let matters go so far? Why let the selfish brute entangle the girl's feelings, and go near to break her heart! Some motive there must have been. Even Chiappaforte I suppose doesn't delight in evil for evil's sake. And as to the Princess—she used to have a good heart, and although she has turned bigot I cannot believe she's wicked."

"True," said I, bitterly, "she has wonderful black eyes and eyebrows, and, since you have not seen her for many years, the impression of her Juno-like bust and arm remains vivid in your memory."

"Caterina!"

"Master, it stings me too sharply to hear you talk about that woman's 'good heart.' What good thing did she ever do that you can tell me of?"

He looked up and then down uneasily. "Well, well," he said, almost meekly, "perhaps I judge her too leniently. I remember her when I was a lad, you know. I used to go to her father's house. She was wonderfully handsome, the true Roman type."

My heart a little smote me when I saw him bend his grey head in a deprecating manner; and still more it smote me when he suddenly turned, and, taking my hands, said kindly, "Caterina mia, you're a good girl, a brave girl! You must have suffered, my daughter. I understand, I understand. And to bear up all alone—to have such a burthen laid on your shoulders! Very young shoulders they are to carry such weights. You have such an old-fashioned steady air of wisdom, that one forgets sometimes you are but twenty-four years old."

The tears gushed from my eyes, and I saw the yellow road and the olive-trees and the distant plain dancing in a mist of prismatic colours. But I was unspeakably grateful for Signor Sandro's sympathy. "A word in season, how good it is."

As we walked back to the town my kind old master made me a confidence in return for mine, and a very unexpected one it was. He revealed to me that he had conceived the idea that Mr. Rutherford (whom he persisted in calling Rodolfo) might possibly fall in love with Lucy and marry her, and push my fortunes in the world of Art, and, in short, prove a most admirably opportune and effective Deus ex machinâ to get us out of all our troubles.

"For mercy's sake, Master, do not breathe a word of this kind to Lucy!" said I, quite taken aback.

"No, no, no fear; leave me alone to manage it! But is it not a fine chance? An excellent idea of mine? Eh? Dio grande, you're as silent as a stock or stone!" He burst out in one of his irritable, impatient tempers, and scolded me all the way home for my 'cold-bloodedness.' I humbly represented that we English—at any rate in my rank of life—were not accustomed to have marriages arranged for us by third persons in that business-like way, that under any circumstances the idea of such a proceeding would startle Lucy and disconcert her, but that in her present state, with the most sensitive fibres of her nature still quivering from a cruel blow, Signor Sandro's project could have but one result if it became known to her, namely, to make her hate and shun the sight of Mr. Rutherford. And, lastly, I said—this very humbly, knowing that it would make poor dear Signor Sandro terribly cross—that I did not, for my part, wholly approve of such schemes, and that one ought to know a man's character very much more intimately than my master could know Mr. Rutherford's before one ventured to recommend him as a husband! Signor Sandro was very cross, as I had foreseen; and in trying to put aside the discussion, I said, "Well, Master, we need not quarrel about it at any rate, for in all probability Mr. Rutherford will never have the remotest idea of marrying Lucy." And that made Signor Sandro crosser than before!

However, he recovered his temper as soon as he saw Lucy, and was so sweet, gentle, and tender in his manner to her that I loved him more than ever. Indeed, my only fear was lest he should be too gentle and sympathising, and so overset Lucy's self-command. He kept looking at her so pityingly when he thought she did not see him, and whispering to me, "Poor little lamb! poor little lamb!" Lucy was shy with him at first. She had always professed herself afraid of Signor Sandro. But, with more tact than I should have given him credit for, he quickly found the way to make her talk freely and eagerly: he spoke of my work, and praised it. It was an instinct of the heart which made Signor Sandro touch that spring.

We went into the bare, brick-floored room on the basement storey which was dignified by the name of my studio. And Lucy quite brightened up as she did the honours of my pictures, pulling out sketch after sketch, and descanting on their merits and their being "so exactly like the places" or "the people," and reserving to the last, as a grand climax, my study in oils of Monica, which she turned with its face to Signor Sandro with an air of triumph.

Poor maestro, he had been all sugar over my sketches, echoing Lucy's words of praise with a suavity worthy of Monsignor Chiappaforte himself, and forcibly restraining several criticisms which I absolutely saw hovering on his lips. I, who knew every turn of his face, understood very well what was meant by the twitching of his mouth, and the drawing together of his bushy grey eyebrows. But Lucy was quite content with his spoken acquiescence in her admiration of "Catherine's beautiful drawings."

I own that, when the canvas with Monica's head on it was turned from the wall, I felt very nervous and anxious. I had striven hard to do my best in it, and I attached great weight to Signor Sandro's verdict. I felt sure that, say what he might, I should not be deceived as to his real opinion of the picture; and so as Lucy presented it to him I stood by with a beating heart. There ensued several seconds of silence. Lucy's face fell. She had expected a burst of admiration. But I breathed a sigh of relief, for I knew that my master's attentive, silent, frowning scrutiny meant approbation. He was interested in the picture: too much interested in the picture to think of administering sugar-plums of praise to please Lucy. As we three stood mutely there, Signor Sandro looking at my picture, and Lucy and I looking at him, S'ora Nanna's hoarse harsh voice suddenly broke the silence by announcing "Ecco un Signore," and, turning round, we saw a stranger standing behind us in the open doorway, whom Signor Sandro saluted as "Rodolfo."

CHAPTER XIV.

The stranger was presented to us—I cannot say in due form, for Signor Sandro, not to mention the fact that he was utterly unable to pronounce the Englishman's name, paid very little regard to "due forms" of the merely conventional kind, at any time. But we were made to understand who he was.

It cannot be denied that the revelation of my master's project with regard to this unconscious Briton made me look at him with a very different degree and kind of interest from what I should have felt had the revelation not been made. I had resolutely declined to join in Signor Sandro's airy castle-building, but nevertheless, when the subject of our morning's conversation appeared before me in the flesh, I confess that I could not feel quite cool and indifferent. I observed the man with all my eyes and with all my mind.

The first remark which occurred to me was, "How intensely English!" And when he shook my offered hand and said, "How do you do?" I felt an odd sensation which inclined me to laugh, and yet brought the tears into my eyes. And then I remembered that I had not grasped an Englishman's hand, nor received an Englishman's greeting, since I parted from my brother at Southampton two years ago. I had seen and heard numbers of my countrymen, in the streets and the galleries, and the churches and the museums of Rome; but I knew none of them. They neither spoke to me, nor looked at me, nor cared for me; and now this hearty pressure of the hand, this frank, cordial voice, and homelike accent, made an impression on me entirely disproportionate to their everyday character;—only that such things had not been everyday matters to Lucy and me for a long, long time. The second mental remark that I made about Mr. Rutherford was that he had by no means the air of a Mæcenas. He looked simple, almost rustic, and had his fair share of British ungracefulness of movement and gesture. He was younger than I had expected, looking not more than five-and-thirty at the most, with a fresh hale tint on his face—the peculiar red hue of a fair skin tanned by exposure to the weather—as if he had lived on an English down or a Scotch moor all his life, instead of having been baked in all sorts of scorching climates, as Signor Sandro told me had really been the case. He had a shock of sandy hair, and sandy whiskers. His upper lip and chin were clean shaven, and enabled me to see the characteristic mouth. It was in his case a very characteristic mouth. When closed it looked tight and stern, with a resolute tension of the muscles at the corners, and the upper lip, although it curved markedly when seen in profile, was decidedly too long to be handsome. But the moment the lips parted that mouth became sweet and tender, and the smile was made singularly brilliant and attractive by a double range of square, white, and even teeth. In these fine teeth, and in the winning frankness of expression when he spoke, lay all Mr. Rutherford's claims to good looks. The rest of his features were ordinary, and even coarse; and his light blue eyes neither large nor finely shaped.

So much for what he said to the eye. To the ear he addressed a rather loud and well-toned voice, with a decided and strong provincial accent—a North-country accent I felt sure, although I could not pronounce of what particular county. In a word, a greater contrast could not be imagined than he presented to Don Vittorio Corleoni's refined type of masculine beauty, graceful ease of movement, and town-bred nonchalant elegance. Don Vittorio looked, not only as if he must appreciate artistic things, but as if he were kith and kin with half the gracious heads of young men which live on the canvas of a Raphael, or a Titian, or a Giorgione. Mr. Rutherford clearly belonged to another order of beings. I wondered within myself whether the contrast was not as great between the two men in inward and spiritual grace, as in outward and visible signs!

I had plenty of leisure to make these observations, for after the first salutations, Mr. Rutherford began discussing my picture, in Italian (fairly correct, but barbarously pronounced!) with Signor Sandro, and in English with Lucy; and I stood a little in the background looking and listening with an amount of involuntary interest, which was entirely due to my old master's castle in the air, and which I was half ashamed of myself for feeling. A little to my surprise, Lucy seemed to take to our new acquaintance at once. She chatted with him quite at her ease, and pointed out to him all the merits of my study of Monica, with her adorable air of simple gravity, like an earnest child. I say that this surprised me because—always shy with strangers—she had recently shrunk morbidly from every one except myself and Monsignor Chiappaforte.

Presently I proposed that we should go into the sitting-room, and Mr. Rutherford, taking this perhaps as a hint that we should be glad to be rid of his company, shortly afterwards went away. But before he did so we had agreed to make an excursion to the Villa of Quinctilius Varus that afternoon. The men and I were to walk and Lucy was to have a donkey, and we were to lounge or ramble as seemed good to us. Signor Sandro lingered behind for a few minutes to ask us what we thought of "Rodolfo." "I like him very much, Signor Sandro," said Lucy. "And I think he has very good taste in pictures."

"Seeing that he has bought one of the Master's, and has praised mine, we, at all events, are bound to agree in that opinion!" said I. But Signor Sandro was almost cross with me for saying it, and would allow of no irony on the subject, but insisted that Lucy was quite right, and that she showed much more common sense than I did, and declared that for his part he had never met with an amateur who possessed a better judgment in art than Rodolfo.

"Oh, but don't you know, Signor Sandro," said Lucy, "that Catherine always is sarcastic if people praise her pictures, and never will believe a word they say?" And then she and my master scolded me in concert. This novel alliance between Lucy, who had been wont to declare that Signor Sandro did not half appreciate my wonderful talents, and the old painter who usually criticised my work in the most unsparing manner, amused me not a little. "Well, well," said I, laughing, "I will make a point, in future, of giving implicit credence to all eulogiums, and treating corrections with the contempt they merit. And I have no doubt the result on my painting will be admirable! For the present you must allow me to go and attend to my work." And I went back to the studio.

I had not been there five minutes before Signor Sandro put his head in at the door to tell me that he and Lucy were going off together to the Villa d'Este, as it was such an exquisite morning, and meant to sit and bask in the sunshine, and look at the view, and do nothing, until lunch time. So they departed, and left me to my work. And I cannot deny that I felt more hopeful and light-hearted than had been the case since our arrival in Tivoli. Sympathy and kindness and praise (although I took the latter with several sobering deductions) were pleasant and exhilarating. But what exhilarated me most of all was to see Lucy shake off her listless apathy of look and manner, and talk and smile and flush up in something like her old eager way. I had Monica for an hour to put the last finishing touches to my study, and she with her quick observation—which always reminded me of that instinctive kind of recognition a dog has of human expression—remarked that I looked cheerful to-day; adding in an explanatory tone, "not so dull and downcast, you know!" I suppose that seeing me in what she considered an unusually pleasant humour moved her to be confidential. At all events, after some fidgeting and hesitation (purposely designed to attract my attention) she said abruptly, "I like you."

"And I like you, Monica, if you will but sit still."

This checked her for a moment; but then she said, looking up at me with unaffected, serious interrogation in her splendid eyes, "Don't you like me at all, when I move about?"

"Not nearly so much as when you're quiet," I answered. But I could not help smiling; and the smile neutralised the chill of my words. Monica jumped up and took my hand and kissed it. "I do like you!" said she. Then, lowering her voice, "I like you better than the Signorina Lucia. Yet she's the prettiest. And she never scolds me. You scold me. And yet——," here she broke off, as though perplexed to discover the cause of this phenomenon of her liking me the best. Fortunately the sitting had come to an end, and I was beginning to clean and put away my palette and brushes; so I let Monica talk on and bob her head about and gesticulate as much as she pleased. She came close up to me, and looking scrutinisingly into my face, said in a whisper, "I can tell you a secret. No one knows it. Not even grandmother. She'd be frightened. If I told you, would you tell again?"

"That depends on circumstances," I replied.

"Would you swear not to tell?"

"Certainly not, Monica."

A pause.

"Would you tell if you had promised not to?"

"If I had promised, I should keep my word; but I don't mean to promise until I know something more as to what your mighty secret is."

My firmness and air of indifference irritated, and yet in some odd way seemed to attract her. She paced once or twice up and down the room, and then suddenly stopping in front of me again said, "I should like to tell you, because I felt better after I told you about that demon, that prince with the gold chain, and the gold hair on his face. You said I should, and I did. It lifted the weight from my heart. And now I have a weight—here—like a stone."

"Is your secret about—that prince, Monica?" I asked, as coolly as I could; but I felt my pulse suddenly quickened.

"No. Not about him. About—you wouldn't tell, to bring any one to harm, would you?"

There was a tremulous eagerness in her tone and she looked at me imploringly.

"Whom should I tell? And how could any secret of yours bring any one to harm?"

"Ah—h—h?" (with a long-drawn sighing exclamation). "It could though!"

"Well, Monica, you must either trust me outright, or hold your tongue. I will help you if I can, but I bind myself by no promises beforehand." And here I put my last brush in its place, and turned as if to leave the studio. Monica caught at my dress and detained me. "Stay," she cried, "I will trust you. I make bad blood when I keep things to myself. And I have no one else. I dare not tell grandmother."
